EVERY SEASON in a different way, Irish artists are more and more influencing the souvenir market.

This week a new exhibition in Dublin, arranged by Bord Failte Eireann, the Irish Tourist Board, features the newest in Irish souvenirs by leading Irish artists.

In every nook and cranny in Ireland, artists are looking for inspiration in the old traditional crafts of the countryside in an effort to make souvenirs more exciting than ever before.

A Galway woman has designed harvest knot brooches and sprays. From Donegal and Leitrim have come distinctive material for dainty shell dolls.

The famous Irish blackthorn, known the world over, is now being used for brooches.

Ceramics and pottery are being fully exploited with many artists using their talents to present popular Irish scenes and characters.

A 23-YEAR-OLD Irish composer made his debut in Dublin this week.

SEOIRSE BODLEY has been awarded first prize by the Irish Arts Council for a musical composition.

He is a graduate of the National University of Ireland and a licentiate of Trinity College, London. Many of his works have been presented on Radio Eireann.

LONG BEFORE Arthur Fiedler's baton was lifted on the the first number of the Eire Society Pops program, the "sold out" sign was posted at the box office.

The entire program was a huge success as every single person thrilled to the Irish selections and their excellent treatment by the Pops artists.

Early reports from Ireland indicate the Irish appearances of the Symphony Orchestra should be just as successful and enthusiastically received.

ONE HUNDRED and seventy doctors from 14 countries are currently visiting Irish hospitals as guests of the Irish Hospitals Commission.

The group, members of the International Hospital Federation, have held tours in Sweden, Italy and France in recent years.

The doctors presently touring Ireland are from Europe, Asia and the United States.

THE SIXTH ANNUAL Fleadh Ceoil, Music Festival, featuring traditional musicians and ballad singers was held last week in Ennis, the capital of County Clare.

All together, 750 competitors and more than 20 ceili bands took part in the festival.

IRISH HANDICRAFT has made an appearance in South Africa.

A Donegal handmade carpet has been specially woven for a leading South African interior designer, to complete a interior design for a new hotel in Durban.

The oval carpet measuring 27 feet by 17 feet, was woven in three weeks at the factory of Donegal Carpets Ltd., Killybegs, an Irish firm which uses all-Irish wool throughout.

ST. COLUMBAN'S Circle will sponsor a whist party tomorrow evening at Ashmont Hall, Dorchester.

The committee in charge of arrangements includes Mrs. Stephen Wallace, Miss Katherine O'Sullivan, Mrs. Stephen Connolly and Mrs. Thomas Lavin.

AN IRISH DELEGATION, consisting of three Irish consulting engineers, has left for the U. S. to study consulting engineering practices with special emphasis on development in Ireland.

The group is being sponsored by the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. They will visit major consulting engineers' firms and view examples of power development, including nuclear power in construction, mechanical and electrical works.

Final reports by the group will be made available to all engineers in Ireland.

(Mary Tierney's Irish column is published every Tuesday in the Boston Traveler.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078. Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JUL 13 1956

Jordan Marsh Cited

ARTHUR FIEDLER (right) conductor of the Esplanade Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents a certificate to Jordan Marsh Co. official. Certificate acknowledged the store's sponsorship of one of the nightly concerts. Receiving certificate is James H. Fairclough Jr., vice-president of Jordan Marsh.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JUL 13 1956

To Lead Pops

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON, popular assistant conductor of Boston Pops, will lead closing Esplanade Concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL-HERALD
Circ. D. 88,500

JUL 14 1956

Brahms' Music Issued By Victor

New among recordings is the Boston Symphony's Brahms' "Symphony No. 2." Charles Munch conducts; Victor is the record house. The disc carries, too, Brahms' "Tragic Overture."

Byron Janis, pianist, has recorded, in England, for Victor, Beethoven's "Sonata No. 21, in C, Opus 53," otherwise known as "The Walstein," and "No.

Arturo Toscanini conducts the National Broadcasting Company 30 in E, Opus 109."
orchestra in the presentation of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Carlton Cooley is the cello soloist. This is a Victor record and so, too, is a program of loved music titled "Music for Summertime." Morton Gould and his orchestra are the performers.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
Circ. D. 111,942 - S. 113,799

JUL 15 1956

Record Review

BY CORNO DI CACCIO

An extraordinary sensative reading of Tschaikovksy's "Pathetique" Symphony is containec on a new Decca release featuring the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Igor Markevitch, an artist who has already made a vivic impression through earlier discings, is the conductor. His unflagging sensitivity combines nicely with the enthusiasm of the players. The results make this the most memorable recorded performance of this score since the ancient Furtwaengler version, also with the Berlin orchestra, on RCA Victor. The Decca sound is suitably lush.

* * *

VANGUARD'S "A Hi-Fi Frolic With Strauss" offers 10 of the waltz king's polkas, a gallop, a scherzo and "The Beautiful Blue Danube." Anton Paulik, who has repeatedly demonstrated his deft ways with such lilting scores, does handsomely in this venture in which he is lent every assistance by the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. The title may be a mite on the "cute" side but is one which contains on disappointments for the sonic enthusiast. As for the music you get precisely what is promised: that is, no depth, no profundity and also no excuse for tears.

* * *

A TRULY splendid performance of the Brahms 2nd Symphony comes off a new RCA Victor lp in which Charles Munch and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra douse themselves in glory. There are many versions of this amiable work on the shelves but this one will serve your needs handsomely for years to come. Quite possibly, RCA's engineers have at last succeeded in doing right by this magnificent band of worthies. The inter-relationships here between the various choirs of the Boston have a certain correctness that puts the listener in row five of the Beantowner's Symphony Hall. There's through of the "Tragic" Overture on the flip-side.

* * *

THE 6TH and 7th Symphonies by Sibelius are paired on a new Angel release in which the Philharmonic Orchestra is led by Herbert von Karajan. Each work gets commondably considerate care, Herr Karajan being careful not to give offense to those who will look askance at the very idea of a non-Scandinavian handling the directional chores. Really, there is no non-Scandinavian handling the reason for any alarm. The bleak, massive landscapes painted by the composer come vividly to life. I doubt, however, if even repeated auditions of this disc will force the listener to gain new respect for Sibelius if there was little to begin with. I, for one, still feel about the same.

* * *

JACQUES IBERT, who can tweak your cheek as saucily as the next saucy roue, leads the Orchestra of the Paris Opera in his "Escales" and "Les Amours de Jupitor" on a Capitol release. The "Escales" is certainly the more familiar score, being the poor man's Ravel. Of the "Les Amours" piece, it comes rather close to being acceptable modern music in a few places but the overall effect is depressing. Not even Ibert's undoubted skill as an orchestrator can quite cloak the fact the old boy really had nothing to say when he dashed the piece off. Let's hope, though, that he amassed an enormous pile of loot through it.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
Circ. D. 442,665 - S. 549,629

JUL 13 1956

Reviewing the Records

Songs Like They Used to Be

For record fans who have had reason aplenty recently to fear that good vocal groups had become as extinct as the dinosaur, there is good news at long last—and in the shape of an lp released this week by RCA-Camden.

"Presenting the Deep River Boys" is an album to bring joy to the heart and a gentle tapping to the feet of any phonograph owner whose turntable has remained stilled because of the current crop of unskilled harmonizers.

A quintet whose aim it is to make songs sound the way songs used to sound, the Deep River Boys keep a mellow touch with all 12 numbers on the lp, ranging from "It Had To Be You" to "Ain't Misbehavin'" and "Jealous."

Camden, in releasing this wonderful collection, could do just one thing more, however. The company should send free copies to other quintets, quartets and trios who are making money under the misconception that tuxedos, crewcuts and no knowledge of music make a vocal group. The shock of hearing good harmony might be enough to cause them to lose voice.

* * *

Other Long Plays:

"Music for Summertime," played by Morton Gould and his orchestra (RCA Victor). This delightful long-play recording proves beyond a doubt there is such a thing as summer music. A selection from "Porgy and Bess," "Star Dust," "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," "Stormy Weather," "Where or When," "Over the Rainbow" and others are beautiful reminders that much contemporary music has a classic stature. Rating: a title fulfilled.

* * *

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73 and "The Tragic Overture," Op. 81, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch (RCA Victor). Brahms took a beating from the critics when these two symphonies were first presented for public hearing, yet they lived on to become the composer's most enduring creations. Munch and the orchestra capture with impressive delicacy the restrained and esthetic melodic beauty of the beloved works. Rating: superb.

* * *

Rave Notice (Columbia). The new record by the Calvin Jackson Quartet is entitled for the press comments on its earlier disc, and it sounds like the distinguished Jackson is taking a humdrum rest on his laurels, and leaning far too heavily on the vibraphone. Rating: Less than rave.

WASHINGTON D. C.
POST & TIMES HERALD

JUL 15 1956

The Record Player

Toscanini in All His Glory

Berlioz: Harold in Italy. NBC Symphony under Toscanini. Victor. LM 1951.

Recorded from a 1953 broadcast, this will be, for many, the definitive version. There is more reason for this than the bare fact that it is another famous Toscanini reading. The soloist is Carlton Cooley, who has since become first viola of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The sound is glorious, and the interpretation filled with life and beauty. It is, however, for me no more compelling than the great Columbia disk with Beecham and Primrose.

Beethoven: The Nine Symphonies. NBC Symphony under Toscanini. Victor LM 6901.

Originally pressed in a custom pressing, these symphonies have now been housed handsomely by Victor, available at about half their original price, and a memento few will want to be without. My ears also sense an improvement in sound, which could be Victor's re-engineering.

Brahms: Symphony No. 2; also Tragic Overture. Boston Symphony under Munch. Victor LM 1959.

Brilliant sound, and brilliant playing, with Munch not quite willing to let a phrase ride on its own impulse, but preferring to push it a bit here and pull a little there. Munch told me once that he had the "vrai Brahms tradition," and perhaps it is precisely that "vrai" instead of "echt" tradition that gets in the way now and then.

SOMETHING NEW, FOR ME: Ella Fitzgerald in the Cole Porter Song Book. Verve Set 400½.

Thirty-two of the best songs any American popular songwriter ever put out are done with a style and overall rightness few singers could equal. Ella Fitzgerald has the know-how to land right in the middle of almost every one of these songs. From 1928 to 1945, from such gems, never well enough known, as "Miss Otis Regrets" through the unbroadcastable "Love for Sale," which remains one of Porter's best songs for all its immorality, this is a rich album. The sound is magnificent, and the accompaniments which ranges from solo piano to full band, suits each song "T"-ly. I could live without "Don't Fence Me In," but otherwise I have no quarrel with a single thing about this set. It is a rare item.

Chadwick: Symphonic Sketches: Jubilee, Noel, Hobgoblin, and A Vagrom Ballad. Eastman-Rochester Orchestra under Hanson. Mercury MG 50104.

George Chadwick may have had his direct predecessors but they in no way lessen the beauty and impact of these four orchestral poems, of which I have always especially liked the Christmas item. The performance and recording is superb.—Hume.

116
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JUL 13 1956

To Lead Pops

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON, popular assistant conductor of Boston Pops, will lead closing Esplanade Concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL-HERALD
Circ. D. 88,500

JUL 14 1956

Brahms' Music Issued By Victor

New among recordings is the Boston Symphony's Brahms' "Symphony No. 2." Charles Munch conducts; Victor is the record house. The disc carries, too, Brahms' "Tragic Overture."

Byron Janis, pianist, has recorded, in England, for Victor, Beethoven's "Sonata No. 21, in C, Opus 53," otherwise known as "The Walstein," and "No. 30 in E, Opus 109."

Arturo Toscanini conducts the National Broadcasting Company orchestra in the presentation of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Carlton Cooley is the cello soloist. This is a Victor record and so, too, is a program of loved music titled "Music for Summertime." Morton Gould and his orchestra are the performers.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
Circ. D. 111,942 - S. 113,799

JUL 15 1956

Record Review

BY CORNO DI CACCIO

An extraordinary sensative reading of Tschaikovksy's "Pathetique" Symphony is contained on a new Decca release featuring the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Igor Markevitch, an artist who has already made a vivid impression through earlier discings, is the conductor. His unflagging sensitivity combines nicely with the enthusiasm of the players. The results make this the most memorable recorded performance of this score since the ancient Furtwaengler version, also with the Berlin orchestra, on RCA Victor. The Decca sound is suitably lush.

* * *

VANGUARD'S "A Hi-Fi Frolic With Strauss" offers 10 of the waltz king's polkas, a gallop, a scherzo and "The Beautiful Blue Danube." Anton Paulik, who has repeatedly demonstrated his deft ways with such lilting scores, does handsomely in this venture in which he is lent every assistance by the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. The title may be a mite on the "cute" side but is one which contains on disappointments for the sonic enthusiast. As for the music you get precisely what is promised: that is, no depth, no profundity and also no excuse for tears.

* * *

A TRULY splendid performance of the Brahms 2nd Symphony comes off a new RCA Victor lp in which Charles Munch and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra douse themselves in glory. There are many versions of this amiable work on the shelves but this one will serve your needs handsomely for years to come. Quite possibly, RCA's engineers have at last succeeded in doing right by this magnificent band of worthies. The inter-relationships here between the various choirs of the Boston have a certain correctness that puts the listener in row five of the Beantowner's Symphony Hall. There's through of the "Tragic" Overture on the flip-side.

* * *

THE 6TH and 7th Symphonies by Sibelius are paired on a new Angel release in which the Philharmonic Orchestra is led by Herbert von Karajan. Each work gets commondably considerate care, Herr Karajan being careful not to give offense to those who will look askance at the very idea of a non-Scandinavian handling the directional chores. Really, there is no non-Scandinavian handling the reason for any alarm. The bleak, massive landscapes painted by the composer come vividly to life. I doubt, however, if even repeated auditions of this disc will force the listener to gain new respect for Sibelius if there was little to begin with. I, for one, still feel about the same.

* * *

JACQUES IBERT, who can tweak your cheek as saucily as the next saucy roue, leads the Orchestra of the Paris Opera in his "Escales" and "Les Amours de Jupitor" on a Capitol release. The "Escales" is certainly the more familiar score, being the poor man's Ravel. Of the "Les Amours" piece, it comes rather close to being acceptable modern music in a few places but the overall effect is depressing. Not even Ibert's undoubted skill as an orchestrator can quite cloak the fact the old boy really had nothing to say when he dashed the piece off. Let's hope, though, that he amassed an enormous pile of loot through it.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
Circ. D. 442,665 - S. 549,629

JUL 13 1956

Songs Like They Used to Be

For record fans who have had reason aplenty recently to fear that good vocal groups had become as extinct as the dinosaur, there is good news at long last—and in the shape of an lp released this week by RCA-Camden.

"Presenting the Deep River Boys" is an album to bring joy to the heart and a gentle tapping to the feet of any phonograph owner whose turntable has remained stilled because of the current crop of unskilled harmonizers.

A quintet whose aim it is to make songs sound the way songs used to sound, the Deep River Boys keep a mellow touch with all 12 numbers on the lp, ranging from "It Had To Be You" to "Ain't Misbehavin,'" and "Jealous."

Camden, in releasing this wonderful collection, could do just one thing more, however. The company should send free copies to other quintets, quartets and trios who are making money under the misconception that tuxedos, crewcuts and no knowledge of music make a vocal group. The shock of hearing good harmony might be enough to cause them to lose voice.

* * *

Other Long Plays:

"Music for Summertime," played by Morton Gould and his orchestra (RCA Victor). This delightful long-play recording proves beyond a doubt there is such a thing as summer music. A selection from "Porgy and Bess," "Star Dust," "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," "Stormy Weather," "Where or When," "Over the Rainbow" and others are beautiful reminders that much contemporary music has a classic stature. Rating: a title fulfilled.

* * *

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73 and "The Tragic Overture," Op. 81, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch (RCA Victor). Brahms took a beating from the critics when these two symphonies were first presented for public hearing, yet they lived on to become the composer's most enduring creations. Munch and the orchestra capture with impressive delicacy the restrained and esthetic melodic beauty of the beloved works. Rating: superb.

* * *

Rave Notice (Columbia). The new record by the Calvin Jackson Quartet is entitled for the press comments on its earlier disc, and it sounds like the distinguished Jackson is taking a humdrum rest on his laurels, and leaning far too heavily on the vibraphone. Rating: Less than rave.

WASHINGTON D. C.
POST & TIMES HERALD

JUL 15 1956

The Record Player

Toscanini in All His Glory

Berlioz: Harold in Italy. NBC Symphony under Toscanini. Victor. LM 1951.

Recorded from a 1953 broadcast, this will be, for many, the definitive version. There is more reason for this than the bare fact that it is another famous Toscanini reading. The soloist is Carlton Cooley, who has since become first viola of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The sound is glorious, and the interpretation filled with life and beauty. It is, however, for me no more compelling than the great Columbia disk with Beecham and Primrose.

Beethoven: The Nine Symphonies. NBC Symphony under Toscanini. Victor LM 6901.

Originally pressed in a custom pressing, these symphonies have now been housed handsomely by Victor, available at about half their original price, and a memento few will want to be without. My ears also sense an improvement in sound, which could be Victor's re-engineering.

Brahms: Symphony No. 2; also Tragic Overture. Boston Symphony under Munch. Victor LM 1959.

Brilliant sound, and brilliant playing, with Munch not quite willing to let a phrase ride on its own impulse, but preferring to push it a bit here and pull a little there. Munch told me once that he had the "vrai Brahms tradition," and perhaps it is precisely that "vrai" instead of "echt" tradition that gets in the way now and then.

SOMETHING NEW, FOR ME: Ella Fitzgerald in the Cole Porter Song Book. Verve Set 400½.

Thirty-two of the best songs any American popular songwriter ever put out are done with a style and overall rightness few singers could equal. Ella Fitzgerald has the know-how to land right in the middle of almost every one of these songs. From 1928 to 1945, from such gems, never well enough known, as "Miss Otis Regrets" through the unbroadcastable "Love for Sale," which remains one of Porter's best songs for all its immorality, this is a rich album. The sound is magnificent, and the accompaniments which ranges from solo piano to full band, suits each song "T"-ly. I could live without "Don't Fence Me In," but otherwise I have no quarrel with a single thing about this set. It is a rare item.

Chadwick: Symphonic Sketches: Jubilee. Noel. Hobgoblin, and A Vagrom Ballad. Eastman-Rochester Orchestra under Hanson. Mercury MG 50104.

George Chadwick may have had his direct predecessors but they in no way lessen the beauty and impact of these four orchestral poems, of which I have always especially liked the Christmas item. The performance and recording is superb.—Hume.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL-BULLETIN
Circ. D. 136,317
JUL 19 1956

OFF THE RECORDS

Boston Symphony Recordings Prompt Berlioz 'Revival

By MARIE HICKS DAVIDSON

A Berlioz "revival" has been spearheaded by Boston Symphony recordings.

RCA Victor is releasing Arturo Toscanini's performance of "Harold in Italy," taken from an NBC broadcast. The new orthophonic high fidelity recording features as soloist Carlton Cooley, NBC Symphony violist.

The album cover presents a colorful replica of the famous Fountain of Tivoli at the Villa d'Este in Rome and serves to amplify the "Harold in Italy" theme. Notes contain excerpts from the memoirs of Hector Berlioz, concerning the concept, development and first performances of Harold in Italy.

* * *

VIRGIL FOX, one of the world's widely toured organists, plays selections from the works of Johann Sebastian Bach in an RCA Victor album recorded in New York City's Riverside Church, of which Fox is the organist.

This is the first recording to be made at the church using the newly rebuilt Aolean-Skinner organ, installed there in 1928.

Included in this collection is "Come Sweet Death," which Fox had previously recorded as a 78 r.p.m. single in pre-microgroove days and which was a best-seller for many years.

Fox, during his 1938 tour, played in Leipsig at the St. Thomaskirche, where Bach officiated as "His Majesty's Composer" for a quarter of a century. Fox was hailed by Leipsig critics as an artist "whose playing revealed an understanding of the innermost secrets of the art of Bach."

* * *

An album containing two of Beethoven's most popular sonatas—"Tempest" and "Appasionata"—performed by England's famed pianist, Solomon, is released by RCA.

Noted for his Beethoven, Solomon set out a few years ago to record all of Beethoven's 32 sonatas. With this release, RCA Victor is continuing to issue the sonatas as they are recorded. The recording, made in England, is in new orthophonic high fidelity sound.

Amparo Iturbi, one of the most distinguished contemporary women pianists, brings forth the color of Spain, Vienna and Paris in an RCA Victor album containing selections by Ravel, Schubert, Chabrier, Chavarri and Shostakovich.

Although most of the album selections were written originally for the piano, they also have gained wide popularity as orchestral transcriptions.

* * *

POPULAR

THE MUSICAL sound track of Warner Brothers' "Serenade," starring Mario Lanza, is released by RCA.

Lanza sings a variety of favorite songs and widely known operatic arias. In duets from "La Boheme" and "Otello" he is joined by Jean Fenn and Licia Albanese, respectively. Two songs in the album, "Serenade" and "My Destiny," were written by Sammy Cahn and Nicholas Brodszky.

In the recording, Lanza sings "Serenade," "La Danza," "Torna a Surriento," "O Soave Fanciulla," "Di Rigori Armato," "Di Quella Pira," "O Paradiso," "Dio ti Giocondi," "Ave Maria," "Lamento di Federico," "Nessun Dorma," "My Destiny" and "Amor Ti Vieta."

Newlyweds Home In Texas

Lieutenant and Mrs. Bradford Jeffries (Ann Brawner), married recently in the Hillsborough garden of the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Parmer Fuller Brawner, are now established at Randolph Air Force Base, Texas, after their honeymoon in the Carmel Valley.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Independent Democrat
Circ. 113,081
JUL 17 1956

SONGS OF SUMMER: Bostonians turn out for evening of listening to music of Boston Pops orchestra at Hatch Memorial on Boston's Esplanade. Concerts have been an institution for the past 28 years. City of Cambridge is in the background across the river.—[UP Photo.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press
MALDEN, Mass.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 23,000 Free

JUL 19 1956

Entertainment Whirl

By MILT JAFFEE GUN

KOVACS KEEN . . . The Ernie Kovacs Show viewed on Channel 4 every Monday at 8 p.m., provides the finest in entertainment and production techniques seen on local TV screens in a long time.

In addition to its fast paced, highly entertaining format, the viewer is treated to novel camera angles and unique production devices. Credit must be given to one of the youngest producers in the TV profession, Perry Cross, 29-year-old Rhode Island University graduate.

Perry started his career in 1948 as a prop man, later helped in budget planning and production supervision on the "Milton Berle" show and finally achieved his goal when he joined the Kovacs show, as producer, in May.

POPS PARTS . . . Last Monday evening the Boston Pops performed the last of its summertime Esplanade Concerts. Followers of the Pops and the Boston Symphony will be able to hear their favorites this Monday evening over WBZ when Charles Munch will direct the orchestra in a Berkshire Festival concert broadcast at 8:15 p.m. Symphonic works of three French composers will be the feature this week.

CONELRAD COURIER . . . is the role to be played by the National Broadcasting Company tomorrow from 4:10 to 4:25 p.m. During this period all NBC television, standard broadcast and FM radio stations will leave the air in a Conelrad test.

Conelrad is an emergency system of broadcasting for use when the country is threatened with an air attack.

It is a contraaction of the words "Control of Electromagnetic Radiation" and is devised to reduce the navigational aid a potential enemy might obtain from broadcasting stations. During all Conelrad tests and alerts Civil Defense information will be broadcast at 640 and 1240 kilocycles on your radio dial.

SLOW START . . . for the new WBZ-TV "Saturday Hop" emceed by popular platter spinners Alan Dary and Norm Prescott. While the format seems slow paced and strained, the production leaves even more to be desired. Assets on last week's show were the scenic design and the appearance of Mel Parnell, Red Sox hurler, just a few hours after his spectacular no-hit performance. It seems that local shows fall far short of network programs in the production of telecasts.

FESTIVE FORTIETH . . . anniversary will be celebrated next Tuesday at 8 p.m. on Channel 4's Chevy Show. It will be the 40th show business anniversary of Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians. Fred Waring, Jr., will join three of the four original members of his famous father's first musical group, Warings Banjo Orchestra of Tyrone, Pa., for a jazz session which will open the full hour show.

The foursome — senior and junior Warings on banjos, Tom (brother)) Waring, piano, and Poley McClintock, drums—will play "Old Maid Blues," "Somebody Stole My Gal" and "Sleep" which has been Warings theme since 1923.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

JUL 22 1956

SOME COMMENT IN BRIEF

BAND CONCERT: Finlandia, Perpetuum mobile, marches by Sousa, Setiz, Hummel, Althouse and others; Allentown Band, Albertus L. Myers conducting (W. F. B.). The Allentown Band, founded in 1828, is said to be the nation's oldest. It played for Presidents William Henry Harrison in 1836, Martin Van Buren in 1839, and, to judge from this record, is still going strong.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 3; Ventsislav Yankoff and NWDR Symphony conducted by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (Capitol). A fairly routine performance that does not stack up against previous LP's of the same work by Gilels, Serkin, Backhaus and Wuehrer, to mention but four competing versions.

BRAHMS: Hungarian Dances; Vienna State Opera Orchestra conducted by Mario Rossi (Vanguard). All twenty-one of the dances are presented. Brahms did not orchestrate all of them; the last five were done by Dvorak, and various musicians had a hand in the others. The music is a lot of fun and Rossi conducts it energetically.

FAMOUS CONTINENTAL MARCHES: Band of the Grenadier Guards, conducted by Maj. F. J. Harris (London). Marche Lorraine, Le Regiment de Sambre et Meuse, Under the Double Eagle, With Sword and Lance, etc., played with spirit by an excellent military band.

PICNIC: Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting (R.C.A. Victor). Pleasant music designed, according to the jacket blurb, for outdoor listening on a portable record player. Works heard, including Jalousie, Danube Waves, Malagueña,, Poet and Peasant Overture, etc., are done with the characteristic sparkle of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

TORELLI: Trumpet Concerto; VIVALDI: Concerto in G minor; LOCATELLI: Violin Concerto in C minor; Il Pianto d'Arianna; J. M. Leclair Instrumental Ensemble conducted by Jean-François Paillard (Haydn Society). Fine eighteenth-century music. The short Torelli work is spirited, the Vivaldi strong and rhythmic, and Locatelli slender and fluent. Excellent performances and recording.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN-TIMES
Circ. D. 556,985 - S. 573,327

JUL 20 1956

Grant Park Pianist Wins Cheers

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Felix Borowski

One of the most interesting of its concerts this season was offered by the Grand Park Symphony Orchestra Wednesday evening. Nicolai Malko conducted and Ruth Slenczynska was his solo pianist.

While Miss Slenczynska was making her first appearance at the band shell, this was by no means her Chicago debut. She gave a piano recital at the age of 8, and as late as last season performed the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff (one of her teachers) with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

There can be no doubt of this artist's great talent, her astonishing command of the piano keyboard, her musical sensitivity.

In her reading of Chopin's F minor Concerto there were moments in which she reflected the elegance, even the poetic content, of the work.

There were other occasions when the spectacle of the multitude of listeners spread out in front of her apparently persuaded Miss Slenczynska that loud playing would be necessary if Chopin's music were to be put across.

This reviewer does not remember any previous Grant Park pianist who won as much audience success as this one. One encore was not enough for her cheering listeners; two had to be provided — on each occasion a virtuoso Etude by Chopin, performed with extraordinary brilliance.

Malko opened his program with Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque, originally composed as a piano piece, but scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. Its buoyant vitality made the music ideal as a curtain raiser.

Following the piece, there was presented Basil Kalinnikov's First Symphony. Composed more than 60 years ago, the score sounds somewhat dated; yet its Russian character, effective scoring, added to an excellent performance made pleasant listening.

The concert ended with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," but Malko added two extra pieces — the Elegie written by Massenet as part of his incidental music for Lecomte de Lisle's tragedy, "Les Erinnyes," the violoncello solo beautifully played by Leopold Teraspulsky. Also there was heard the Waltz from the last act of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Eugene Onegin."

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

JUL 21 1956

KEY WOULD BE VERY MAD, TOO

NEW YORK—Even in this materialistic age, patriotism stirs the hearts of many—particularly J. E. Johnson, a record dealer in Greenville, N. C.

Last week Johnson wrote a vitriolic letter to the Southern Radio Corporation, of Charlotte, N. C., complaining that he could not get records of the "Star-Spangled Banner" either by the RCA Band or the Boston Pops. He was told the disks are no longer available. Johnson's letter said:

"Do you mean to tell us that a company as large as RCA would not press and keep in stock our National Anthem. . . . That is about the damndest thing we have ever heard . . . a company in the music business which can't supply our National Anthem!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Post
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Democrat
Circ. 216,173

JUL 29 1956

ESPLANADE CONCERTS OPEN TOMORROW

The Esplanade concerts by members of the Boston Symphony will open tomorrow night. These open-air performances under the direction of Arthur Fiedler will be held nightly for the next two weeks.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press
MALDEN, Mass.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 23,000 Free

MAR 19 1956

Entertainment Whirl

By MILT JAFFEE GUN

KOVACS KEEN . . . The Ernie Kovacs Show viewed on Channel 4 every Monday at 8 p.m., provides the finest in entertainment and production techniques seen on local TV screens in a long time.

In addition to its fast paced, highly entertaining format, the viewer is treated to novel camera angles and unique production devices. Credit must be given to one of the youngest producers in the TV profession, Perry Cross, 29-year-old Rhode Island University graduate.

Perry started his career in 1948 as a prop man, later helped in budget planning and production supervision on the "Milton Berle" show and finally achieved his goal when he joined the Kovacs show, as producer, in May.

POPS PARTS . . . Last Monday evening the Boston Pops performed the last of its summertime Esplanade Concerts. Followers of the Pops and the Boston Symphony will be able to hear their favorites this Monday evening over WBZ when Charles Munch will direct the orchestra in a Berkshire Festival concert broadcast at 8:15 p.m. Symphonic works of three French composers will be the feature this week.

CONELRAD COURIER . . . is the role to be played by the National Broadcasting Company tomorrow from 4:10 to 4:25 p.m. During this period all NBC television, standard broadcast and FM radio stations will leave the air in a Conelrad test.

Conelrad is an emergency system of broadcasting for use when the country is threatened with an air attack.

It is a contraaction of the words "Control of Electromagnetic Radiation" and is devised to reduce the navigational aid a potential enemy might obtain from broadcasting stations. During all Conelrad tests and alerts Civil Defense information will be broadcast at 640 and 1240 kilocycles on your radio dial.

SLOW START . . . for the new WBZ-TV "Saturday Hop" emceed by popular platter spinners Alan Dary and Norm Prescott. While the format seems slow paced and strained, the production leaves even more to be desired. Assets on last week's show were the scenic design and the appearance of Mel Parnell, Red Sox hurler, just a few hours after his spectacular no-hit performance. It seems that local shows fall far short of network programs in the production of telecasts.

FESTIVE FORTIETH . . . anniversary will be celebrated next Tuesday at 8 p.m. on Channel 4's Chevy Show. It will be the 40th show business anniversary of Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians. Fred Waring, Jr., will join three of the four original members of his famous father's first musical group, Warings Banjo Orchestra of Tyrone, Pa., for a jazz session which will open the full-hour show.

The foursome — senior and junior Warings on banjos, Tom (brother)) Waring, piano, and Poley McClintock, drums—will play "Old Maid Blues," "Somebody Stole My Gal" and "Sleep" which has been Warings theme since 1923.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

JUL 22 1956

SOME COMMENT IN BRIEF

BAND CONCERT: Finlandia, Perpetuum mobile, marches by Sousa, Setiz, Hummel, Althouse and others; Allentown Band, Albertus L. Myers conducting (W. F. B.). The Allentown Band, founded in 1828, is said to be the nation's oldest. It played for Presidents William Henry Harrison in 1836, Martin Van Buren in 1839, and, to judge from this record, is still going strong.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 3; Ventsislav Yankoff and NWDR Symphony condusted by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (Capitol). A fairly routine performance that does not stack up against previous LP's of the same work by Gilels, Serkin, Backhaus and Wuehrer, to mention but four competing versions.

BRAHMS: Hungarian Dances; Vienna State Opera Orchestra conducted by Mario Rossi (Vanguard). All twenty-one of the dances are presented. Brahms did not orchestrate all of them; the last five were done by Dvorak, and various musicians had a hand in the others. The music is a lot of fun and Rossi conducts it energetically.

FAMOUS CONTINENTAL MARCHES: Band of the Grenadier Guards, conducted by Maj. F. J. Harris (London). Marche Lorraine, Le Regiment de Sambre et Meuse, Under the Double Eagle, With Sword and Lance, etc., played with spirit by an excellent military band.

PICNIC: Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting (R.C.A. Victor). Pleasant music designed, according to the jacket blurb, for outdoor listening on a portable record player. Works heard, including Jalousie, Danube Waves, Malagueña,, Poet and Peasant Overture, etc., are done with the characteristic sparkle of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

TORELLI: Trumpet Concerto; VIVALDI: Concerto in G minor; LOCATELLI: Violin Concerto in C minor; Il Pianto d'Arianna: J. M. Leclair Instrumental Ensemble conducted by Jean-Francois Paillard (Haydn Society). Fine eighteenth-century music. The short Torelli work is spirited, the Vivaldi strong and rhythmic, and Locatelli slender and fluent. Excellent performances and recording.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN-TIMES
Circ. D. 556,985 - S. 573,327

JUL 20 1956

Grant Park Pianist Wins Cheers

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Felix Borowski

One of the most interesting of its concerts this season was offered by the Grand Park Symphony Orchestra Wednesday evening. Nicolai Malko conducted and Ruth Slenczynska was his solo pianist.

While Miss Slenczynska was making her first appearance at the band shell, this was by no means her Chicago debut. She gave a piano recital at the age of 8, and as late as last season performed the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff (one of her teachers) with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

There can be no doubt of this artist's great talent, her astonishing command of the piano keyboard, her musical sensitivity.

In her reading of Chopin's F minor Concerto there were moments in which she reflected the elegance, even the poetic content, of the work.

There were other occasions when the spectacle of the multitude of listeners spread out in front of her apparently persuaded Miss Slenczynska that loud playing would be necessary if Chopin's music were to be put across.

This reviewer does not remember any previous Grant Park pianist who won as much audience success as this one. One encore was not enough for her cheering listeners; two had to be provided — on each occasion a virtuoso Etude by Chopin, performed with extraordinary brilliance.

Malko opened his program with Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque, originally composed as a piano piece, but scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. Its buoyant vitality made the music ideal as a curtain raiser.

Following the piece, there was presented Basil Kalinnikov's First Symphony. Composed more than 60 years ago, the score sounds somewhat dated; yet its Russian character, effective scoring, added to an excellent performance made pleasant listening.

The concert ended with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," but Malko added two extra pieces — the Elegie written by Massenet as part of his incidental music for Lecomte de Lisle's tragedy, "Les Erinnyes," the violoncello solo beautifully played by Leopold Teraspulsky. Also there was heard the Waltz from the last act of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Eugene Onegin."

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

JUL 21 1956

KEY WOULD BE VERY MAD, TOO

NEW YORK—Even in this materialistic age, patriotism stirs the hearts of many—particularly J. E. Johnson, a record dealer in Greenville, N. C.

Last week Johnson wrote a vitriolic letter to the Southern Radio Corporation, of Charlotte, N. C., complaining that he could not get records of the "Star-Spangled Banner" either by the RCA Band or the Boston Pops. He was told the disks are no longer available. Johnson's letter said:

"Do you mean to tell us that a company as large as RCA would not press and keep in stock our National Anthem. . . . That is about the damndest thing we have ever heard . . . a company in the music business which can't supply our National Anthem!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Post
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Democrat
Circ. 216,173

JUL 29 1956

ESPLANADE CONCERTS OPEN TOMORROW

The Esplanade concerts by members of the Boston Symphony will open tomorrow night. These open-air performances under the direction of Arthur Fiedler will be held nightly for the next two weeks.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BARRE, Vt.
Republican
Circ. 8,248

JUL 25 1956

Moyse Trio, At Marlboro, Booms Music Appreciation In Brattleboro Region

By VICTOR HARRISON
Of The Brattleboro Reformer
(For The Associated Press)

BRATTLEBORO, Vt. (AP)—From the time the Moyse trio came to Brattleboro over seven years ago to establish a music department at nearby Marlboro College, the appreciation of good music has boomed in this section of the Green Mountain State.

In this community of some 13,000 music fills the air.

Day in and day out Marcel Moyse, world famous flutist, with his son, Louis, and Louis' wife, the former Blanche Honneger, work to create a complete musical life in the community. That they have succeeded is brought out by the large audiences that attend their concerts and the many who take lessons on almost any instrument they can name.

Louis plays the piano and flute principally, and Blanche, the violin and viola.

Why should this family spend its time in Vermont when it could tour the country earning large fees as concert artists? Blanche Moyse says they wanted the simple, happy country life. Vermont offered them a haven from the rigors of fleeing from the Nazis in war-ravaged France and from the hopping about from one concert to another in South America.

Rudolf Serkin, the pianist, is also a Vermonter by adoption. He lives in Guilford, seven miles from Brattleboro, and spends his days between concert tours working on his farm. His love of the country and the "simple, happy life" brought him here, too, and made him talk about it to his close friends, the Moyse family.

The real start of the Moyse family story goes back to when Serkin was 20 and was courting Adolf Busch's daughter, Irene. He met Blanche Honneger, one of Busch's more promising pupils, and started a friendship that has brought good music to Vermont. Serkin married Irene and they settled in Guilford and, with the Moyses, started the Marlboro School of Music.

Blanche Honneger went to Paris to study medicine in the belief she could fit it in with a musical education. But, after two years study at the Sorbonne, she realized that both medicine and music are full time jobs. She had met Moyses and had played with them, and finally decided 30 years ago that music was for her.

In 1939 the Moyse trio was formed and rose to great popularity in France. They played many concerts with Serkin and Busch and their fame spread throughout Europe.

But war intervened. On Sept. 1, 1939, Louis and Marcel Moyse Moyse were about to leave for a year's engagement with the Boston Symphony. An hour before they were to leave Paris Louis was ordered to report to his regiment. So, instead of going to America he went to war. And instead of being away from Blanche for a year he married her. That was on Nov. 9, 1939.

The war was a great trial to the Moyses, as it was to millions of others in flaming Europe. In 1940 the twins, Michel and Claude, were born and the family had to hide often from the occupying Nazi forces.

At the war's end Louis came home and the trio regrouped. They returned to Paris in 1945 but found life hard; the atmosphere was oppressive and, as they put it, "nothing was solved." There was still a family to support and by then there was a third child, Isabelle, born two years after the twins.

The relaxation of country life beckoned and they, along with Mrs. Marcel Moyse, left for South America. In 1948 they went to Argentina where, again with Serkin and Busch, they gave many concerts. The next year they returned to Europe but by then Serkin had found his Vermont home and he urged them to try life in the Green Mountains. In 1949 they came to Brattleboro.

With Serkin and Busch, they opened the music department at Marlboro College.

Encouraged by their success with the school, they established the Brattleboro Music Center that enrolled 200 members the first year and has since grown to 500. Serkin says of it, "in the short time since its founding, the Brattleboro Music Center has accomplished so much for music in this community that one can feel only admiration and appreciation for its good works."

Dorothy Canfield Fisher, herself a resident of nearby Arlington, remarks that "Vermonters could not possibly do anything more useful to help along the raising of the plane of musical culture of our area than to back up with enthusiasm the first-rate creatively musical work done by the Brattleboro Music Center."

Today the music center is a year-round proposition with chamber music concerts all winter and a 65-piece symphony festival at the end of the season with artists from all parts of the east.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
Circ. D. 412,167 - S. 808,669

JUL 22 1956

Markevitch to Debut at Bowl

Coast Newcomer to Conduct Philharmonic Next Tuesday

Igor Markevitch will make his first appearance in Hollywood Bowl Tuesday night as guest conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. He will also conduct the Thursday concert.

The composer-conductor is a newcomer to the West Coast. Last year he made his North American debut in Montreal and afterward conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Born in Kiev in 1912, the young Markevitch was taken in 1917 by his father to reside in Switzerland. Most of the youth's education was obtained in Paris.

For his first concert Markevitch will conduct Britten's Variations on a Theme by Purcell and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, "Pathetique," Opus 74.

LEONTYNE PRICE
Bowl Soloist

Viennese Pianist

Paul Badura-Skoda, 26-year-old Viennese pianist, will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in E Flat Major.

Badura-Skoda made his American debut four years ago. He has appeared with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and is on his third tour of North America.

Markevitch's program for Thursday night will include Mozart's Symphony No. 38 in D Major, "Prague," and Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the Ravel orchestration.

The soloist will be Leontyne Price, American soprano, who was heard at the Bowl last year.

Arias Scheduled

She will sing arias from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and Verdi's "La Forza del Destino."

The third pop concert of the season Saturday night will consist of George Gershwin music conducted by Paul Whiteman. Andre Previn, pianist, and Shirley Harmer, soprano, will be the soloists.

Previn will play the Concerto in F and the "Rhapsody in Blue."

BLANK PAGE

120

BLANK PAGE

121

BLANK PAGE

122

107

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

124

125

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

SEP 30 1956

This Week in Society

By ALISON ARNOLD

BOSTON SOCIETY will start its busy fall schedule this week. Tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, the U. S. Navy Band will give a concert to benefit the Building Fund of the Museum of Science. This will be the only Boston concert of the band this year and the list of sponsors reads like the Social Register. Those who aren't at Symphony Hall will be at the Plymouth Theatre for the opening of the 1956-57 season of the Theater Guild and American Theatre Society series. Maurice Evans will present a new production of George Bernard Shaw's "The Apple Cart," and the familiar Theatre Guild first night audience will be there in full force.

* * *

THE GALA OPENING of the Royal Danish Ballet will fill the Opera House Wednesday evening. This eagerly anticipated and much publicized affair will benefit the scholarship fund for drama and music students of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts. Many foreign dignitaries will attend and there'll be dinner parties galore earlier in the evening.

* * *

A FASHION LUNCHEON will lure many to the Louis XIV ballroom of the Hotel Somerset, Thursday. This event will help to raise funds for a new gymnasium building at the Newton Country Day School of the Sacred Heart. Thursday afternoon, there'll be a tea at the Boston Branch of the English-Speaking Union at 44 Commonwealth Avenue. Dr. Robert Birley, headmaster of Eton College, and Mrs. Birley will be the guests of honor.

* * *

THE FIRST FRIDAY SYMPHONY concert will open the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, after its travels in Europe. Subscribers will fill Symphony Hall to welcome their beloved orchestra and its conductor. From now on until late spring, luncheon will be early and tea late on Friday afternoons and no social events will be scheduled to interfere with the weekly concerts.

THE BULLETIN
SEPT. 27.

The Philadelphia Scene

By RUTH SELTZER

AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC'S centennial-launching cocktail party, it was good to see Eugene and Gretel Ormandy, home from a summer in California.

Mrs. Ormandy looked chic and svelte—in fact, very Hollywoody.

The Ormandys, who usually vacation in Switzerland, went to the west coast this time. Maestro Ormandy opened the Hollywood Bowl season and remained in L. A. for relaxation and study. He, too, looks fine—ruddy and refreshed for a busy season ahead.

Inspired and inspiring at the Academy of Music's 1857-flavored party: Philip Johnson, the architect who will return the now dreadfully-dilapidated Academy of Music to the "world's finest concert hall." What Ormandy is to music, Philip Johnson is to architecture—a celebrated master.

Mr. Johnson, who lives in a modern glass house in New Canaan, Conn., designed the Museum of Modern Art Pavillion in New York; the new bronze and glass Seagram Building on Park av.

A highly eligible bachelor, the very contemporary Mr. Johnson, says: "I've fallen in love with the Grand Old Lady of Broad st."

He has great respect for her; is thrilled at the chance to dress her with elegance. Together Philip Johnson and the Old Lady will walk down the avenue of history.

Tuesday was Johnson's sixth visit to the Academy of Music. It was the first meeting of the architect and the Philadelphia Orchestra's conductor.

Said Mr. Johnson to Mr. Ormandy: "What are the MUSTS?"

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
Circ. D. 138,887
SEP 15 1956

John F. Puskas and Louise Conaty make enamel bowls in his E. 73rd Street studio.

Boston Symphony to Offer Music of Bach, Debussy

By ETHEL BOROS

When the globe-trotting Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the truly great musical organizations of our time, comes to Music Hall on Oct. 19, it will mark one of the high spots of the new season of concerts offered by G. Bernardi, manager of the Cleveland Opera Association.

Charles Munch will direct the Boston Symphony in the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" or "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and Tschaikovsky's Sixth or "Pathetique" Symphony.

This will be the first visit of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland in 12 years, and it was at the instigation of William M. Martin, manager of the Cleveland Orchestra that concert date was arranged.

Bernardi's concevrt series is internationally flavored English, Irish, Yugoslav, French, Italian, German, Austrian, Russian and Spanish music and musicians take part.

BESIDES MAJOR CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL, there will be "little concerts" in Cleveland Heights such as the First Piano Quartet on March 24.

Three ballet companies will take part in seven of the dance programs offered. The Ballet Russe De Monte Carlo will appear Nov. 2 and 3. This American dance company with such fine young soloists as Yvonne Chouteau, will offer both classical and contemporary ballet.

On March 9 and 10 Ballet Theatre comes to town with such stars as Nora Kaye and John Kriza. Ruth Page's Chicago Opera ballet company will be held Sunday, Dec. 2, with Marjorie Tallchief and George Skibine. They will appear in two original ballets, "The Merry Widow," and "Revenge," the latter adapted from "Il Trovatore."

Carmen Amaya, fiery Spanish dancer appears with her company of singers and dancers on Oct. 13 at Heights High School Auditorium, and WHK Studio One on October 14.

The Yugoslav State Company, the "Kolo" from Belgrade, brihgs 55 singers, dancers and musicians on Oct. 20 and 21 to present a "Slavonic Rhapsody."

FRANCE CONTRIBUTES ITS "Ballets Basque Biarritz" on March 30. The Don Cossack Choir and Dancers, noted for their precision and infectious spirit present a program of Russian songs and dances on Feb. 24.

The middlebrow appeal and popularity of Mantovani's "cascading violins" has caused Bernardi to open his concert series on Oct. 7 with a repeat engagement of the British orchestra leader for two concerts, at 8 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. in Masonic Hall.

Hoping to repeat the great success of the Scots Guards of last season, the Carabinieri Band of Rome has been engaged for a Nov. 18 appearance at the Arena.

The NBC Opera Company will present its popular TV stars in "Madame Butterfly" and "Marriage of Figaro" on Nov. 23 and 24 in Music Hall. The De Paur Opera Gala under the direction of Leonard De Paur will offer excerpts from three Broadway operatic hits, featuring baritone Lawrence Winters on March 23.

FRENCH AND IRISH ORPHANS figure in two vocal concerts. The Little Gaelic Singers will present a song and dance program on Dec. 7 in Music Hall.

The Little Singers of Paris appear in Wiley High School Auditorium on Feb. 9 with a repertoire of Renaissance and pre-Renaissance polyphonic music as well as modern music.

Last but hardly least are the concerts by Viennese soprano Elizabeth Schwarzkopf of Dec. 1 and The Vienna Philharmonic Symphony, under the baton of Carl Schuricht, on Nov. 10.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
Circ. D. 77,057
SEP 27 1956

Symphony Club Cites Program

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it is in Columbus Oct. 18, at 8:30 p. m. in the new Veterans' Memorial, has been announced by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, the orchestra's local sponsor.

UNDER the baton of Charles Munch, musical director, the program will open with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist of the Boston Orchestra, will be soloist. Claude Debussy's "Iberia" follows and the concert will conclude with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique."

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
SEP 15 1956

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will begin rehearsals on Tuesday, Oct. 2. The opening concerts of its 76th season, and Mr. Munch's eighth as conductor, will be given at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 5 and 6. The program will be repeated on Oct. 9 for the opening of the Tuesday evening series.

The program will include the Weber Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna—his first appearance in this country—as soloist, and the "Eroica" symphony.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
Circ. D. 123,904 - S. 176,679
SEP 24 1956

8:15 P. M. NBC-RADIO — Selections from the Boston Sympohny orchestra's recent opening concert in Moscow will be presented by delayed recording. The orchestra will play the first, third and fourth movements of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. In a continuation of the program at 9:30 p. m., the orchestra will offer portions of Haydn's Symphony No. 102, Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6 and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Ballet Suite No. 2.

WASHINGTON D. C.
POST & TIMES HERALD
SEP 26 1956

Howard Mitchell Cited Third Time

Howard Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the National Music Council's Conductor's Citation for the third time, Edwin Hughes, executive secretary of the Council, announced yesterday.

Hughes said the citation was made for "the number and fine quality of orchestral compositions by American-born composers" Mitchell presented last season. Mitchell previously won the award for the seasons of 1952-53 and 1954-55.

No other recipient has won the citation more than once. Other winners include Leopold Stokowski, Charles Munch and Eugene Ormandy.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
SEP 29 1956

Symphony Season Opens Next Week

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra reassembles in Symphony Hall next week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season, which opens with concerts next Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, at 2:15 p.m., and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. The Tuesday Evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9. A few subscriptions are still available for the Orchestra's series of six Sunday afternoon concerts. Information may be obtained from the Subscription Office at Symphony Hall.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
Circ. D. 138,887
SEP 15 1956

John F. Puskas and Louise Conaty make enamel bowls, in his E. 73rd Street studio.

Boston Symphony to Offer Music of Bach, Debussy

By ETHEL BOROS

When the globe-trotting Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the truly great musical organizations of our time, comes to Music Hall on Oct. 19, it will mark one of the high spots of the new season of concerts offered by G. Bernardi, manager of the Cleveland Opera Association.

Charles Munch will direct the Boston Symphony in the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" or "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and Tschaikovsky's Sixth or "Pathetique" Symphony.

This will be the first visit of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland in 12 years, and it was at the instigation of William M. Martin, manager of the Cleveland Orchestra that concert date was arranged.

Bernardi's concevrt series is internationally flavored English, Irish, Yugoslav, French, Italian, German, Austrian, Russian and Spanish music and musicians take part.

BESIDES MAJOR CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL, there will be "little concerts" in Cleveland Heights such as the First Piano Quartet on March 24.

Three ballet companies will take part in seven of the dance programs offered. The Ballet Russe De Monte Carlo will appear Nov. 2 and 3. This American dance company with such fine young soloists as Yvonne Chouteau, will offer both classical and contemporary ballet.

On March 9 and 10 Ballet Theatre comes to town with such stars as Nora Kaye and John Kriza. Ruth Page's Chicago Opera ballet company will be held Sunday, Dec. 2, with Marjorie Tallchief and George Skibine. They will appear in two original ballets, "The Merry Widow," and "Revenge," the latter adapted from "Il Trovatore."

Carmen Amaya, fiery Spanish dancer appears with her company of singers and dancers on Oct. 13 at Heights High School Auditorium, and WHK Studio One on October 14.

The Yugoslav State Company, the "Kolo" from Belgrade, brings 55 singers, dancers and musicians on Oct. 20 and 21 to present a "Slavonic Rhapsody."

FRANCE CONTRIBUTES ITS "Ballets Basque Biarritz" on March 30. The Don Cossack Choir and Dancers, noted for their precision and infectious spirit present a program of Russian songs and dances on Feb. 24.

The middlebrow appeal and popularity of Mantovani's "cascading violins" has caused Bernardi to open his concert series on Oct. 7 with a repeat engagement of the British orchestra leader for two concerts, at 3 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. in Masonic Hall.

Hoping to repeat the great success of the Scots Guards of last season, the Carabinieri Band of Rome has been engaged for a Nov. 18 appearance at the Arena.

The NBC Opera Company will present its popular TV stars in "Madame Butterfly" and "Marriage of Figaro" on Nov. 23 and 24 in Music Hall. The De Paur Opera Gala under the direction of Leonard De Paur will offer excerpts from three Broadway operatic hits, featuring baritone Lawrence Winters on March 23.

FRENCH AND IRISH ORPHANS figure in two vocal concerts. The Little Gaelic Singers will present a song and dance program on Dec. 7 in Music Hall.

The Little Singers of Paris appear in Wiley High School Auditorium on Feb. 9 with a repertoire of Renaissance and pre-Renaissance polyphonic music as well as modern music.

Last but hardly least are the concerts by Viennese soprano Elizabeth Schwarzkopf of Dec. 1 and The Vienna Philharmonic Symphony, under the baton of Carl Schuricht, on Nov. 10.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
Circ. D. 77,057
SEP 27 1956

Symphony Club Cites Program

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it is in Columbus Oct. 18, at 8:30 p. m. in the new Veterans Memorial, has been announced by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, the orchestra's local sponsor.

UNDER the baton of Charles Munch, musical director, the program will open with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist of the Boston Orchestra, will be soloist. Claude Debussy's "Iberia" follows and the concert will conclude with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique."

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
SEP 15 1956

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will begin rehearsals on Tuesday, Oct. 2. The opening concerts of its 76th season, and Mr. Munch's eighth as conductor, will be given at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 5 and 6. The program will be repeated on Oct. 9 for the opening of the Tuesday evening series.

The program will include the Weber Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna—his first appearance in this country—as soloist, and the "Eroica" symphony.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
Circ. D. 123,904 · S. 176,679
SEP 24 1956

8:15 P. M. NBC-RADIO — Selections from the Boston Symphony orchestra's recent opening concert in Moscow will be presented by delayed recording. The orchestra will play the first, third and fourth movements of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. In a continuation of the program at 9:30 p. m., the orchestra will offer portions of Haydn's Symphony No. 102, Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6 and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Ballet Suite No. 2.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST & TIMES HERALD
SEP 28 1956

Howard Mitchell Cited Third Time

Howard Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the National Music Council's Conductor's Citation for the third time, Edwin Hughes, executive secretary of the Council, announced yesterday.

Hughes said the citation was made for "the number and fine quality of orchestral compositions by American-born composers" Mitchell presented last season. Mitchell previously won the award for the seasons of 1952-53 and 1954-55.

No other recipient has won the citation more than once. Other winners include Leopold Stokowski, Charles Munch and Eugene Ormandy.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
SEP 23 1956

Symphony Season Opens Next Week

Fresh from its resounding successful 28-concert European tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra reassembles in Symphony Hall next week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season, which opens with concerts next Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, at 2:15 p.m., and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. The Tuesday Evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9. A few subscriptions are still available for the Orchestra's series of six Sunday afternoon concerts. Information may be obtained from the Subscription Office at Symphony Hall.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 29 1956

Recordings Reports I: Orchestral LPs

WORK, PERFORMER, DATA	REPORT
Beethoven: Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor"). Robert Casadesus, piano, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Columbia ML 5100, $3.98.	Casadesus is attuned in heart and mind to the spirit of the work and its technical problems hold no terrors for him. Less suitable, however, is his tonal production, which is a little light and brittle for full justice (such as Backhaus provides) to the "Emperor." This is not alleviated by the dry sound of the recording, made in Paris during the Philharmonic's tour last year.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LM 1997, $3.98.	Some fine orchestral performance distinguishes this well recorded disc, which is otherwise erratic in tempi and lacking the repose required for the more reflective phases of the score. No one could question Munch's affection for the work, but impulse too often takes precedence over a well-ordered plan of interpretation. It leaves the Toscanini as the most eloquent of all, the Kleiber (made in Amsterdam) as the best-sounding.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 29 1956

THE OTHER SIDE

CASALS IN SWITZERLAND, LPs IN ENGLAND

ANYONE who has ever been to Glyndebourne is likely to agree with the view that a setting of great natural beauty is apt to enhance the pleasure to be derived from a musical performance. Yet there is a limit beyond which art and nature no longer collaborate to undermine our critical faculties, but compete for separate recognition. Such is the case at Zermatt, the famous mountaineering center in the Swiss Canton of Wallis (or Valais) where, for the past five years, a miniature music festival has taken place during late August to early September. The official title is "Zermatter Meisterkurse für Musik," and the instrumental and chamber-music classes attract many gifted young players from Europe and America. There are some concerts too —this year's performers have included Maria Stader, Szigeti, Horszowski and the Vegh Quartet—but it is the presence of Pablo Casals, both as patron and as teacher, that distinguishes this gathering from many another summer school.

Although it is a cloudless morning —nature must needs take a back-seat as we settle down for a three-hour session in the lounge of the Hotel Cervin. There is a small platform and, opposite it, at a table covered with music, paper and ashtrays, sits the master in his shirtsleeves, fingering the inevitable curved pipe. The pupils, gifted young artists from France, Spain, Switzerland, the U.S.A., and England, in turn mount the platform and perform their chosen pieces (mostly movements from the Bach Suites). At first Casals quietly criticizes the performance in French or English, but, as his absorption in the session grows he begins to sing, to conduct, to tap his foot and, finally, reaches for his own instrument in order to illustrate his points in the way he knows best. I had not seen Casals since his memorable visits to London just after the end of the war and the astonishing fact is that he appears more youthful now than ten years ago. Such is the vitality not only of his playing but of his whole manner of speech and gesture, that the imminent approach of his eightieth birthday (on December 29) seems utterly unbelievable. After three hours of ceaseless activity he appeared as fresh as anyone present and his playing, even from a purely technical point of view, suggests a man in the prime of life.

Back in London I found a huge pile of new LP issues, especially from EMI who seem determined to make up for their two months' self-imposed abstinence. HMV's decision to launch a "Golden Treasury of Immortal Performances" along RCA Victor lines is particularly interesting at this juncture—coming, as it does, only eight months before the date fixed for the final break between the two companies—although I doubt the wisdom of making these discs slightly more expensive (42s.6d. including tax) than normal celebrity issues. First to appear in this series is the five-volume anthology "Fifty Years of Great Operatic Singing," edited by Irving Kolodin, together with the Horowitz/Toscanini version of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto and a Kreisler recital devoted to his own compositions and arrangements. Oddly enough, a disc of McCormack favorites ("I hear you calling me," "I'll walk beside you," etc.) does not qualify for inclusion in the "Golden Treasury" but appears among the normal issues.

Other Victor recordings to be found in HMV's September list include Saint-Saëns's Third Symphony conducted by Toscanini, the splendid "Daphnis and Chloe" of Münch and the Boston Symphony, the recent Berlioz/Debussy coupling starring Victoria de los Angeles, the streamlined "Emperor" Concerto of Horowitz and Reiner, and a pair of equally streamlined Mozart Sonatas played by Heifetz.

From nearer home we have a lyrical account of Brahms's Third Symphony (Philharmonia under Cantelli); Dvorak's charming Symphonic Variations coupled with Tchaikovsky's well-known set from Suite No. 3 (Sargent and Philharmonia); Borodin's second and third Symphonies (Malko), Tchaikovsky's "Sleeping Princess" in its entirety, as performed by Series," offering such first-rate fare as Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony (van Beinum and Concertgebouw), Ravel's "Bolero" and "La Valse" (Philadelphia/Ormandy), two Concerti Grossi by Corelli (I Musici) and arias from "Freischütz," "Oberon" as well as "Ah, Perfido!" (Gre Brouwenstijn). Clearly the competition between our big companies is becoming far more intense than ever before now that the basic demands of a standard LP repertoire have been satisfied, and it will be interesting to see how the wider public reacts to the blandishments offered by the rival manufacturers. —THOMAS HEINITZ.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

SEP 30 1956

Symphony Opens 76th Boston Season Friday

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour which ended with a triumph in London last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra re-assembles in Symphony Hall this week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season which will begin with concerts this Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will then begin his eighth season as conductor. The Tuesday evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9.

The program for all three concerts will be the same. To begin, Dr. Munch has chosen the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert as the orchestra's music director in October, 1949: the Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber. Then will come the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut as soloist. After the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominetly in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
Circ. S. 317,397

SEP 30 1956

Boston Symphony On Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, will be heard in a performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" on WBAL tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. The program was recorded earlier at a concert in Munich, Germany, where the orchestra played as part of its current European tour.

This will be the last in a series of three special programs of recorded highlights from the orchestra's widely-hailed tour of major European cities. Selections from concerts in Moscow and Edinburgh were broadcast previously.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366

SEP 30 1956

Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Bach On Program

The opening concert of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio's series on Oct. 18 in the Veterans Memorial will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. They will feature Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," first performed in 1893 in St. Petersburgh (now Leningrad), the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two triumphant concerts early this month.

Featured also will be Bach's Suite No. 2, for Flute and Strings with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist, as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is the first musician of her sex to be engaged as a principal in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Debussy's "Iberia" completes the program.

Tickets for the Oct. 18 concert are to be had at Heaton's and Zeisler's.

Well Played, Boston!

Philadelphians who are music-lovers, and even those who don't know an oboe from a French horn, are entitled to a wistful sigh as they read of the Boston Symphony's triumphs in Europe.

The orchestra, under the batons of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, has just concluded a tour which took it to 19 cities in 13 countries, including Russia. It has been hailed as "the most effective American diplomatic team ever sent to Europe." Even Moscow critics were enraptured by its "masterly virtuosity" and the "rare beauty" of its tone.

The praise is richly deserved, for the Boston is a fine orchestra.

But Philadelphia, as everyone knows, has a better one, and it is a pity that Europe didn't see America's best. A double pity, because the Philadelphia Orchestra was invited to make this cultural mission, and got itself entangled in a silly dispute between players and management that had nothing to do with the trip.

So it is Boston that has won world fame as the home of fine music in America. It comes hard to say it, but: Hearty congratulations, Boston!

BULLETIN – SEPT. 8th
Cocktails + dinner at Bergets
last SUN. PLUS RITA + Vic
TOM, ELEANOR + DON, MUCH FUN

rts I: Orchestral LPs

REPORT

t and mind to the spirit of the work and its technical problems hold le, however, is his tonal production, which is a little light and brittle aus provides) to the "Emperor." This is not alleviated by the dry n Paris during the Philharmonic's tour last year.

distinguishes this well recorded disc, which is otherwise erratic uired for the more reflective phases of the score. No one could work, but impulse too often takes precedence over a well- ves the Toscanini as the most eloquent of all, the Kleiber nding.

Ballet (though comparable with the work as it is known in Russia, where it is about twice as long!), admirably played by the Covent Garden Orchestra under Robert Irving and brilliantly recorded; a lively, if patchy disc by Moiseiwitsch, coupling some Chopin pieces with Rachmaninoff's "Paganini Rhapsody"; Mozart's Concerto in C minor, K.491, played in forceful, very masculine fashion by Gina Bachauer; Paul Tortelier, in a program embracing the Saint-Saëns A minor Concerto, Tchaikovsky's "Rococo Variations," and Faure's Elegie," again proves himself one of the outstanding cellists of the postwar generation.

AMONG HMV's discs of chamber and instrumental music, I would pick out yet another little concert by the Virtuosi di Roma for the sake of the delightful music—three concertos by Vivaldi and one each by A. Scarlatti and Valentini—and the consummate playing, despite such powerful attractions as the Franck Sonata, played by Menuhin and Kentner, and Solomon's account of the "Hammerklavier" Sonata (which in the USA has not only long been issued but already deleted!).

Opera is represented by Boito's "Mefistofele," a somewhat abbreviated performance—Act 4 is entirely omitted and there are other, less drastic cuts—starring Boris Christoff, who gives his usual excellent likeness of Chaliapin and is well supported by Giacinto Prandelli, as Faust, and the comparatively unfamiliar soprano, Orietta Moscucci, as Marguerite, with Gui conducting Orchestra and Chorus of the Rome Opera. Although the Prologue sounds tame when compared with Toscanini's performance, and Christoff is apt to overact, this is, on the whole, a very successful set and the two discs contain as much of the opera as most of us will want to hear.

A few months ago, our Royal Festival Hall was filled to capacity for a late-night performance of Stravinsky's "The Soldier's Tale," thanks no doubt to the participation of Sir Ralph Richardson (soldier) and Peter Ustinov (devil). It was London's first opportunity of hearing the brilliant new translation of Ramuz's text by Kitty Black and Michael Flanders (who took the part of the narrator), a version which had been performed at the 1954 Edinburgh Festival by Robert Helpman, Terence Longdon, Anthony Nicholls and members of the Glyndebourne (alias Royal Philharmonic) Orchestra under John Pritchard. HMV has now released an excellent recording of the Edinburgh performance, which should do much to popularize a work which must surely rank among Stravinsky's most brilliant and characteristic achievements.

Philips has been making great efforts of late to capture an important sector of the "classical" market, and this company's policy of offering excellent value for money should win it many adherents. A year ago, when most of its rivals put up their prices, Philips refused to follow suit and since then many performances by top-line artists have appeared in its cheaper, green-label series. Now it has launched a new, still cheaper, ten-inch label, entitled "Favorite Music Series," offering such first-rate fare as Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony (van Beinum and Concertgebouw), Ravel's "Bolero" and "La Valse" (Philadelphia/Ormandy), two Concerti Grossi by Corelli (I Musici) and arias from "Freischütz," "Oberon" as well as "Ah, Perfido!" (Gre Brouwenstijn). Clearly the competition between our big companies is becoming far more intense than ever before now that the basic demands of a standard LP repertoire have been satisfied, and it will be interesting to see how the wider public reacts to the blandishments offered by the rival manufacturers. —THOMAS HEINITZ.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

SEP 30 1956

Symphony Opens 76th Boston Season Friday

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour which ended with a triumph in London last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra re-assembles in Symphony Hall this week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season which will begin with concerts this Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will then begin his eighth season as conductor. The Tuesday evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9.

The programs for all three concerts will be the same. To begin, Dr. Munch has chosen the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert as the orchestra's music director in October, 1949: the Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber. Then will come the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut as soloist. After the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominetly in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
Circ. S. 317,397

SEP 30 1956

Boston Symphony On Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, will be heard in a performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" on WBAL tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. The program was recorded earlier at a concert in Munich, Germany, where the orchestra played as part of its current European tour.

This will be the last in a series of three special programs of recorded highlights from the orchestra's widely-hailed tour of major European cities. Selections from concerts in Moscow and Edinburgh were broadcast previously.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

SEP 19 1956

West End Far From Ghost Town

To the Editor—The West End is far from being a ghost town. We in the project area—threatened with destruction in the name of "Urban Redevelopment"—are a thriving community. Hardworking people who love our homes and neighbors. We are united in fighting this mass deportation from an area in which families have lived for a lifetime.

True, we are a bit shabby, perhaps even run-down in certain areas, but only because our city has allowed it to become so.

To repeat what has been said many times before: For years our West End leaders have fought to use money left in trust for this purpose: To better the river area. Today, we have a magnificent concert shell where visitors from everywhere gather to enjoy the beautiful music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Today, our boys and their fathers—can enjoy the good softball field.

Today, we have our playgrounds, wading and swimming pools, the sailing which has been developed into a sport far surpassing anything of its kind in the whole country, the Science Museum, and, for others, their place in the sun, cooled by breezes that blow across the Charles, a place near home, a place that becomes, in fact, that Summer home in the country for many of us.

Yes, we helped build these recreational advantages, and, as Americans, living in a free country, we will fight with everything in our power to keep them for a free West End.

WANDA ZACHEWICZ.

Boston.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366

SEP 30 1956

Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Bach On Program

The opening concert of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio's series on Oct. 18 in the Veterans Memorial will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. They will feature Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," first performed in 1893 in St. Petersburgh (now Leningrad), the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two triumphant concerts early this month.

Featured also will be Bach's Suite No. 2, for Flute and Strings with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist, as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is the first musician of her sex to be engaged as a principal in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Debussy's "Iberia" completes the program.

Tickets for the Oct. 18 concert are to be had at Heaton's and Zeisler's.

Well Played, Boston!

Philadelphians who are music-lovers, and even those who don't know an oboe from a French horn, are entitled to a wistful sigh as they read of the Boston Symphony's triumphs in Europe.

The orchestra, under the batons of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, has just concluded a tour which took it to 19 cities in 13 countries, including Russia. It has been hailed as "the most effective American diplomatic team ever sent to Europe." Even Moscow critics were enraptured by its "masterly virtuosity" and the "rare beauty" of its tone.

The praise is richly deserved, for the Boston is a fine orchestra.

But Philadelphia, as everyone knows, has a better one, and it is a pity that Europe didn't see America's best. A double pity, because the Philadelphia Orchestra was invited to make this cultural mission, and got itself entangled in a silly dispute between players and management that had nothing to do with the trip.

So it is Boston that has won world fame as the home of fine music in America. It comes hard to say it, but: Hearty congratulations, Boston!

BULLETIN – SEPT. 8th
Cocktails + dinner at Rangate
last SUN. PLUS RITA + VIC
TOM, ELEANOR + DON. MUCH FUN

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 29 1956

Recordings Reports I: Orchestral LPs

WORK, PERFORMER, DATA	REPORT
Beethoven: Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor"). Robert Casadesus, piano, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Columbia ML 5100, $3.98.	Casadesus is attuned in heart and mind to the spirit of the work and its technical problems hold no terrors for him. Less suitable, however, is his tonal production, which is a little light and brittle for full justice (such as Backhaus provides) to the "Emperor." This is not alleviated by the dry sound of the recording, made in Paris during the Philharmonic's tour last year.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LM 1997, $3.98.	Some fine orchestral performance distinguishes this well recorded disc, which is otherwise erratic in tempi and lacking the repose required for the more reflective phases of the score. No one could question Munch's affection for the work, but impulse too often takes precedence over a well-ordered plan of interpretation. It leaves the Toscanini as the most eloquent of all, the Kleiber (made in Amsterdam) as the best-sounding.

DAY REVIEW
YORK, N. Y.
9 1956

ophonic tape player, and Dynacord professional tape recorder. 347.
KERING AND COMPANY. Magnetic ograph pickups, cartridges, equal- preamps and "Isophase" elec- speakers. 339.
O CORP. New line of tuners, d console phonographs phonograph for quality 4, 445.
CORP. New economy turntable, play- ight hours of erse. 307.
ity speak- 316.
FM- ys-ring top stars.

dney Bechet.
l. 12" Long

Sonic speakers, closures and encl components in re also high fidelity com seven models. 640 (u ponents).
STROMBERG CARLSON
TANNOY (AMERICA), LTD. enclosures, amplifiers, ca Tannoy Dual Concentric new two-way form. Also unit. 522.
TETRAD CORPORATION. Diam wear-test demonstration, etc.
THORENS COMPANY. Record ch record players, transcription tables with a gear motor. 323.

is" Ballet (though e with the work as Russia, where it is s long!), admirably Covent Garden Or- Robert Irving and bril- ded; a lively, if patchy seiwitsch, coupling some ces with Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody"; Mozart's Con- C minor, K.491, played in very masculine fashion by achauer; Paul Tortelier, in a m embracing the Saint-Saëns nor Concerto, Tchaikovsky's oco Variations," and Faure's El- ," again proves himself one of the standing cellists of the postwar neration.

AMONG HMV's discs of chamber and instrumental music, I would pick out yet another little concert by the Virtuosi di Roma for the sake of the delightful music—three concertos by Vivaldi and one each by A. Scarlatti and Valentini—and the consummate playing, despite such powerful attractions as the Franck Sonata, played by Menuhin and Kentner, and Solomon's account of the "Hammerklavier" Sonata (which in the USA has not only long been issued but already deleted!).

Opera is represented by Boito's "Mefistofele," a somewhat abbreviated performance—Act 4 is entirely omitted and there are other, less drastic cuts—starring Boris Christoff, who gives his usual excellent likeness of Chaliapin and is well supported by Giacinto Prandelli, as Faust, and the comparatively unfamiliar soprano, Orietta Moscucci, as Marguerite, with Gui conducting Orchestra and Chorus of the Rome Opera. Although the Prologue sounds tame when compared with Toscanini's performance, and Christoff is apt to overact, this is, on the whole, a very successful set and the two discs contain as much of the opera as most of us will want to hear.

A few months ago, our Royal Festival Hall was filled to capacity for a late-night performance of Stravinsky's "The Soldier's Tale," thanks no doubt to the participation of Sir Ralph Richardson (soldier) and Peter Ustinov (devil). It was London's first opportunity of hearing the brilliant new translation of Ramuz's text by Kitty Black and Michael Flanders (who took the part of the narrator), a version which had been performed at the 1954 Edinburgh Festival by Robert Helpman, Terence Longdon, Anthony Nicholls and members of the Glyndebourne (alias Royal Philharmonic) Orchestra under John Pritchard. HMV has now released an excellent recording of the Edinburgh performance, which should do much to popularize a work which must surely rank among Stravinsky's most brilliant and characteristic achievements.

Philips has been making great efforts of late to capture an important sector of the "classical" market, and this company's policy of offering excellent value for money should win it many adherents. A year ago, when most of its rivals put up their prices, Philips refused to follow suit and since then many performances by top-line artists have appeared in its cheaper, green-label series. Now it has launched a new, still cheaper, ten-inch label, entitled "Favorite Music Series," offering such first-rate fare as Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony (van Beinum and Concertgebouw), Ravel's "Bolero" and "La Valse" (Philadelphia/Ormandy), two Concerti Grossi by Corelli (I Musici) and arias from "Freischütz," "Oberon" as well as "Ah, Perfido!" (Gre Brouwenstijn). Clearly the competition between our big companies is becoming far more intense than ever before now that the basic demands of a standard LP repertoire have been satisfied, and it will be interesting to see how the wider public reacts to the blandishments offered by the rival manufacturers. —THOMAS HEINITZ.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
SEP 19 1956

West End Far From Ghost Town

To the Editor—The West End is far from being a ghost town. We in the project area—threatened with destruction in the name of "Urban Redevelopment"—are a thriving community. Hardworking people who love our homes and neighbors. We are united in fighting this mass deportation from an area in which families have lived for a lifetime.

True, we are a bit shabby, perhaps even run-down in certain areas, but only because our city has allowed it to become so.

To repeat what has been said many times before: For years our West End leaders have fought to use money left in trust for this purpose: To better the river area. Today, we have a magnificent concert shell where visitors from everywhere gather to enjoy the beautiful music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Today, our boys and their fathers—can enjoy the good softball field.

Today, we have our playgrounds, wading and swimming pools, the sailing which has been developed into a sport far surpassing anything of its kind in the whole country, the Science Museum, and, for others, their place in the sun, cooled by breezes that blow across the Charles, a place near home, a place that becomes, in fact, that Summer home in the country for many of us.

Yes, we helped build these recreational advantages, and, as Americans, living in a free country, we will fight with everything in our power to keep them for a free West End.

WANDA ZACHEWICZ.
Boston.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366
SEP 30 1956

Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Bach On Program

The opening concert of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio's series on Oct. 18 in the Veterans Memorial will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. They will feature Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," first performed in 1893 in St. Petersburgh (now Leningrad), the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two triumphant concerts early this month.

Featured also will be Bach's Suite No. 2, for Flute, and Strings with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist, as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is the first musician of her sex to be engaged as a principal in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Debussy's "Iberia" completes the program.

Tickets for the Oct. 18 concert are to be had at Heaton's and Zeisler's.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604
SEP 30 1956

Symphony Opens 76th Boston Season Friday

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour which ended with a triumph in London last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra re-assembles in Symphony Hall this week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season which will begin with concerts this Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will then begin his eighth season as conductor. The Tuesday evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9.

The program for all three concerts will be the same. To begin, Dr. Munch has chosen the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert as the orchestra's music director in October, 1949: the Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber. Then will come the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut as soloist. After the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominetly in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
Circ. S. 317,397
SEP 30 1956

Boston Symphony On Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, will be heard in a performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" on WBAL tomorrow at 8.15 P. M. The program was recorded earlier at a concert in Munich, Germany, where the orchestra played as part of its current European tour.

This will be the last in a series of three special programs of recorded highlights from the orchestra's widely-hailed tour of major European cities. Selections from concerts in Moscow and Edinburgh were broadcast previously.

Well Played, Boston!

Philadelphians who are music-lovers, and even those who don't know an oboe from a French horn, are entitled to a wistful sigh as they read of the Boston Symphony's triumphs in Europe.

The orchestra, under the batons of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, has just concluded a tour which took it to 19 cities in 13 countries, including Russia. It has been hailed as "the most effective American diplomatic team ever sent to Europe." Even Moscow critics were enraptured by its "masterly virtuosity" and the "rare beauty" of its tone.

The praise is richly deserved, for the Boston is a fine orchestra.

But Philadelphia, as everyone knows, has a better one, and it is a pity that Europe didn't see America's best. A double pity, because the Philadelphia Orchestra was invited to make this cultural mission, and got itself entangled in a silly dispute between players and management that had nothing to do with the trip.

So it is Boston that has won world fame as the home of fine music in America. It comes hard to say it, but: Hearty congratulations, Boston!

BULLETIN – SEPT 28th
Cocktails + dinner at Brights
last SUN. PLUS RITA + VIC
TOM, ELEANOR + DON. MUCH FUN

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
Circ. D. 190,612 - S. 166,660
SEP 30 1956

Mostly About Orchestras

Autumn Winds Blow

Symphony Groups Schedule Fall-Winter Concert Series

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Music Editor

THE CHILL OF AUTUMN has set orchestras jangling throughout the land. A spate of plans and portents descends, by mail and courier, of which we sift the following:

PAUL PARAY and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will open the new $5 million Henry and Edsel Ford Auditorium Thursday evening, Oct. 18. Eighteen Thursday evenings and Friday afternoons are announced. This will be a first season in Detroit for Friday matinees.

There will be a dedication program on this first night—speeches and such—an orchestral program to include a Mass by Mr. Paray, and other matters of the repertoire. Both ceremony and program will be repeated Friday afternoon, Oct. 19.

Two guest conductors are announced—Virgil Thomson, former music critic of the New York Herald Tribune and a composer of some renown, in a performance Feb. 14 of his concerto for flute, strings, harp and percussion. The flutist will be Albert Tipton. The other guest conductor will be Andre Audizel, Nov. 22-23, making his American debut. He is president and conductor of the Concerts Classiques de Marseille.

Oft-told names embellish the list of soloists scattered throughout the season. The list embraces the First Piano Quartet, Oct. 15; Jerome Hines, bass-baritone, Nov. 1-3; the concertmaster, Mischa Mischakoff, violinist, Nov. 15, in the Brahms concerto; Isaac Stern, violinist, but lately quit of Russia, Nov. 29, in the Beethoven concerto; Leon Fleischer, pianist, Dec. 13-14; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan, Dec. 20; Grant Johannesen, pianist, Dec. 27-28; Paul Olefsky, 'cellist, Jan. 10; Zino Francescatti, violinist, Jan. 17-18; three great pianists—Artur Rubinstein, Jan. 24; Myra Hess, Feb. 7-8, and Rudolf Serkin, March 7. And then there will be Edward Druzinsky, harpist, March 15, and Martial Singher, March 28.

The Detroit season will terminate March 29, with a performance of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," in which Mr. Singher will be the soloist.

★ ★ ★

THE VAN LOPIK SERIES in Masonic Auditorium, Detroit, mentions an orchestral fanfare. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes Oct. 16; the Vienna Philharmonic, Nov. 21; the Pittsburgh orchestra, Jan. 21; Cleveland, March 11, and Philadelphia, May 1. Mr. Ormandy and his Philadelphians usually time their ventures into this region with the annual May Festival in Ann Arbor. Other Van Lopik attractions in the same arena: Royal Danish Ballet, Oct. 11-13; Jose Iturbi, pianist, Nov. 2; Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, Dec. 6; Jan Peerce, tenor, Jan. 9; Zinka Milanov, soprano, Feb. 1; Nathan Milstein, violinist, Feb. 22; Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, March 1.

★ ★ ★

THE CHORAL UNION SERIES at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, administered by the indefatigable Charles A. Sink, proposes an alluring roster.

This will be the 78th season of this cultural enterprise, though not under the aegis of Mr. Sink. An Extra Concert Series starts an 11th year Oct. 11.

The season begins Oct. 4 with Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, both from the Bing entourage at the Metropolitan. Here is the announced list: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 15; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Oct. 21; Robert Casadesus, pianist, Nov. 5; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Nov. 20; Artur Rubinstein, pianist, Jan. 14; Vienna Choir Boys, Jan. 20 (2:30 p.m.); Solomon, pianist, [illegible]; Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Feb. [illegible]; Cleveland Orchestra, March 10.

Extra Concert Series: "Mantovani and His New Music," Oct. 11; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 17; Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano, Nov. 14; dePaur Opera Gala, Jan. 10; Boston "Pops" Tour Orchestra, March 3 (2:30 p.m.). All concerts will be in Hill Auditorium.

★ ★ ★

CLEVELAND: George Szell's orchestra begins a 39th season in Severance Hall Thursday and Saturday evenings. Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be offered to subscribers. Guest conductors will be Robert Shaw, the new choral administrator, in the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis," Dec. 13 and 15; in an orchestral program Dec. 20 and 22, including Walter Piston's somewhat controversial sixth symphony; in a concert Feb. 28 and March 2, which favors the Stravinsky Symphony of Psalms and the Hindemith "Mathis der Maler"; the Mexican Carlos Chavez, Dec. 6 and 8; the Brazilian Heitor Villa-Lobos, in a program of his own music, Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, with Felicia Blumenthal, pianist, in the fifth concerto; Igor Markevitch, once a child prodigy pianist, Dec. 27 and 29.

The British pianist, Solomon, will play the second concerto in a Brahms program Jan. 3 and 5. Other soloists: Robert Marcellus, clarinetist, Oct. 11 and 13; Josef Gingold, violinist, Oct. 18 and 20; Leon Fleischer, pianist, Oct. 25 and 27; Margaret Harshaw, soprano, Nov. 1 and 3; Robert Casadesus, pianist, Nov. 8 and 10; Nathan Milstein, violinist, Nov. 15 and 17; Clifford Curzon, pianist, Nov. 22 and 24; Mr. Gingold and Anshel Brusilow, violinists, in the Vivaldi double concerto, Dec. 6 and 8; Mack Harrell, baritone; Adele Addison, soprano; Walter Fredericks, tenor, Dec. 13 and 15; Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin, duo-pianists, Jan. 24 and 26; Henryk Szeryng, violinist, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1; Rudolf Serkin, Feb. 21 and 23; Marie Simmelink-Kraft, soprano and Mr. Brusilow, March 7 and 9; Zino Francescatti, violinist, March 21 and 23; the recalcitrant Glenn Gould, Canadian pianist, March 28 and 29; Farrell, Rankin, Tucker and Moscona, with the chorus, in Verdi's "Requiem," April 4 and 6; Gary Graffman, pianist, April 11 and 13.

★ ★ ★

CHICAGO: Fritz Reiner starts a 66th season for the orchestra (a fourth for Mr. Reiner in his present post) in Orchestra Hall Oct. 4. Twenty-eight Thursday evenings at 8:15 are proposed; 28 Friday afternoons at 2; 12 Tuesday afternoons at 2; 12 Young People's Concerts, Tuesday afternoons at 3; a Sustaining Members' Concert Oct. 13 at 2 p.m., and 10 concerts in Milwaukee. Guest conductors will be Bruno Walter, George Szell, Sir Thomas Beecham and Karl Boehm. A long list of soloists is announced, most of whom are familiar to the musical public.

★ ★ ★

CINCINNATI: Thor Johnson will begin the 62nd orchestral season in Music Hall Oct. 12 and 13. There will be one guest conductor, Enrique Jorda, newly-come to the San Francisco players. Soloists: Roberta Peters, soprano (there may be a substitute here, for Miss Peters has been forced to cancel many of her engagements next season); American debut of Sergio Perticaroli, pianist, Oct. 26 and 27; Leonard Rose, 'cellist, Nov. 2 and 3; American debut of Cor de Groot, Dutch pianist, Nov. 9 and 10; William Doppmann, pianist, Nov. 23 and 24; Jose Iturbi, pianist, Dec. 7 and 8; David Oistrakh, the Russian violinist, at a date to be announced, subject to his availability in the United States. The list also includes Rubinstein, Jan. 11 and 12; Bachauer, Feb. 1 and 2; Lukas Foss, pianist-composer, Feb. 22 and 23; Francescatti, March 29 and 30, and the Bach "Passion According to St. Matthew," with chorus and soloists, April 17 and 18.

★ ★ ★

EUGENE ORMANDY and the Philadelphia Orchestra will launch the musical year in the Academy of Music there on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and Monday evening, Oct. 8. New artists, new music and special events will distinguish the season. The veteran pianist, Guiomar Novaes, will be the first soloist, Oct. 26, 27 and 29. She first played with the orchestra in 1917. Two young European pianists also have been engaged—Jan Pennink, 26-year-old Hollander, and Philippe Entremont, 21, of France, beginning his third American tour.

A reciprocal arrangement with the Boston orchestra will bring Charles Muench as guest conductor, while Mr. Ormandy goes to Boston. An American premiere of Vaughan Williams' eighth symphony is contemplated. Other ventures of the season will be Carl Orff's "The Triumph of Aphrodite," called "a scenic concerto," with the Temple University Chorus; Hilde Gueden, Rudolf Petrak, and Kenneth Smith as soloists.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
Circ. D. 302,579 - S. 520,850
SEP 30 1956

Orchestra Tops Big Week of Concert Openings

By Rena C. Holtkamp

A plentiful harvest of concerts, most of them opening season-long series, will regale first nighters with varied entertainment this week.

The Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell will begin its 39th season of symphony concerts in Severance Hall Thursday and Friday evenings at 8:30. The familiar dramatic overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9 by Hector Berlioz will open a program which will include Ravel's "La Valse," and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98.

RENA C. HOLTKAMP

The first performance here of Concertino for Strings, Brass and Solo Tympani by the young Italian composer, Franco Donatoni, will feature in a novel manner the varied talents of Cloyd Duff, tympanist of the orchestra. Four-pedal tympani are required for a rendition of the score, and the orchestra has imported a pedal kettledrum of unusually low pitch which will be played by Duff.

The Concertino received its first world performance in 1950 by the Radio Luxembourg, when it won first prize in an international competition.

New members of the orchestra will be Sidney Weiss and Phillip O. Naegele, violins; John Cox, viola; Warren Downs, violoncello; Raymond Benner, bass; George Silfies, assistant first clarinet, and Richard Smith, associate first trumpet.

Committee Hears Expert

On Wednesday afternoon at 2, the Women's Committee of the Orchestra will meet in Severance Chamber Music Hall. Mrs. Helen M. Thompson, director of the American Symphony Orchestra League, will speak on "Current Trends in the Orchestral World." Anshel Brusilow, assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, with Arthur Loesser, concert pianist, will present a musical program which will include Cesar Franck's Violin Sonata in A Major.

Mrs. Thompson is executive secretary of the Music Critics' National Advisory Committee which will hold its fourth annual workshop in Severance Hall, Friday through Sunday.

On Friday evening at 8:30, the Juilliard String Quartet will make a special appearance in Severance Chamber Music Hall under the joint sponsorship of the Cleveland Orchestra and the American Symphony Orchestra League. This program will include new works by Henry Cowell and Quincy Porter, with other quartets by Telemann and Beethoven.

Opera Association Opens Next Sunday

The Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi opens its diversified series of entertainments with a double performance next Sunday at 3 and 7:30 p.m. in Masonic Hall by the English orchestra leader, Mantovani, and his ensemble in "New Music," familiar on London recordings. The varied entertainment includes "American Gypsy," Irving Berlin's "Always," the traditional "Greensleeves," Strauss' "Blue Danube," Friml's "Donkey's Serenade," and other light popular music.

In co-operation with the joint recreation boards of Cleveland Heights and University Heights schools and cities, the Cleveland Opera Association will offer three musical events in neighborhood locations: Oct. 13, Carmen Amaya, Spanish dancer and company in Heights High School Auditorium; Feb. 10, Little Singers of Paris in Wiley Auditorium in a matinee concert; March 24, First Piano Quartet in Wiley Auditorium in afternoon concert.

The Cleveland Opera Association's other attractions are: OCT. 14, Carmen Amaya at WHK Studio One; OCT. 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall; OCT. 20 and 21, Yugoslav State Dancers & Singers at Music Hall; NOV. 2 and 3, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo at Music Hall; NOV. 10, Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra at Music Hall; NOV. 18, Carabinieri Marching Band of Rome at the Arena; NOV. 23 and 24, NBC Opera Company at Music Hall; DEC. 1, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano, at Music Hall; DEC. 2, Ruth Page's Chicago Opera Ballet in Music Hall; DEC. 7, The Little Gaelic Singers; FEB. 9, The Little Singers of Paris, both at Music Hall; FEB. 24, Original Don Cossack Singers & Dancers at Music Hall, MARCH 9 and 10, Ballet Theater at Music Hall; MARCH 23, Pe Paur Opera Gall at Music Hall, and MARCH 30, Ballets Basque de Biarritz at Music Hall.

Bernardi's popular-price concert course of six events includes the Boston Symphony, NBC Opera's "Madame Butterfly," Vienna Symphony, the Schwarzkopf recital, Little Singers of Paris and Ballets Basque de Biarritz.

CINCINNATI, OHIO ENQUIRER
1956

Words and MUSIC

by Arthur Darack

Gulda Revisited

THE YOUNG Viennese pianist, Friedrich Gulda, who appeared here in recital several years ago, has gone on to a certain eminence in two distinct, though related, fields—jazz and the concert repertory. Consider today his position in light of four new London records.

With Anthony Collins conducting the orchestra, Gulda solos Mozart's Concerto No. 25 in C, K. 503 and No. 26 in D, K. 537 ("Coronation"). This is London LL 1370.

Gulda is in the process of waxing the entire set of 32 Beethoven sonatas. Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7 appear on LL 1372 and 1374 (two on each disc).

On London LL 1371 Gulda performs Schumann's "Fantasiestücke" and "Waldscenen."

Though he is very young, Gulda is uncontaminated by ardor, vivacity or any of those habits we associate with youth. His formidable virtues are those one expects in a more seasoned hand.

He plays with great clarity, with impeccable rhythm, with the utmost seriousness and with a tone that inclines to a monochrome.

I observe a gain in the amount of warmth he is able to generate for Mozart and I continue to be amazed by his technical power in Beethoven.

That Gulda will rise to the higher brackets of his profession I have no doubt; he is there now. But his playing is not destined to send audiences into cheers or any other state of unusual animation.

Gulda will arouse admiration, reflection and praise for his good taste and marvelous respectability. And if the word dull sometimes creeps in, there is ample excuse for entertaining it.

★ ★ ★

A NEW recording of the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto, by Serkin, Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia ML 5117) is anything but dull. It is almost volcanic on Serkin's part and Ormandy is no barrier to the high spirits—the elan of the Serkin pianism.

This recording is the second by the same people. I have not heard the earlier version but recommend this one as the most satisfactory recording — all things considered—of this concerto.

★ ★ ★

EDITH FARNADI, Westminster's Hungarian music specialist, performs music by Bartok on XWN 18217, the "Allegro Barbaro," "Eight Roumanian Folk Dances," the Suite Opus 14, nine pieces and "Three Burlesques."

Liszt's "Soirees de Vienne" are performed on Westminster XWN 18218.

Miss Farnadi lacks the sizzling bravura of some pianists who have specialized in Liszt. And in those elements of Bartok which descend from Liszt she is at a similar disadvantage.

Nevertheless, her performance has charm and distinction and some individual touches that are appealing.

★ ★ ★

FRANCESCATTI'S version of the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia ML 5114), is characterized by the utmost animation.

★ ★ ★

Something of the same temperament may be heard in the Munch-Boston Orchestra performance of five Beethoven overtures on Victor LM 2015. "Leonore" Nos. 1, 2, 3; "Fidelio" and "Coriolan."

★ ★ ★

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
Circ. D. 190,612 - S. 166,660
SEP 30 1956

Mostly About Orchestras

Autumn Winds Blow

Symphony Groups Schedule Fall-Winter Concert Series

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Music Editor

THE CHILL OF AUTUMN has set orchestras jangling throughout the land. A spate of plans and portents descends, by mail and courier, of which we sift the following:

PAUL PARAY and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will open the new $5 million Henry and Edsel Ford Auditorium Thursday evening, Oct. 18. Eighteen Thursday evenings and Friday afternoons are announced. This will be a first season in Detroit for Friday matinees.

There will be a dedication program on this first night—speeches and such—an orchestral program to include a Mass by Mr. Paray, and other matters of the repertoire. Both ceremony and program will be repeated Friday afternoon, Oct. 19.

Two guest conductors are announced—Virgil Thomson, former music critic of the New York Herald Tribune and a composer of some renown, in a performance Feb. 14 of his concerto for flute, strings, harp and percussion. The flutist will be Albert Tipton. The other guest conductor will be Andre Audoli, Nov. 22-23, making his American debut. He is president and conductor of the Concerts Classiques de Marseille.

Oft-told names embellish the list of soloists scattered throughout the season. The list embraces the First Piano Quartet, Oct. 25; Jerome Hines, bass-baritone, Nov. 1-2; the concertmaster, Mischa Mischakoff, violinist, Nov. 15, in the Brahms concerto; Isaac Stern, violinist, but lately quit of Russia, Nov. 29, in the Beethoven concerto; Leon Fleischer, pianist, Dec. 13-14; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan, Dec. 20; Grant Johannesen, pianist, Dec. 27-28; Paul Olefsky, cellist, Jan. 10; Zino Francescatti, violinst, Jan. 17-18; three great pianists—Artur Rubinstein, Jan. 24; Myra Hess, Feb. 7-8, and Rudolf Serkin, March 7. And then there will be Edward Druzinsky, harpist, March 15, and Martial Singher, March 28.

The Detroit season will terminate March 28, with a performance of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," in which Mr. Singher will be the soloist.

★ ★ ★

THE VAN LOPIK SERIES in Masonic Auditorium, Detroit, mentions an orchestral fanfare. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes Oct. 16; the Vienna Philharmonic, Nov. 21; the Pittsburgh orchestra, Jan. 21; Cleveland, March 11, and Philadelphia, May 1. Mr. Ormandy and his Philadelphians usually time their ventures into this region with the annual May Festival in Ann Arbor. Other Van Lopik attractions in the same arena: Royal Danish Ballet, Oct. 11-13; Jose Iturbi, pianist, Nov. 2; Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, Dec. 6; Jan Peerce, tenor, Jan. 9; Zinka Milanov, soprano, Feb. 1; Nathan Milstein, violinist, Feb. 22; Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, March 2.

★ ★ ★

THE CHORAL UNION SERIES at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, administered by the indefatigable Charles A. Sink, proposes an alluring roster.

This will be the 78th season of this cultural enterprise, though not under the aegis of Mr. Sink. An Extra Concert Series starts an 11th year Oct. 11.

The season begins Oct. 4 with Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, both from the Bing entourage at the Metropolitan. Here is the announced list: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 15; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Oct. 21; Robert Casadesus, pianist, Nov. 5; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Nov. 20; Artur Rubinstein, pianist, Jan. 14; Vienna Choir Boys, Jan. 20 (2:30 p.m.); Solomon, pianist, Feb. 21; Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 28; Cleveland Orchestra, March 10.

Extra Concert Series: "Mantovani and His New Music," Oct. 11; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 17; Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano, Nov. 14; dePaur Opera Gala, Jan. 10; Boston "Pops" Tour Orchestra, March 3 (2:30 p.m.). All concerts will be in Hill Auditorium.

★ ★ ★

CLEVELAND: George Szell's orchestra begins a 39th season in Severance Hall Thursday and Saturday evenings. Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be offered to subscribers. Guest conductors will be Robert Shaw, the new choral administrator, in the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis," Dec. 13 and 15; in an orchestral program Dec. 20 and 22, including Walter Piston's somewhat controversial sixth symphony; in a concert Feb. 28 and March 2, which favors the Stravinsky Symphony of Psalms and the Hindemith "Mathis der Maler"; the Mexican Carlos Chavez, Dec. 6 and 8; the Brazilian Heitor Villa-Lobos, in a program of his own music, Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, with Felicia Blumenthal, pianist, in the fifth concerto; Igor Markevitch, once a child prodigy pianist, Dec. 27 and 29.

The British pianist, Solomon, will play the second concerto in a Brahms program Jan. 3 and 5. Other soloists: Robert Marcellus, clarinetist, Oct. 11 and 13; Josef Gingold, violinist, Oct. 18 and 20; Leon Fleischer, pianist, Oct. 25 and 27; Margaret Harshaw, soprano, Nov. 1 and 2; Robert Casadesus, pianist, Nov. 8 and 10; Nathan Milstein, violinist, Nov. 15 and 17; Clifford Curzon, pianist, Nov. 22 and 24; Mr. Gingold and Anshel Brusilow, violinists, in the Vivaldi double concerto, Dec. 6 and 8; Mack Harrell, baritone; Adele Addison, soprano; Walter Fredericks, tenor, Dec. 13 and 15; Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin, duo-pianists, Jan. 24 and 26; Henryk Szeryng, violinist, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1; Rudolf Serkin, Feb. 21 and 23; Marie Simmelink-Kraft, soprano and Mr. Brusilow, March 7 and 9; Zino Francescatti, violinist, March 21 and 23; the recalcitrant Glenn Gould, Canadian pianist, March 28 and 29; Farrell, Rankin, Tucker and Moscona, with the chorus, in Verdi's "Requiem," April 4 and 6; Gary Graffman, pianist, April 11 and 13.

★ ★ ★

CHICAGO: Fritz Reiner starts a 66th season for the orchestra (a fourth for Mr. Reiner in his present post) in Orchestra Hall Oct. 4. Twenty-eight Thursday evenings at 8:15 are proposed; 28 Friday afternoons at 2; 12 Tuesday afternoons at 2; 12 Young People's Concerts, Tuesday afternoons at 3; a Sustaining Members' Concert Oct. 13 at 2 p.m., and 10 concerts in Milwaukee. Guest conductors will be Bruno Walter, George Szell, Sir Thomas Beecham and Karl Boehm. A long list of soloists is announced, most of whom are familiar to the musical public.

★ ★ ★

CINCINNATI: Thor Johnson will begin the 62nd orchestral season in Music Hall Oct. 12 and 13. There will be one guest conductor, Enrique Jorda, newly-come to the San Francisco players. Soloists: Roberta Peters, soprano (there may be a substitute here, for Miss Peters has been forced to cancel many of her engagements next season); American debut of Sergio Perticaroli, pianist, Oct. 26 and 27; Leonard Rose, cellist, Nov. 2 and 3; American debut of Cor de Groot, Dutch pianist, Nov. 9 and 10; William Doppmann, pianist, Nov. 23 and 24; Jose Iturbi, pianist, Dec. 7 and 8; David Oistrakh, the Russian violinist, at a date to be announced, subject to his availability in the United States. The list also includes Rubinstein, Jan. 11 and 12; Bachauer, Feb. 1 and 2; Lukas Foss, pianist-composer, Feb. 22 and 23; Francescatti, March 29 and 30, and the Bach "Passion According to St. Matthew," with chorus and soloists, April 17 and 18.

★ ★ ★

EUGENE ORMANDY and the Philadelphia Orchestra will launch the musical year in the Academy of Music there on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and Monday evening, Oct. 8. New artists, new music and special events will distinguish the season. The veteran pianist, Guiomar Novaes, will be the first soloist, Oct. 26, 27 and 29. She first played with the orchestra in 1917. Two young European pianists also have been engaged—Jan Pennink, 26-year-old Hollander, and Philippe Entremont, 21, of France, beginning his third American tour.

A reciprocal arrangement with the Boston orchestra will bring Charles Muench as guest conductor, while Mr. Ormandy goes to Boston. An American premiere of Vaughan Williams' eighth symphony is contemplated. Other ventures of the season will be Carl Orff's "The Triumph of Aphrodite," called "a scenic concerto," with the Temple University Chorus; Hilde Gueden, Rudolf Petrak, and Kenneth Smith as soloists.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
Circ. D. 302,579 - S. 520,850
SEP 30 1956

Orchestra Tops Big Week of Concert Openings

By Rena C. Holtkamp

A plentiful harvest of concerts, most of them opening season-long series, will regale first nighters with varied entertainment this week.

The Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell will begin its 39th season of symphony concerts in Severance Hall Thursday and Friday evenings at 8:30. The familiar dramatic overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9 by Hector Berlioz will open a program which will include Ravel's "La Valse," and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98.

RENA C. HOLTKAMP

The first performance here of Concertino for Strings, Brass and Solo Tympani by the young Italian composer, Franco Donatoni, will feature in a novel manner the varied talents of Cloyd Duff, tympanist of the orchestra. Four-pedal tympani are required for a rendition of the score, and the orchestra has imported a pedal kettledrum of unusually low pitch which will be played by Duff.

The Concertino received its first world performance in 1950 by the Radio Luxembourg, when it won first prize in an international competition.

New members of the orchestra will be Sidney Weiss and Phillip O. Naegele, violins; John Cox, viola; Warren Downs, violoncello; Raymond Benner, bass; George Silfies, assistant first clarinet, and Richard Smith, associate first trumpet.

Committee Hears Expert

On Wednesday afternoon at 2, the Women's Committee of the Orchestra will meet in Severance Chamber Music Hall. Mrs. Helen M. Thompson, director of the American Symphony Orchestra League, will speak on "Current Trends in the Orchestral World." Anshel Brusilow, assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, with Arthur Loesser, concert pianist, will present a musical program which will include Cesar Franck's Violin Sonata in A Major.

Mrs. Thompson is executive secretary of the Music Critics' National Advisory Committee which will hold its fourth annual workshop in Severance Hall, Friday through Sunday.

On Friday evening at 8:30, the Juilliard String Quartet will make a special appearance in Severance Chamber Music Hall under the joint sponsorship of the Cleveland Orchestra and the American Symphony Orchestra League. This program will include new works by Henry Cowell and Quincy Porter, with other quartets by Telemann and Beethoven.

Opera Association Opens Next Sunday

The Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi opens its diversified series of entertainments with a double performance next Sunday at 3 and 7:30 p.m. in Masonic Hall by the English orchestra leader, Mantovani, and his ensemble in "New Music," familiar on London recordings. The varied entertainment includes "American Gypsy," Irving Berlin's "Always," the traditional "Greensleeves," Strauss' "Blue Danube," Friml's "Donkey's Serenade," and other light popular music.

In co-operation with the joint recreation boards of Cleveland Heights and University Heights schools and cities, the Cleveland Opera Association will offer three musical events in neighborhood locations: Oct. 13, Carmen Amaya, Spanish dancer and company in Heights High School Auditorium; Feb. 10, Little Singers of Paris in Wiley Auditorium in a matinee concert; March 24, First Piano Quartet in Wiley Auditorium in afternoon concert.

The Cleveland Opera Association's other attractions are:

OCT. 14, Carmen Amaya at WHK Studio One; OCT. 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall; OCT. 20 and 21, Yugoslav State Dancers & Singers at Music Hall; NOV. 2 and 3, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo at Music Hall; NOV. 10, Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra at Music Hall; NOV. 18, Carabinieri Marching Band of Rome at the Arena; NOV. 23 and 24, NBC Opera Company at Music Hall; DEC. 1, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano, at Music Hall; DEC. 2, Ruth Page's Chicago Opera Ballet in Music Hall; DEC. 7, The Little Gaelic Singers; FEB. 9, The Little Singers of Paris, both at Music Hall; FEB. 24, Original Don Cossack Singers & Dancers at Music Hall; MARCH 9 and 10, Ballet Theater at Music Hall; MARCH 23, Pe Pa[illegible] Opera Gall at Music Hall, and MARCH 30, Ballets Basque de Biarritz at Music Hall.

Bernardi's popular-price concert course of six events includes the Boston Symphony, NBC Opera's "Madame Butterfly," Vienna Symphony, [illegible] Schwarzkopf [illegible] Singers of Paris and Ballets Basque de Biarritz.

CINCINNATI INQUIRER
1956

Words and MUSIC

by Arthur Darack

Gulda Revisited

THE YOUNG Viennese pianist, Friedrich Gulda, who appeared here in recital several years ago, has gone on to a certain eminence in two distinct, though related, fields—jazz and the concert repertory. Consider today his position in light of four new London records.

With Anthony Collins conducting the orchestra, Gulda solos Mozart's Concerto No. 25 in C, K. 503 and No. 26 in D, K. 537 ("Coronation"). This is London LL 1370.

Gulda is in the process of waxing the entire set of 32 Beethoven sonatas. Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7 appear on LL 1372 and 1374 (two on each disc).

On London LL 1371 Gulda performs Schumann's "Fantasiestücke" and "Waldscenen."

Though he is very young, Gulda is uncontaminated by ardor, vivacity or any of those habits we associate with youth. His formidable virtues are those one expects in a more seasoned hand.

He plays with great clarity, with impeccable rhythm, with the utmost seriousness and with a tone that inclines to a monochrome.

I observe a gain in the amount of warmth he is able to generate for Mozart and I continue to be amazed by his technical power in Beethoven.

That Gulda will rise to the higher brackets of his profession I have no doubt; he is there now. But his playing is not destined to send audiences into cheers or any other state of unusual animation.

Gulda will arouse admiration, reflection and praise for his good taste and marvelous respectability. And if the word dull sometimes creeps in, there is ample excuse for entertaining it.

★ ★ ★

A NEW recording of the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto, by Serkin, Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia ML 5117) is anything but dull. It is almost volcanic on Serkin's part and Ormandy is no barrier to the high spirits—the elan—of the Serkin pianism.

This recording is the second by the same people. I have not heard the earlier version but recommend this one as the most satisfactory recording—all things considered—of this concerto.

★ ★ ★

EDITH FARNADI, Westminster's Hungarian music specialist, performs music by Bartok on XWN 18217, the "Allegro Barbaro," "Eight Roumanian Folk Dances," the Suite Opus 14, nine pieces and "Three Burlesques."

Liszt's "Soirees de Vienne" are performed on Westminster XWN 18218.

Miss Farnadi lacks the sizzling bravura of some pianists who have specialized in Liszt. And in those elements of Bartok which descend from Liszt she is at a similar disadvantage.

Nevertheless, her performance has charm and delicacy and some individual touches that are appealing.

★ ★ ★

FRANCESCATTI'S version of the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia ML 5114), is characterized by the utmost animation.

★ ★ ★

Something of the same temperament may be heard in the Munch-Boston Orchestra performance of five Beethoven overtures on Victor LM 2015. "Leonore" Nos. 1, 2, 3; "Fidelio" and "Coriolan."

★ ★ ★

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

SEP 30 1956

Boston Symphony Home This Week

TRIUMPHANT RETURN — Charles Munch, shown here in a photograph taken in the Folke Teatret, Oslo, Sweden, and the Boston Symphony return to Symphony Hall this week to begin their 75th season on Friday afternoon. Insert shows famed Austrian violinist Wolfgang Schneiderhan who makes his American debut on Friday playing the Beethoven Concerto with the Bostonians.

76th Symphony Season Begins Friday

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour which ended in London last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra reassembles in Symphony Hall this week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season, which will begin with concerts this Friday at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will then begin his eighth season as conductor. The Tuesday evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9.

The program for all three concerts will be the same. To begin, Dr. Munch has chosen the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert as the orchestra's music director in October, 1949: the overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber. Then will come the Beethoven violin concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut as soloist. After the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominently in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received, especially in Leningrad and Moscow.

A few subscriptions are still available for the orchestra's series of six Sunday afternoon concerts. Information may be obtained from the subscription office at Symphony Hall.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

The first of this season's Bailey Hall Concerts sponsored by Cornell University was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard Sunday afternoon at 4:15. The orchestra was under the direction of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch.

It was a beautiful concert.

Certain areas of musical criticism might well be ruled out, should one be in attendance for reasons besides hearing fine music superbly played. These would be intonation and ensemble, to name only the most obvious, for both of these very essential qualities were near-flawless. It is amusing to note that these same virtues were the ones most usually mentioned in the orchestra's recent European tour—and that grudgingly, as if it were a questionable thing to be so near perfection.

This leaves tone quality and balance on the technical and interpretation on the aesthetic side. There could be very, very few Sunday who could hunger for a richer, more eloquent string tone, more balanced and mellow horns, more dramatic percussion, or for brass and woodwind choirs more technically brilliant. Much has been said about the accoustical difficulties in listening in Bailey Hall, yet from where I sat, where one is apt to get a preponderance of lower string sound, the balance of the orchestra was incredibly fine. I will yield that the seating of the orchestra — with the cellos and basses in — would help the balance, but most of the credit must go to the group under discussion, and in particular to Mr. Munch's excellent handling of it.

The best time to hear the Beethoven "Eroica" (Symphony No. 3 in E flat Major, Opus 55) is the first time—a parallel being attempted to the case of the man who wished he might read "Tom Sawyer" for the first time but once again. Perhaps the next best time is when the Boston Symphony plays it as they did Sunday afternoon—with joy and spirit, with awe and reverence, with clarity and definition, with nostalgic poignancy, in the order called for. It was magnificently portrayed.

In contrast to the Beethoven and to Weber's "Overture to 'Euryanthe'," the orchestra's opening work, Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 6," commissioned by the orchestra for its 75th Anniversary, was played, and that most brilliantly. Mr. Piston did indeed construct it for the right orchestra. The work is surprisingly redundant with "tunes" and mellifluous harmonies, albeit the complex changing rhythmic figures and no little preoccupation with virtuosity. It is a work one can comprehend and admire at first hearing—at least as interpreted by Mr. Munch—whether one warms up to it or not.

One wonders if some listener of a future generation might ever wish that he might hear Piston's 6th—could we entitle it the "Percussion?"—for the first time, but once again.

Which brings us to choice of program—a delicate subject at best. Sunday's program was a change of pace from the Boston's last appearance here under Monteaux, when they presented works having notably more "audience appeal"—albeit exquisitely done.

It was a most beautiful concert, in every way.

FORREST SANDERS

INTERNATIONAL PRESS-CUTTING BUREAU
184, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.2
Extract from NATIONAL & ENGLISH REVIEW, London
OCT 1956

Choral and Song 4767

Most people, I think, will consider Victoria de los Angeles singing of Berlioz's Nuits d'Été, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch, the best we have had yet. This is [illegible] lovely singing, but it rarely mov[illegible]s, for example, Maggie Teyte did in two of the songs she recorded some years ago. With the song-cycle is coupled Debussy's La Damoiselle Élue in which the above artists are joined by Carol Smith and the Radcliffe Choral Society. This performance is less good than the Decca (LXT2[illegible]) and misses some of the pathos and sensuous feeling of Rossetti's poem (H.M.V. ALP1368).

West Palm Beach, Fla.
PALM BEACH TIMES
Circ. D. 16,269
OCT 1 1956

Mrs. Charles Munch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, didn't accompany ~~him and his~~ troupe on the visit to Moscow. She sat quietly in Paris, with their puppy dog. She didn't go along because travel and entry regulations for the puppy were difficult. . . Orson Welles, who has set up residence in Hollywood, may move to N. Y. on an NBC-TV deal.

Grace Kelly and her Prince Rainier, now vacationing in N.Y., owe gratitude to an anonymous booking agent who was an indirect means for bringing them together. Alfred Hitchcock needed a leading lady with a British accent for "Dial M for Murder." Audrey and set the deal with Hitchcock. But Miss Hepburn was committed. Hepburn was chosen for the role, first to a road tour in "Gigi." The date conflicted with Hitchcock's plans. He therefore signed Grace Kelly instead, for two pictures — and the second film brought her to Monaco.

Next season the Brooklyn Dodgers will play more games in Jersey City than they did this year. . . The largest movie sign ever painted in the U.S.A. will advertise Elia Kazan's "Baby Doll." It will cover the entire Broadway block from 45th to 46th St., featuring a photo of Carroll Baker. If she were shown standing instead of reclining, she'd be 15 stories tall . . . Mrs. Jack E. Leonard asked a Lindy's waiter to wrap up her unfinished steak, to take home to her dog. The waiter asked: "Would your dog maybe like a pickle with it too?"

Cary Grant is seldom disturbed. He leads an easy, untroubled life and never has been known to use a sleeping pill. He keeps his weight down with ease; he weighs the same now as he did 20 years ago. Grant insists that he does all this through self-hypnosis, taught him by his wife. . . Garson Kanin once sent Grant a movie script and said: "Cary, I'm sure that after you read this it will keep you awake nights just thinking about it". . . The next day Grant told him: "You were right. I kept thinking of the story and couldn't fall asleep for 20 minutes."

The non-partisan Inaugural Committee in Washington is at work on plans for next Jan. 20. Because Inaugural Day falls on a Sunday the plans are to have the swearing-in on Sunday, Jan. 20, and the parades and Inaugural Ball the following day. . . Jean Cocteau is writing a preface for Edith Piaf's forthcoming book of memoirs. . . Billy Eckstine, just back from Europe, was at the Embers last night where he told of appearing at two command performances. He said of them: "A command performance is [illegible] show for the overprivileged."

Almost every periodical in America is printing poll results these days. King George of Greece once asked Edward L. Bernays, the public relations man, to explain these polls. Bernays told His Majesty: "In America the coefficients are worked out on a basis of attitudes in relation to age, sex, profession, geography and economic status. And after the people most concerned learn the trend of public thought from this, they then take action". . . "The trend of public thought," replied the King, "What? Are there no real leaders in the country?"

(Copyright 1956, The Hall Syndicate, Inc.)

LORAIN, OHIO
Journal & Times-Herald
Circ. D. 22,644
OCT 2 1956

Boston Orchestra Comes To Cleveland

Many Lorain music lovers are expected to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears in Cleveland Public Music Hall Oct. 19.

Charles Munch will direct the symphony in the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" or "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and Tschaikowsky's Sixth of "Pathetique" Symphony.

It will be the first visit of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland in 12 years. The appearance is a part of the new season of concerts offered by G. Bernardi, manager of the Cleveland Opera Association.

The series will include appearances by the First Piano Quartet, three ballet companies, Montovani and his orchestra, the Carabinieri Band of Rome, the NBC Opera Co., the DePaur Opera Gala, the Little Gaelic Singers and The Little Singers of Paris, among others.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 11,200
OCT - 4 1956

Symphony Players Open at Wellesley

The Wellesley Concert Series this year is particularly proud to present the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They will appear at Alumnae hall (as usual, an addition to the stage is built to accommodate the entire orchestra) on Wednesday, Oct. 10, at 8 p. m. under the baton of Charles Munch, fresh from the triumphs of their brilliant European tour.

As Ambassadors of Good Will, these splendid musicians, the members of the press, the orchestral management and the beloved conductors, Mr. Munch and Mr. Monteux, have done a great deal to further friendly relation between peoples on both sides of the Iron Curtain.

The series is equally fortunate in presenting on Nov. 12 Martial Singher, the celebrated baritone who has had such a successful dual career in opera and the concert stage.

CHARLES MUNCH will lead the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert which opens the Wellesley Concert series Oct. 10, at Alumnae Hall, Wellesley.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

SEP 3 1956

Boston Symphony Home This Week

TRIUMPHANT RETURN — Charles Munch, shown here in a photograph taken in the Folke Teatret, Oslo, Sweden, and the Boston Symphony return to Symphony Hall this week to begin their 75th season on Friday afternoon. Insert shows famed Austrian violinist Wolgang Schneiderhan who makes his American debut on Friday playing the Beethoven Concerto with the Bostonians.

76th Symphony Season Begins Friday

Fresh from its resoundingly successful 28-concert European tour which ended in London last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra reassembles in Symphony Hall this week to begin rehearsals for its 76th season, which will begin with concerts this Friday at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will then begin his eighth season as conductor. The Tuesday evening series will begin the following Tuesday, Oct. 9.

The program for all three concerts will be the same. To begin, Dr. Munch has chosen the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert as the orchestra's music director in October, 1949: the overture to the opera "Euryanthe," by Weber. Then will come the Beethoven violin concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut as soloist. After the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominently in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received, especially in Leningrad and Moscow.

A few subscriptions are still available for the orchestra's series of six Sunday afternoon concerts. Information may be obtained from the subscription office at Symphony Hall.

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

The first of this season's Bailey Hall Concerts sponsored by Cornell University was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard Sunday afternoon at 4:15. The orchestra was under the direction of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch.

It was a beautiful concert.

Certain areas of musical criticism might well be ruled out, should one be in attendance for reasons besides hearing fine music superbly played. These would be intonation and ensemble, to name only the most obvious, for both of these very essential qualities were near-flawless. It is amusing to note that these same virtues were the ones most usually mentioned in the orchestra's recent European tour —and that grudgingly, as if it were a questionable thing to be so near perfection.

This leaves tone quality and balance on the technical and interpretation on the aesthetic side. There could be very, very few Sunday who could hunger for a richer, more eloquent string tone, more balanced and mellow horns, more dramatic percussion, or for brass and woodwind choirs more technically brilliant. Much has been said about the accoustical difficulties in listening in Bailey Hall, yet from where I sat, where one is apt to get a preponderance of lower string sound, the balance of the orchestra was incredibly fine. I will yield that the seating of the orchestra — with the cellos and basses in — would help the balance, but most of the credit must go to the group under discussion, and in particular to Mr. Munch's excellent handling of it.

The best time to hear the Beethoven "Eroica" (Symphony No. 3 in E flat Major, Opus 55) is the first time—a parallel being attempted to the case of the man who wished he might read "Tom Sawyer" for the first time but once again. Perhaps the next best time is when the Boston Symphony plays it as they did Sunday afternoon—with joy and spirit, with awe and reverence, with clarity and definition, with nostalgic - poignancy, in the order called for. It was magnificently portrayed.

In contrast to the Beethoven and to Weber's "Overture to 'Euryanthe'," the orchestra's opening work, Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 6," commissioned by the orchestra for its 75th Anniversary, was played, and that most brilliantly. Mr. Piston did indeed construct it for the right orchestra. The work is surprisingly redundant with "tunes" and mellifluous harmonies, albeit the complex changing rhythmic figures and no little preoccupation with virtuosity. It is a work one can comprehend and admire at first hearing—at least as interpreted by Mr. Munch—whether one warms up to it or not.

One wonders if some listener of a future generation might ever wish that he might hear Piston's 6th—could we entitle it the "Percussion?"—for the first time, but once again.

Which brings us to choice of program—a delicate subject at best. Sunday's program was a change of pace from the Boston's last appearance here under Monteaux, when they presented works having notably more "audience appeal"—albeit exquisitely done.

It was a most beautiful concert, in every way.

FORREST SANDERS

LORAIN, OHIO
Journal & Times-Herald
Circ. D. 22,644
OCT 2 1956

Boston Orchestra Comes To Cleveland

Many Lorain music lovers are expected to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears in Cleveland Public Music Hall Oct. 19.

Charles Munch will direct the symphony in the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" or "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and Tschaikowsky's Sixth of "Pathetique" Symphony.

It will be the first visit of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland in 12 years. The appearance is a part of the new season of concerts offered by G. Bernardi, manager of the Cleveland Opera Association.

The series will include appearances by the First Piano Quartet, three ballet companies, Montovani and his orchestra, the Carabinieri Band of Rome, the NBC Opera Co., the DePaur Opera Gala, the Little Gaelic Singers and The Little Singers of Paris, among others.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 11,200
OCT - 4 1956

Symphony Players Open at Wellesley

The Wellesley Concert Series this year is particularly proud to present the Boston Symphony orchestra.

They will appear at Alumnae hall (as usual, an addition to the stage is built to accommodate the entire orchestra) on Wednesday, Oct. 10, at 8 p. m. under the baton of Charles Munch, fresh from the triumphs of their brilliant European tour.

As Ambassadors of Good Will, these splendid musicians, the members of the press, the orchestral management and the beloved conductors, Mr. Munch and Mr. Monteux, have done a great deal to further friendly relation between peoples on both sides of the Iron Curtain.

The series is equally fortunate in presenting on Nov. 12 Martial Singher, the celebrated baritone who has had such a successful dual career in opera and the concert stage.

CHARLES MUNCH will lead the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert which opens the Wellesley Concert series Oct. 10, at Alumnae Hall, Wellesley.

INTERNATIONAL PRESS-CUTTING BUREAU
184, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.2

Extract from NATIONAL & ENGLISH
REVIEW, London
OCT 1956

Choral and Song

Most people, I think, will consider Victoria de los Angeles singing of Berlioz's Nuits d'Été, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch, the best we have had yet. This is, in [illegible] lovely singing, but it rarely moves [illegible] as, for example, Maggie Teyte did in two of the songs she recorded some years ago. With the song-cycle is coupled Debussy's La Damoiselle Élue in which the above artists are joined by Carol Smith and the Radcliffe Choral Society. This performance is less good than the Decca (LXT2743) and misses some of the pathos and sensuous feeling of Rossetti's poem (H.M.V. ALP1368).

West Palm Beach, Fla.
PALM BEACH TIMES
Circ. D. 16,269
OCT 1 1956

Mrs. Charles Munch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, didn't accompany him and his troupe on the visit to Moscow. She sat quietly in Paris, with their puppy dog. She didn't go along because travel and entry regulations for the puppy were difficult. . . Orson Welles, who has set up residence in Hollywood, may move to N. Y. on an NBC-TV deal.

Grace Kelly and her Prince Rainier, now vacationing in N.Y., owe gratitude to an anonymous booking agent who was an indirect means for bringing them together. Alfred Hitchcock needed a leading lady with a British accent for "Dial M for Murder." Audrey and set the deal with Hitchcock. But Miss Hepburn was committed Hepburn was chosen for the role, first to a road tour in "Gigi." The date conflicted with Hitchcock's plans. He therefore signed Grace Kelly instead, for two pictures — and the second film brought her to Monaco.

Next season the Brooklyn Dodgers will play more games in Jersey City than they did this year. . . The largest movie sign ever painted in the U.S.A. will advertise Elia Kazan's "Baby Doll." It will cover the entire Broadway block from 45th to 46th St., featuring a photo of Carroll Baker. If she were shown standing instead of reclining, she'd be 15 stories tall . . .Mrs. Jack E. Leonard asked a Lindy's waiter to wrap up her unfinished steak, to take home to her dog. The waiter asked: "Would your dog maybe like a pickle with it too?"

Cary Grant is seldom disturbed. He leads an easy, untroubled life and never has been known to use a sleeping pill. He keeps his weight down with ease; he weighs the same now as he did 20 years ago. Grant insists that he does all this through self-hypnosis, taught him by his wife. . .Garson Kanin once sent Grant a movie script and said: "Cary, I'm sure that after you read this it will keep you awake nights just thinking about it". . .The next day Grant told him: "You were right. I kept thinking of the story and couldn't fall asleep for 20 minutes."

The non-partisan Inaugural Committee in Washington is at work on plans for next Jan. 20. Because Inaugural Day falls on a Sunday the plans are to have the swearing-in on Sunday, Jan. 20, and the parades and Inaugural Ball the following day. . .Jean Cocteau is writing a preface for Edith Piaf's forthcoming book of memoirs. . . Billy Eckstine, just back from Europe, was at the Embers last night where he told of appearing at two command performances. He said of them: "A command performance is a benefit show for the overprivileged."

Almost every periodical in America is printing poll results these days. King George of Greece once asked Edward L. Bernays, the public relations man, to explain these polls. Bernays told His Majesty: "In America the coefficients are worked out on a basis of attitudes in relation to age, sex, profession, geography and economic status. And after the people most concerned learn the trend of public thought from this, they then take action". . ."The trend of public thought," replied the King. "What? Are there no real leaders in the country?"

(Copyright 1956, The Hall Syndicate, Inc.)

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 S. 35,347

OCT 4 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Two UM Concert Series Get Under Way This Month With 5 Concerts; First Tonight

The 78th annual Choral union concert series in Ann Arbor gets under way tonight with the appearance of Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, in Hill auditorium. The joint recital raises the curtain on a musical season that features some of the greatest musical attractions in the field. During October there will be five concerts in both the Choral union series and the Extra concert series.

Mantovani and His New Music will open the Extra series Oct. 11. This artist has won a tremendous following through his recordings and it is expected to be one of the greatest drawing cards at the university this season.

Two superb symphony orchestras will be presented in three concerts during the month, also. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, will give a concert Monday, Oct. 15, in the Choral union series, and two days later in the Extra series. Herbert von Karajan, perhaps the greatest conductor in Europe today, and certainly one of the foremost in the world, will bring his Berlin Philharmonic orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral union series, Sunday, Oct. 21.

Von Karajan is one of the few conductors who has recorded all nine of the Beethoven symphonies. He completed the cycle recently for Angel records.

* * *

Albert Von Tilzer, for years one of the best-known song writers of Tin Pan Alley, died Monday in Los Angeles. He was 78. Mr Von Tilzer, a charter member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) was best known for "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," "I'll Be With You in Apple Blossom Time" and "Wait Til the Sun Shines, Nellie." He also was known on Broadway as a producer, with such shows as "The Gingham Girl" and "Bye Bye, Bonnie."

* * *

Dimitri Shostakovich, once severely reprimanded by the Russian Communist party for "formalism" in his composing, now has been awarded the Order of Lenin, the highest honor that his country can bestow upon a civilian. Newspapers that once were harsh in their criticism of the composer, now have carried columns of praise. They are saying that in the past he has been unjustly accused.

* * *

Have you bought your tickets for the Jackson Symphony orchestra concerts this year? The orchestra needs your support, both in money and in attendance at its concerts, the first of which is Oct. 25.

* * *

Liberace, in London for his first concert tour, has surprised London critics. One newspaper columnist said he was surprised that the pianist failed to wear diamond rings shaped like grand pianos. "Not even the taps on his shoes were shaped like grand pianos," said the critic for the London Times. Liberace gave his first concert in London's Royal Festival hall before a capacity crowd said to be 90 per cent female. Most critics agreed that the American was a better showman than a pianist.

* * *

One of Britain's young composers has completed a "Grand Overture" which features a vacuum cleaner, an electric floor polisher and repeating rifles, the Associated Press reports from London.

"My Overture," said Malcolm Arnold, 35, "is to be part of a concert at Royal Festival hall Nov. 13. I admit that some people may call it crazy, but, basically, it's a serious work."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

(e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 9,986

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 13,357

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
ATHOL, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 4,541

OCT 5 1956

Boston Symphony Opens 76th Season

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 76th season tonight with an official "welcome home" from President Eisenhower after a successful European tour.

Orchestra officials disclosed receipt of the following telegram from the president:

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe had given me great satisfaction. Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchestra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544

OCT 4 1956

Record Demand for Season Tickets Bared

National Symphony Opens Biggest Season Oct. 16

An expanded, more varied concert season is being offered by the National Symphony Orchestra starting Oct. 16, and the demand for season tickets has been nearly twice as great as last year at this time.

"It features the greatest lineup of artists we could possibly get together," said Manager Ralph Black. They include such familiar names as Iturbi, Francescatti, Rubinstein, Hess, Menuhin, Beecham and others.

Mr. Mitchell

A "revolutionary idea" has been added to the regular Tuesday-Wednesday night series, he said, in that it will include visits by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Royal Danish Ballet Company.

He said it is the first time an orchestra has presented two others and a ballet company in its series. This Constitution Hall series itself has been expanded from 10 to 15 concerts.

TICKETS AT PREMIUM

"This is apparently what they want," said Mr. Black, because 3300 season tickets have been sold so far. There were 1800 sold at this time last year, when the final total was a postwar record of 3888. The Symphony played to 365,000 persons in its 31-week schedule last year, he said.

This year the same concert will be presented on both Tuesday and Wednesday, so concert-goers can choose either night. The Symphony will also have its largest full complement of musicians—96.

Director Howard Mitchell will introduce a total of 15 new works in 11 concerts, three of them world premieres, the rest never played by the Symphony here before. A Beethoven Festival is also included in the series.

Season tickets are available at the Symphony box office at 1108 G-st nw. They are priced from $13.50 to $45.00. Student tickets are $9.00.

Among the 175 concerts to be played by the Symphony this season are:

- The Lisner matinee series of six concerts on Thursday at 2:30 p. m., starting Oct. 24.
- The Prince Georges Series of four concerts starting Oct. 25.
- The five-week Music for Young America series starting April 16.
- The Saturday night Pops concerts starting Oct. 27. There will be six of them.
- The Montgomery County series of two concerts starting Nov. 25.

The Symphony will also play at the Redskin game on Oct. 14, will play a series of youth programs and will make two tours, one to New England and the other to the South.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 248,340

OCT 6 1956

Boston Symphony Lists Beethoven Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of WSB-NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," Monday at 8:15 p.m.

Charles Munch, starting his eighth season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct.

Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist. The work is in three movements: (1) Allegro ma non troppo, (2) Larghetto, (3) Finale: Rondo.

The new series of programs will consist of major selections from the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon concerts at Boston's celebrated Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Munch will be the conductor for most of the programs. Several noted guest conductors and distinguished soloists also will appear with the orchestra.

This will be the 76th season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a 28-concert European tour.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 6 1956

Society:

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Boston's music season opened this week with double distinction. First came the two Mason Music Foundation concerts on Thursday and Friday evenings at Jordan Hall, renewing a Boston tradition of free concerts made possible by the late Fanny Peabody Mason. And on Friday came the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening of its 1956-57 concerts after its fabulously rewarding tour of Europe and Asia this Summer.

The exciting first concert gave Bostonians a chance to hear the Societa Corelli in a satisfying program of Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Mardini and a newly discovered Sonata in C by Paganini.

Music Foundation committee members, led by Paul Doguereau and including Lewis Armistead, Edward F. McNichol, Arlen Coolidge, William P. Mitchell, Mrs. M. John Matthews and Miss Odette Doguereau, were at Jordan Hall to receive the approbation of friends of the late Miss Mason for their choice of concerts.

The next concert will be a much-anticipated recital by liedersinger Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau on Oct. 23. On Dec. 6 and 7, the Societa Corelli returns for another pair of concerts.

Mason concert regulars at the opening concerts included Mrs Jasper Whiting, Mrs. A. Clement Fitcomb, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Orson Adams, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Susannah Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. O'Leary (Eleanor Ruggles), Baron Charles de Pamplonne, French consul, and Mme. de Pamplonne; Earl Appleton, German Consul Werner and Mme. von Holleben, Burton Miller, David McKibbon, and Belgian Consul Charles Navez and Mme. Navez.

AIDING FUNDS for scholarships is the aim of members of St. Elizabeth's Hospital Alumnae Association who are sponsoring an autumn bridge and whist party scheduled for 8 p. m. Oct. 18 in the hospital auditorium.

Miss Mary Simeone 17 B. Circular ave., Natick, heads the committee for the benefit, and is also in charge of reservations.

ARLINGTON today at St. Agnes Church, Miss Margaret Ann Brewer, daughter of Mrs. John K. Brewer and the late Mr. Brewer of Arlington, will become the bride of Francis P. Daly, son of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick J. Daly of Jackson Heights, N. Y.

The bride, who will be given in marriage by her brother, John Jr., is wearing a portrait dress of alencon lace embroidered with seed pearls and sequins, and fashioned with a court train. A juliet cap of matching lace will hold in place her French illusion veil, and she will carry a white missal with orchids and stephanotis.

Mrs. William T. Vollmer of Medford is maid of honor, and bridesmaids are Miss Judith

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347

OCT 4 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Two UM Concert Series Get Under Way This Month With 5 Concerts; First Tonight

The 78th annual Choral union concert series in Ann Arbor gets under way tonight with the appearance of Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, in Hill auditorium. The joint recital raises the curtain on a musical season that features some of the greatest musical attractions in the field. During October there will be five concerts in both the Choral union series and the Extra concert series.

Mantovani and His New Music will open the Extra series Oct. 11. This artist has won a tremendous following through his recordings and it is expected to be one of the greatest drawing cards at the university this season.

Two superb symphony orchestras will be presented in three concerts during the month, also. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, will give a concert Monday, Oct. 15, in the Choral union series, and two days later in the Extra series. Herbert von Karajan, perhaps the greatest conductor in Europe today, and certainly one of the foremost in the world, will bring his Berlin Philharmonic orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral union series, Sunday, Oct. 21.

Von Karajan is one of the few conductors who has recorded all nine of the Beethoven symphonies. He completed the cycle recently for Angel records.

* * *

Albert Von Tilzer, for years one of the best-known song writers of Tin Pan Alley, died Monday in Los Angeles. He was 78. Mr Von Tilzer, a charter member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) was best known for "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," "I'll Be With You in Apple Blossom Time" and "Wait 'Til the Sun Shines, Nellie." He also was known on Broadway as a producer, with such shows as "The Gingham Girl" and "Bye Bye, Bonnie."

* * *

Dimitri Shostakovich, once severely reprimanded by the Russian Communist party for "formalism" in his composing, now has been awarded the Order of Lenin, the highest honor that his country can bestow upon a civilian. Newspapers that once were harsh in their criticism of the composer, now have carried columns of praise. They are saying that in the past he has been unjustly accused.

* * *

Have you bought your tickets for the Jackson Symphony orchestra concerts this year? The orchestra needs your support, both in money and in attendance at its concerts, the first of which is Oct. 25.

* * *

Liberace, in London for his first concert tour, has surprised London critics. One newspaper columnist said he was surprised that the pianist failed to wear diamond rings shaped like grand pianos. "Not even the taps on his shoes were shaped like grand pianos," said the critic for the London Times. Liberace gave his first concert in London's Royal Festival hall before a capacity crowd said to be 90 per cent female. Most critics agreed that the American was a better showman than a pianist.

* * *

One of Britain's young composers has completed a "Grand Overture" which features a vacuum cleaner, an electric floor polisher and repeating rifles, the Associated Press reports from London.

"My Overture," said Malcolm Arnold, 35, "is to be part of a concert at Royal Festival hall Nov. 13. I admit that some people may call it crazy, but, basically, it's a serious work."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 9,986

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 13,357

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
ATHOL, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 4,541

OCT 5 1956

Boston Symphony Opens 76th Season

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 76th season tonight with an official "welcome home" from President Eisenhower after a successful European tour.

Orchestra officials disclosed receipt of the following telegram from the president:

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe had given me great satisfaction. Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchesra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544

OCT 4 1956

Record Demand for Season Tickets Bared

National Symphony Opens Biggest Season Oct. 16

An expanded, more varied concert season is being offered by the National Symphony Orchestra starting Oct. 16, and the demand for season tickets has been nearly twice as great as last year at this time.

"It features the greatest lineup of artists we could possibly get together," said Manager Ralph Black. They include such familiar names as Iturbi, Francescatti, Rubinstein, Hess, Menuhin, Beecham and others.

Mr. Mitchell

A "revolutionary idea" has been added to the regular Tuesday-Wednesday night series, he said, in that it will include visits by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Royal Danish Ballet Company.

He said it is the first time an orchestra has presented two others and a ballet company in its series. This Constitution Hall series itself has been expanded from 10 to 15 concerts.

TICKETS AT PREMIUM

"This is apparently what they want," said Mr. Black, because 3300 season tickets have been sold so far. There were 1800 sold at this time last year, when the final total was a postwar record of 3888. The Symphony played to 365,000 persons in its 31-week schedule last year, he said.

This year the same concert will be presented on both Tuesday and Wednesday, so concert-goers can choose either night. The Symphony will also have its largest full complement of musicians—96.

Director Howard Mitchell will introduce a total of 15 new works in 11 concerts, three of them world premieres, the rest never played by the Symphony here before. A Beethoven Festival is also included in the series.

Season tickets are available at the Symphony box office at 1108 G-st nw. They are priced from $13.50 to $45.00. Student tickets are $9.00.

Among the 175 concerts to be played by the Symphony this season are:

- The Lisner matinee series of six concerts on Thursday at 2:30 p. m., starting Oct. 24.
- The Prince Georges Series of four concerts starting Oct. 25.
- The five-week Music for Young America series starting April 16.
- The Saturday night Pops concerts starting Oct. 27. There will be six of them.
- The Montgomery County series of two concerts starting Nov. 25.

The Symphony will also play at the Redskin game on Oct. 14, will play a series of youth programs and will make two tours, one to New England and the other to the South.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 6 1956

Society:

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Boston's music season opened this week with double distinction. First came the two Mason Music Foundation concerts on Thursday and Friday evenings at Jordan Hall, renewing a Boston tradition of free concerts made possible by the late Fanny Peabody Mason. And on Friday came the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening of its 1956-57 concerts after its fabulously rewarding tour of Europe and Asia this Summer.

The exciting first concert gave Bostonians a chance to hear the Societa Corelli in a satisfying program of Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Mardini and a newly discovered Sonata in C by Paganini.

Music Foundation committee members, led by Paul Doguereau and including Lewis Armistead, Edward F. McNichol, Arlen Coolidge, William P. Mitchell, Mrs. M. John Matthews and Miss Odette Doguereau, were at Jordan Hall to receive the approbation of friends of the late Miss Mason for their choice of concerts.

The next concert will be a much-anticipated recital by Liedersinger Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau on Oct. 23. On Dec. 6 and 7 the Societa Corelli returns for another pair of concerts.

Mason concert regulars at the opening concerts included Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Orson Adams, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Susannah Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. Robert O'Leary (Eleanor Buggie), Baron Charles de Pamploune, French consul, and Mme. de Pamplonne; Earl Appleton, German Consul Werner and Mme. von Holleben, Burton Mills, David McKibbon and Belgian Consul Charles Navez and Mme. Navez.

RAISING FUNDS for scholarships is the aim of members of St. Elizabeth's Hospital Alumnae Association who are sponsoring an autumn bridge and tea party scheduled for 3 p. m. Oct. 18 in the hospital auditorium.

Miss Mary Simeone [illegible] cular ave., Natick, heads the committee for the benefit, and is also in charge of reservations.

ARLINGTON today [illegible] Agnes Church. Miss Maura [illegible] Ann Brewer, daughter of Mr. John K. Brewer and the late Mr. Brewer of Arlington, [illegible] become the bride of Francis [illegible] Daly, son of Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] rick J. Daly of Jackson Heights, N. Y.

The bride, who will be given in marriage by her brother, John Jr., is wearing a portrait dress of alencon lace embroidered with seed pearls and sequins, and fashioned with a court train. A tulle [illegible] matching lace will hold her French illusion veil and she will carry a white [illegible] orchids and stephanotis.

Mrs. William T. [illegible] of Medford is maid of honor and bridesmaids are Misses [illegible]

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 248,340

OCT 6 1956

Boston Symphony Lists Beethoven Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of WSB-NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," Monday at 8:15 p.m.

Charles Munch, starting his eighth season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct.

Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist. The work is in three movements: (1) Allegro ma non troppo, (2) Larghetto, (3) Finale: Rondo.

The new series of programs will consist of major selections from the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon concerts at Boston's celebrated Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Munch will be the conductor for most of the programs. Several noted guest conductors and distinguished soloists also will appear with the orchestra.

This will be the 76th season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a 28-concert European tour.

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347

OCT 4 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Two UM Concert Series Get Under Way This Month With 5 Concerts; First Tonight

The 78th annual Choral union concert series in Ann Arbor gets under way tonight with the appearance of Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, in Hill auditorium. The joint recital raises the curtain on a musical season that features some of the greatest musical attractions in the field. During October there will be five concerts in both the Choral union series and the Extra concert series.

Mantovani and His New Music will open the Extra series Oct. 11. This artist has won a tremendous following through his recordings, and it is expected to be one of the greatest drawing cards at the university this season.

Two superb symphony orchestras will be presented in three concerts during the month, also. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, will give a concert Monday, Oct. 15, in the Choral union series, and two days later in the Extra series. Herbert von Karajan, perhaps the greatest conductor in Europe today, and certainly one of the foremost in the world, will bring his Berlin Philharmonic orchestra to Ann Arbor for a concert in the Choral union series, Sunday, Oct. 21.

Von Karajan is one of the few conductors who has recorded all nine of the Beethoven symphonies [illegible] cent[illegible]

A one writ Mo 78. ine of tish for Ga Ap Th

a producer, with such shows as "The Gingham Girl" and "Bye Bye, Bonnie."

* * *

Dimitri Shostakovich, once severely reprimanded by the Russian Communist party for "formalism" in his composing, now has been awarded the Order of Lenin, the highest honor that his country can bestow upon a civilian. Newspapers that once were harsh in their criticism of the composer, now have carried columns of praise. They are saying that in the past he has been unjustly accused.

* * *

Have you bought your tickets for the Jackson Symphony orchestra concerts this year? The orchestra needs your support, both in money and in attendance at its concerts, the first of which is Oct. 25.

* * *

Liberace, in London for his first concert tour, has surprised London critics. One newspaper columnist said he was surprised that the pianist failed to wear diamond rings shaped like grand pianos. "Not even the taps on his shoes were shaped like grand pianos," said the critic for the London Times. Liberace gave his first concert in London's Royal Festival hall before a capacity crowd said to be 90 per cent female. Most critics agreed that the American was a better showman than a pianist.

* * *

[illegible] of Britain's young com- [illegible] has completed a "Grand [illegible]ite" which features a [illegible]m cleaner, an electric [illegible] polisher and repeating [illegible] the Associated Press re- [illegible] from London.

[illegible] Overture," said Malcolm [illegible]d, 35, "is to be part of a [illegible]rt at Royal Festival hall [illegible]13. I admit that some peo- [illegible]ay call it crazy, but, basic- [illegible]t's a serious work."

OHS

their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchesra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

OCT 5 1956

Symphony to Open 76th Season Tonight

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 76th season tonight with an official "welcome home" from President Eisenhower after a successful European tour.

Orchestra officials disclosed receipt of the following telegram from the president:

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe had given me great satisfaction. Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchestra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544

OCT 4 1956

Record Demand for Season Tickets Bared

National Symphony Opens Biggest Season Oct. 16

An expanded, more varied concert season is being offered by the National Symphony Orchestra starting Oct. 16, and the demand for season tickets has been nearly twice as great as last year at this time.

"It features the greatest lineup of artists we could possibly get together," said Manager Ralph Black. They include such familiar names as Iturbi, Francescatti, Rubinstein, Hess, Menuhin, Beecham and others.

Mr. Mitchell

A "revolutionary idea" has been added to the regular Tuesday-Wednesday night series, he said, in that it will include visits by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Royal Danish Ballet Company.

He said it is the first time an orchestra has presented two others and a ballet company in its series. This Constitution Hall series itself has been expanded from 10 to 15 concerts.

TICKETS AT PREMIUM

"This is apparently what they want," said Mr. Black, because 3300 season tickets have been sold so far. There were 1800 sold at this time last year, when the final total was a postwar record of 3888. The Symphony played to 365,000 persons in its 31-week schedule last year, he said.

This year the same concert will be presented on both Tuesday and Wednesday, so concert-goers can choose either night. The Symphony will also have its largest full complement of musicians—96.

Director Howard Mitchell will introduce a total of 15 new works in 11 concerts, three of them world premieres, the rest never played by the Symphony here before. A Beethoven Festival is also included in the series.

Season tickets are available at the Symphony box office at 1108 G-st nw. They are priced from $13.50 to $45.00. Student tickets are $9.00.

Among the 175 concerts to be played by the Symphony this season are:

- The Lisner matinee series of six concerts on Thursday at 2:30 p. m., starting Oct. 24.
- The Prince Georges Series of four concerts starting Oct. 25.
- The five-week Music for Young America series starting April 16.
- The Saturday night Pops concerts starting Oct. 27. There will be six of them.
- The Montgomery County series of two concerts starting Nov. 25.

The Symphony will also play at the Redskin game on Oct. 14, will play a series of youth programs and will make two tours, one to New England and the other to the South.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 6 1956

Society:

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Boston's music season opened this week with double distinction. First came the two Mason Music Foundation concerts on Thursday and Friday evenings at Jordan Hall, renewing a Boston tradition of free concerts made possible by the late Fanny Peabody Mason. And on Friday came the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening of its 1956-57 concerts after its fabulously rewarding tour of Europe and Asia this Summer.

The exciting first concert gave Bostonians a chance to hear the Societa Corelli in a satisfying program of Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Mardini and a newly discovered Sonata in C by Paganini.

Music Foundation committee members, led by Paul Doguereau and including Lewis Armistead, Edward F. McNichol, Arlen Coolidge, William P. Mitchell, Mrs. M. John Matthews and Miss Odette Doguereau, were at Jordan Hall to receive the approbation of friends of the late Miss Mason for their choice of concerts.

The next concert will be a much-anticipated recital by liedersinger Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau on Oct. 23. On Dec. 6 and 7, the Societa Corelli returns for another pair of concerts.

Mason concert regulars at the opening concerts included Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Mrs. A. Clement Fitcomb, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Orson Adams, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Susannah Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. O'Leary (Eleanor Ruggles), Baron Charles de Pamplonne, French consul, and Mme. de Pamplonne; Earl Appleton, German Consul Werner and Mme. von Holleben, Burton Miller, David McKibbon, and Belgian Consul Charles Navez and Mme. Navez.

RAISING FUNDS for scholarships is the aim of members of St. Elizabeth's Hospital Alumnae Association who are sponsoring an autumn bridge and whist party scheduled for 8 p. m. Oct. 18 in the hospital auditorium.

Miss Mary Simeone [illegible] Circular ave., Natick, heads the committee for the benefit, and is also in charge of reservations.

ARLINGTON today at [illegible] Agnes Church, Miss Marcia [illegible] Ann Brewer, daughter of Mrs. John K. Brewer and the late Mr. Brewer of Arlington, will become the bride of Francis [illegible] Daly, son of Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] rick J. Daly of Jackson Heights, N. Y.

The bride, who will be given in marriage by her brother, John Jr., is wearing a portrait dress of alencon lace embroidered with seed pearls and sequins, and fashioned with a court train. A juliet [illegible] of matching lace will hold in place her French illusion veil, and she will carry a white missal with orchids and stephanotis.

Mrs. William T. Wellman of Medford is maid of honor and bridesmaids are Miss Judith

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 248,340

OCT 6 1956

Boston Symphony Lists Beethoven Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of WSB-NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," Monday at 8:15 p.m.

Charles Munch, starting his eighth season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct.

Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist. The work is in three movements: (1) Allegro ma non troppo, (2) Larghetto, (3) Finale: Rondo.

The new series of programs will consist of major selections from the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon concerts at Boston's celebrated Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Munch will be the conductor for most of the programs. Several noted guest conductors and distinguished soloists also will appear with the orchestra.

This will be the 76th season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a 28-concert European tour.

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347

OCT 4 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Two UM Concert Series Get Under Way This Month With 5 Concerts; First Tonight

The 78th annual Choral union concert series in Ann Arbor gets under way tonight with the appearance of Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, in Hill auditorium. The joint recital raises the curtain on a musical season that features some of the greatest musical attractions in the field. During October there will be five concerts in both the Choral union series and the Extra concert series.

Mantovani and His New Music will open the Extra series Oct. 11. This artist has won a tremendous following through his recordings and it is expected to be one of the greatest drawing cards at the university this season.

Two superb symphony orchestras will be presented in three concerts during the month, also. The Boston Symphony, cond[illegible] will [illegible] Oct. [illegible] serie[illegible] the [illegible] Kar[illegible] cond[illegible] cert[illegible] in t[illegible] lin[illegible] Ann[illegible] Che[illegible] Oct[illegible]

a producer, with such shows as "The Gingham Girl" and "Bye Bye, Bonnie."

* * *

Dimitri Shostakovich, once severely reprimanded by the Russian Communist party for "formalism" in his composing, now has been awarded the Order of Lenin, the highest honor that his country can bestow upon a civilian. Newspapers that once were harsh in their criticism of the composer, now have carried columns of praise. They are saying that in the past he has been unjustly accused.

* * *

Have you bought your tickets for the Jackson Symphony orchestra concerts this year? The orchestra needs your support, both in money and in attendance at its concerts, the first of which is Oct. 25.

* * *

[illegible] ace, in London for his [illegible] oncert tour, has sur- [illegible] London critics. One news- [illegible] olumnist said he was sur- [illegible] hat the pianist failed to [illegible] amond rings shaped like [illegible] pianos. "Not even the [illegible] his shoes were shaped [illegible] nd pianos," said the critic [illegible] London Times. Liberace [illegible] first concert in London's [illegible] Festival hall before a [illegible] crowd said to be 90 per [illegible] male. Most critics agreed [illegible] e American was a better [illegible] n than a pianist.

* * *

[illegible] of Britain's young com- [illegible] has completed a "Grand [illegible] e" which features a [illegible] cleaner, an electric [illegible] polisher and repeating [illegible] the Associated Press re- [illegible] rom London.

[illegible] Overture," said Malcolm [illegible] 35, "is to be part of a [illegible] ncert at Royal Festival hall [illegible] ov. 13. I admit that some peo- [illegible] e may call it crazy, but, basic- [illegible] ly, it's a serious work."

S. of I. Women Invited To Pittsfield Monday

The North Adams Ladies' lodge, Sons of Italy, met Wednesday night in Sons of Italy hall with 40 members present. A report on the current membership drive was given by Miss Margaret Astorino, chairman.

Members of the local lodge have been invited to attend a meeting of the Pittsfield lodge Monday evening, when the Grand Venerable John Guerino will be present, and several plan to attend. A food sale will be held Friday, Oct. 19, at the Boston Store.

A social followed and the tables were decorated in a fall [illegible] Mrs. Joann Ma- [illegible] theme.

her up to early today.

Circ. 12,[illegible]

OCT 5 1956

SYMPHONY HOME

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 76th season tonight with an official "welcome home" from President Eisenhower after a successful European tour.

Orchestra officials disclosed receipt of the following telegram from the President:

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe have given me great satisfaction. Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchestra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544

OCT 4 1956

Record Demand for Season Tickets Bared

National Symphony Opens Biggest Season Oct. 16

An expanded, more varied concert season is being offered by the National Symphony Orchestra starting Oct. 16, and the demand for season tickets has been nearly twice as great as last year at this time.

"It features the greatest lineup of artists we could possibly get together," said Manager Ralph Black. They include such familiar names as Iturbi, Francescatti, Rubinstein, Hess, Menuhin, Beecham and others.

Mr. Mitchell

A "revolutionary idea" has been added to the regular Tuesday-Wednesday night series, he said, in that it will include visits by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Royal Danish Ballet Company.

He said it is the first time an orchestra has presented two others and a ballet company in its series. This Constitution Hall series itself has been expanded from 10 to 15 concerts.

TICKETS AT PREMIUM

"This is apparently what they want," said Mr. Black, because 3300 season tickets have been sold so far. There were 1800 sold at this time last year, when the final total was a postwar record of 3888. The Symphony played to 365,000 persons in its 31-week schedule last year, he said.

This year the same concert will be presented on both Tuesday and Wednesday, so concert-goers can choose either night. The Symphony will also have its largest full complement of musicians—96.

Director Howard Mitchell will introduce a total of 15 new works in 11 concerts, three of them world premieres, the rest never played by the Symphony here before. A Beethoven Festival is also included in the series.

Season tickets are available at the Symphony box office at 1108 G-st nw. They are priced from $13.50 to $45.00. Student tickets are $9.00.

Among the 175 concerts to be played by the Symphony this season are:

- The Lisner matinee series of six concerts on Thursday at 2:30 p. m., starting Oct. 24.
- The Prince Georges Series of four concerts starting Oct. 25.
- The five-week Music for Young America series starting April 16.
- The Saturday night Pops concerts starting Oct. 27. There will be six of them.
- The Montgomery County series of two concerts starting Nov. 25.

The Symphony will also play at the Redskin game on Oct. 14, will play a series of youth programs and will make two tours, one to New England and the other to the South.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 248,340

OCT 6 1956

Boston Symphony Lists Beethoven Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of WSB-NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," Monday at 8:15 p.m.

Charles Munch, starting his eighth season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct.

Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist. The work is in three movements: (1) Allegro ma non troppo, (2) Larghetto, (3) Finale: Rondo.

The new series of programs will consist of major selections from the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon concerts at Boston's celebrated Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Munch will be the conductor for most of the programs. Several noted guest conductors and distinguished soloists also will appear with the orchestra.

This will be the 76th season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a 28-concert European tour.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 6 1956

Society:

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Boston's music season opened this week with double distinction. First came the two Mason Music Foundation concerts on Thursday and Friday evenings at Jordan Hall, renewing a Boston tradition of free concerts made possible by the late Fanny Peabody Mason. And on Friday came the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening of its 1956-57 concerts after its fabulously rewarding tour of Europe and Asia this Summer.

The exciting first concert gave Bostonians a chance to hear the Societa Corelli in a satisfying program of Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Mardini and a newly discovered Sonata in C by Paganini.

Music Foundation committee members, led by Paul Doguereau and including Lewis Armistead, Edward F. McNichol, Arlen Coolidge, William P. Mitchell, Mrs. M. John Matthews and Miss Odette Doguereau, were at Jordan Hall to receive the approbation of friends of the late Miss Mason for their choice of concerts.

The next concert will be a much-anticipated recital by liedersinger Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau on Oct. 23. On Dec. 6 and 7, the Societa Corelli returns for another pair of concerts.

Mason concert regulars at the opening concerts included Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Mrs. A. Clement Fitcomb, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Orson Adams, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Susannah Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. O'Leary (Eleanor Ruggles), Baron Charles de Pamplonne, French consul, and Mme. de Pamplonne; Earl Appleton, German Consul Werner and Mme. von Holleben, Burton Mills, David McKibbon and Belgian Consul Charles Navez and Mme. Navez.

RAISING FUNDS for scholarships is the aim of members of St. Elizabeth's Hospital Alumnae Association who are sponsoring an autumn bridge and whist party scheduled for 8 p. m. Oct. 18 in the hospital auditorium.

Miss Mary Simeone [illegible] cular ave., Natick, heads the committee for the benefit, and is also in charge of reservations.

ARLINGTON today at St. Agnes Church, Miss Marcia [illegible] Ann Brewer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John K. Brewer and the late Mr. Brewer of Arlington, will become the bride of Francis [illegible] Daly, son of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick J. Daly of Jackson Heights, N. Y.

The bride, who will be given in marriage by her brother, John Jr., is wearing a portrait dress of alencon lace embroidered with seed pearls and sequins, and fashioned with a court train. A juliet cap of matching lace will hold in place her French illusion veil, and she will carry a white missal with orchids and stephanotis.

Mrs. William T. Vollmer of Medford is maid of honor, and bridesmaids are Miss Judith

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347

OCT 4 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Two UM Concert Series Get Under Way This Month With 5 Concerts; First Tonight

The 78th annual Choral union concert series in Ann Arbor gets under way tonight with the appearance of Kurt Baum, tenor, and Herva Nelli, soprano, in Hill auditorium. The joint recital raises the curtain on a musical season that features some of the greatest musical attractions in the field. During October there [illegible] concerts in both the [illegible] and the Extra [illegible]

His New Music [illegible] series Oct. [illegible] won a tre- [illegible] through his [illegible] expected to [illegible] est drawing [illegible] this sea- [illegible]

[illegible] by orches- [illegible] in three [illegible] month, [illegible] Symphony, [illegible] Munch, [illegible] Monday, [illegible] union [illegible] ter in- [illegible] von [illegible] atest [illegible] and [illegible] most [illegible]

a producer, with such shows as "The Gingham Girl" and "Bye Bye, Bonnie."

* * *

Dimitri Shostakovich, once severely reprimanded by the Russian Communist party for "formalism" in his composing, now has been awarded the Order of Lenin, the highest honor that his country can bestow upon a civilian. Newspapers that once were harsh in their criticism of the composer, now have carried columns of praise. They are saying that in the past he has been unjustly accused.

* * *

Have you bought your tickets for the Jackson Symphony orchestra concerts this year? The orchestra needs your support, both in money and in attendance at its concerts, the first of which is Oct. 25.

* * *

Liberace, in London for his first concert tour, has surprised London critics. One newspaper columnist said he was surprised that the pianist failed to wear diamond rings shaped like grand pianos. "Not even the taps on his shoes were shaped like grand pianos," said the critic for the London Times. Liberace gave his first concert in London's Royal Festival hall before a capacity crowd said to be 90 per cent female. Most critics agreed that the American was a better showman than a pianist.

* * *

One of Britain's young composers has completed a "Grand Overture" which features a vacuum cleaner, an electric floor polisher and repeating rifles, the Associated Press reports from London.

"My Overture," said Malcolm Arnold, 35, "is to be part of a concert at Royal Festival hall Nov. 13. I admit that some people may call it crazy, but, basically, it's a serious work."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544

OCT 4 1956

Record Demand for Season Tickets Bared

National Symphony Opens Biggest Season Oct. 16

An expanded, more varied concert season is being offered by the National Symphony Orchestra starting Oct. 16, and the demand for season tickets has been nearly twice as great as last year at this time.

"It features the greatest lineup of artists we could possibly get together," said Manager Ralph Black. They include such familiar names as Iturbi, Francescatti, Rubinstein, Hess, Menuhin, Beecham and others.

Mr. Mitchell

A "revolutionary idea" has been added to the regular Tuesday-Wednesday night series, he said, in that it will include visits by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Royal Danish Ballet Company.

He said it is the first time an orchestra has presented two others and a ballet company in its series. This Constitution Hall series itself has been expanded from 10 to 15 concerts.

TICKETS AT PREMIUM

"This is apparently what they want," said Mr. Black, because 3300 season tickets have been sold so far. There were 1800 sold at this time last year, when the final total was a postwar record of 3888. The Symphony played to 365,000 persons in its 31-week schedule last year, he said.

This year the same concert will be presented on both Tuesday and Wednesday, so concert-goers can choose either night. The Symphony will also have its largest full complement of musicians—96.

Director Howard Mitchell will introduce a total of 15 new works in 11 concerts, three of them world premieres, the rest never played by the Symphony here before. A Beethoven Festival is also included in the series.

Season tickets are available at the Symphony box office at 1108 G-st nw. They are priced from $13.50 to $45.00. Student tickets are $9.00.

Among the 175 concerts to be played by the Symphony this season are:

- The Lisner matinee series of six concerts on Thursday at 2:30 p. m., starting Oct. 24.
- The Prince Georges Series of four concerts starting Oct. 25.
- The five-week Music for Young America series starting April 16.
- The Saturday night Pops concerts starting Oct. 27. There will be six of them.
- The Montgomery County series of two concerts starting Nov. 25.

The Symphony will also play at the Redskin game on Oct. 14, will play a series of youth programs and will make two tours, one to New England and the other to the South.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 6 1956

Society:

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Boston's music season opened this week with double distinction. First came the two Mason Music Foundation concerts on Thursday and Friday evenings at Jordan Hall, renewing a Boston tradition of free concerts made possible by the late Fanny Peabody Mason. And on Friday came the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening of its 1956-57 concerts after its fabulously rewarding tour of Europe and Asia this Summer.

The exciting first concert gave Bostonians a chance to hear the Societa Corelli in a satisfying program of Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Mardini and a newly discovered Sonata in C by Paganini.

Music Foundation committee members, led by Paul Doguereau and including Lewis Armistead, Edward F. McNichol, Arlen Coolidge, William P. Mitchell, Mrs. M. John Matthews and Miss Odette Doguereau, were at Jordan Hall to receive the approbation of friends of the late Miss Mason for their choice of concerts.

The next concert will be a much-anticipated recital by liedersinger Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau on Oct. 23. On Dec. 6 and 7, the Societa Corelli returns for another pair of concerts.

Mason concert regulars at the opening concerts included Mrs Jasper Whiting, Mrs A Clement Fitcomb, Mr. and Mrs Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Orson Adams, Mrs Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Susannah Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. O'Leary (Eleanor Ruggles), Baron Charles de Pamplonne, French consul, and Mme de Pamplonne; Earl Appleton, German Consul Werner and Mme von Holleben, Burton Miller, David McKibbon, and Belgian Consul Charles Navez and Mme Navez.

RAISING FUNDS for scholarships is the aim of members of St Elizabeth's Hospital Alumnae Association who are sponsoring an autumn bridge and whist party scheduled for 8 p. m. Oct. 18 in the hospital auditorium.

Miss Mary Simeone [illegible] circular ave., Natick, heads the committee for the benefit, and is also in charge of reservations.

ARLINGTON today at St. Agnes Church, Miss Margaret Ann Brewer, daughter of Mr. and John K. Brewer and the late Mr. Brewer of Arlington, will become the bride of Frederic F. Daly, son of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick J. Daly of Jackson Heights, N. Y.

The bride, who will be given in marriage by her brother, John Jr., is wearing a portrait dress of alencon lace embroidered with seed pearls and sequins, and fashioned with a court train. A juliet cap of matching lace will hold in place her French illusion veil, and she will carry a white missal with orchids and stephanotis.

Mrs. William T. [illegible] of Medford is maid of honor, and bridesmaids are Miss Judith

OCT 5 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Season

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 76th season tonight with an official "welcome home" from President Eisenhower after a successful European tour.

Orchestra officials disclosed receipt of the following telegram from the president:

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe had given me great satisfaction. Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

The orchestra gave concerts in 13 countries, including Russia, with the financial aid of the president's Fund for International Affairs.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 248,340

OCT 6 1956

Boston Symphony Lists Beethoven Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of WSB-NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," Monday at 8:15 p.m.

Charles Munch, starting his eighth season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct.

Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist. The work is in three movements: (1) Allegro ma non troppo, (2) Larghetto, (3) Finale: Rondo.

The new series of programs will consist of major selections from the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon concerts at Boston's celebrated Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Munch will be the conductor for most of the programs. Several noted guest conductors and distinguished soloists also will appear with the orchestra.

This will be the 76th season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a 28-concert European tour.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 6 1956

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Loyal Subscribers Give Symphony Warm Welcome Back Home

BACK HOME from its successful 28-concert European tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Friday afternoon concert of its 76th season at Symphony Hall yesterday. Loyal subscribers gave a warm welcome to their beloved orchestra and Charles Munch, who started his eighth season as conductor. Tucked in each program was a copy of a letter from President Eisenhower to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, congratulating the orchestra for a job well done in advancing the cause of international understanding. Yesterday, Dr. Munch chose the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert with the orchestra in Oct., 1949, the Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber. Then came the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut. After the intermission Dr. Munch conducted Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominently in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received.

* * *

PERFECT FALL WEATHER added to the festive atmosphere of the opening concert as friends greeted friends after the long summer months. Trim tailored suits were much in evidence, some worn with mink stoles. And new hats of modish beaver appeared in the crop of usual Boston bonnets. Familiar in the large and enthusiastic throng were Mrs. John S. Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott, Mrs. Arthur W. Bell, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Jerome C. Hunsaker, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs Edwin Cave, Mrs. F. Delano Putnam, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, Mrs. Frank C. Nichols, Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Mrs. George Gaston Smith, Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, Jr., Mrs. Gilbert King, Mrs. Percival Gilbert, Sr., Mrs. Henderson Inches, Jr., Mrs. G. Glenn Potter, Mrs. H. James Crossan, Jr., Mrs. Sydney Harwood, Mrs. B. Harrison Ragle and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark.

MRS. CLARK

* * *

A CALIFORNIA READER of the Social Chatter column writes to tell us about "Chailey," her former home in Newburyport, which we mentioned the other day as being the new home of Col. and Mrs. Ronald V. C. Bodley, formerly of Brimmer Street. She's Mrs. George O. Clark of Santa Barbara, where she and her husband, Dr. Clark, moved within the last month. They continue to subscribe to the Herald. Mrs. Clark tells us that the original part of the house was built in 1792. It belonged to her uncle, Charles W. Moseley. When he died he willed to the town of Newburyport a beautiful portion of this land to be used as a recreational park and also provided a fund for its upkeep. He also left in his will to his brother, Frederick S. Moseley, Mrs. Bodley's father, a portion of his estate called Laurel Hill, where once stood the famous and picturesque Moulton wooden castle. Thirty-five years ago, when Charles Moseley died, Dr. and Mrs. Clark bought "Chailey" from his estate. They lived there ever since during the summer months and recently spent two winters there. During those years the grounds at "Chailey" developed to such an extent that they were awarded the Hollis H. Hunnewell medal for horticultural excellence, especially for rhododendrons, azaleas, mountain laurel and liliums, among which were many specimens hybridized by Dr. Clark and recognized as worthwhile contributions to horticulture.

* * *

A DINNER DANCE will be given for Ellen Thorndike, Saturday evening, Oct. 13, by her parents, the Albert Thorndikes of Milton, and her grandmother, Mrs. Frank C. Paine. The party will take place at "Greenways", Mrs. Paine's home in Wayland. Christopher Grant will be the head usher, assisted by Albert Thorndike, Jr. Other ushers will include Anthony Low, John P. Ganson, W. Luke Marbury, 3rd, Michael Robertson, Henry H. Thayer, Brenton H. Dickson, IV, Thomas A. Robertson, 2nd, Thomas W. Synott, 3rd, and Robert Cabot. Ruby Newman will furnish the music for dancing. Ellen was graduated from Milton Academy and is a freshman at Bryn Mawr College. She's a provisional member of the Junior League.

* * *

TWO BOSTON POST-DEBS at Smith College are coming in for their share of prominence. Susan Hale Bowditch, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Francis Bowditch of Cambridge and Little Boar's Head, Rye Beach, N.H., and a sophomore at Smith, was recently appointed to be a member of Gold Key, an honorary association of student guides who conduct visitors about the campus. Sue was president of her class at Smith last year and is now serving as acting president of the freshman class. Eleanor Baldwin Tripp, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William V. Tripp, Jr., of Chestnut Hill, and a junior at the college, was recently appointed to be food chairman of Sophia's Circus, the annual Smith College Carnival which launches the campaign for the campus community fund chest drive, which aids students here and abroad. Sophia's Circus will be held Oct. 17 and this year's event will be based on "The Odyssey" theme.

MISS BOWDITCH

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 6 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the first concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Wolfgang Schneidrhan, violinist. The program:
Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Concerto in D, Op. 61 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ..... Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

If there was any indication that the 104 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra had completed an 11,000 mile tour of Europe less than seven days ago and had plunged into its strenuous new season without any vacation whatever (and only one rehearsal) I missed it entirely yesterday afternoon as it began its 76th year. It played with all the elan, all the vitality, all the incomparable virtuosity of an ensemble fresh from a six week vacation . . . and did so without the slightest sense of strain, weariness of spirit or fatigue.

What, when you get right down to it, a monument to the morale, the essential vigor of this incomparable organization.

There were no novelties on yesterday's program. The Eroica has been its tour de force throughout the European tour and, although I heard it done from Edinburgh to the Chartres cathedral, from a chair in the audience or sitting on a trunk backstage, it excited me as much yesterday as it did in Moscow. One might expect that Mr. Munch had now explored every facet of this mighty work, yet he does it a little differently each time, finding new aspects of its inexhaustible riches with every reading. Yesterday, in the familiar acoustic frame of Symphony Hall, he gave its funeral march a feeling of overwhelming tragic implication, yet relieved by the most tender quality of solace in the contrasted lyrical section.

All in all it was a highly charged affair, from the turbulent opening movement to the astonishing evolutions of the final variation. And it was flawlessly performed, which is all the more astonishing for the fact that the orchestra has played it so much in recent weeks that it might well approach it carelessly as the result of over-familiarity.

A distinguished Viennese violinist made his American debut on this occasion. He was Wolfgang Schneiderhan, a dark, compact sort of man of great attainment on his instrument. He produces a big tone, one that displays a wide variety of coloration, and his technique, if it does not seem to suggest the virtuoso of the very highest level, is very brilliant. He obviously knows this great work inside out and his phrasing was of high artistry. It took him a while to play his way in, which is hardly surprising considering the hazards of a debut, but he warmed to the task admirably and finished in very fine style. I was baffled by the cadenza he used in the first movement. It is not, I am afraid, any too suited to the work, the heavy quadruple stoppings proved often harsh and out-of-key with the preceding materials presented by the composer. I could not, in any case, find much to admire in it, though the violinist overcame its obvious difficulties well enough.

Next week the orchestra settles down to the new season with Bach's B minor Suite for Flute and Strings (Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist); Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and the following weeks starts off on its travels again. No rest, it seems, for the weary!

Dr. Munch closed the program with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, one that he played through Europe. Both he and his musicians knew it so well that it was more than ever surcharged with Munchian electricity, and there were times when one expected thunderbolts to fly from the tip of his baton.

This wasn't true, of course, of the Funeral March, dramatically done in the best sense of the word, but it was again true of the Scherzo and the Finale. Dr. Munch has also developed a few stylistic variations to his conducting which add to the impact—the technique, for instance, of becoming almost motionless when the music is most active. It is the power gained through restraint.

Wolfgang Schneiderhan has just arrived from Vienna and made his American debut yesterday as soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto. As a performer he is exceedingly fine, a statement intended to be more than faint praise and less than ecstatic. In the opening movement his playing was appropriately done and pleasing to listen to, not often warming the heart but taking fire in the brilliantly done cadenza.

He gave a superb account of himself in the Larghetto, however, with Mr. Munch backing him up in each tender and delicate nuance. In the Rondo (in which Beethoven's theme never

AMUSE

131

Home Audience Cheers Symphony; Ike Lauds European Tour Success

Globe Oct 6

By CYRUS DURGIN

The home audience of Boston Symphony subscribers cheered the orchestra as it began a new season—the 76th—at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Meanwhile, President Eisenhower had sent to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, a letter congratulating the orchestra upon the success of the recent tour in Europe and Soviet Russia.

"Since all people want peace, it is necessary for the people of all nations to correspond at all levels and work out methods by which we can gradually learn more of each other. The exchange of artists is one of the most effective methods of strengthening world friendship," wrote the chief executive. "Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

This letter was printed in facsimile, and a copy inserted in each program book.

Because of the resounding triumph across the Atlantic, there was more than usual of an expectant buzz in the lobby as the audience took their seats before the concert. When Mr. Munch appeared on stage, the gathering rose to greet him, as usual at season openings. But, I think, they applauded a little more ardently and stood a little longer than customary.

A Beginning in Theory

The initial program began with the Overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber; included one of the works featured on the European tour—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and had as it middle portion the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan as soloist.

In a sense of continuous operation, this beginning of a season was only theoretical, for actually the Orchestra has not ceased to function for a full year. The usual vacation period had to be omitted, since the players took off for Europe as soon as the Berkshire Festival was over. For them, this week's concerts are but a resumption of activity following a few days of rest.

Tired they may be, in comparison to their state of health and well-being usual at this time of year. But no fatigue showed in the brilliance and the verge of their playing yesterday. Indeed, Mr. Munch started off with just a trifle too much speed and drive in the Weber Overture, and the musicians readily responded to his wishes.

This is indication of the fact the Orchestra are all "old pros." Time and again, when we were in Europe, I marveled at the consistent virtuosity, magnificence even, of their playing when all connected with the tour knew they were tired. Old pros never show that, they go on their nerve and play their best, and because they are so fine, individually and as an ensemble, they make the music "sing" freshly and with glow.

The "Eroica" A Test

The "Eroica" must have been a test for them, and for Mr. Munch too, in this respect, for they had played it eight times overseas. Enough to make it wear very thin for them, temporarily. You would not have judged so by the vigorous and generally polished performance yesterday. True, the slow movement was not quite so tidy as it might have been, but that, I think, stemmed from the conductor's basic treatment of the movement.

Mr. Munch takes the funeral march as a symphonic movement of steady progress and "long line," and perhaps just a hair too fast. Inherently the music is music of steady rhythm overlaid with an enormous amount of sculptured detail, in which extremely precise note values, exact attacks and very delicate balance between sections of the orchestra—and solo instruments—are of the utmost importance. It may be that the conductor's temperament leads him to avoid such fussiness of detail, as if he were impatient of it. But little nuances demand the first consideration in this movement.

Schneiderhan Excellent

Wolfgang Schneiderhan is a Viennese, a little over 41. He is also the husband of soprano Irmgard Seefried, a fact included for the sake of a biographical record. He is an excellent violinist, and he is also a musician of much taste and technical resource. I kept thinking of Fritz Kreisler as Mr. Schneiderhan played the Beethoven Concerto, for his interpretation has something of Kreisler's intimacy, tenderness and relaxed singing ease. The articulation of notes was impeccably clear, each phrase was turned with the rhythm and the grace of a born musician.

Schneiderhan takes the first movement rather more slowly than most play it today. That may have meant less brilliance, but it did not alter essential character. The tempo was in keeping with Schneiderhan's own quality, for he seems to play with but one object: to let the music sound for itself. Though a virtuoso, Mr. Schneiderhan commendably never indulged in personal display, and there is no tight-nerved strain. Even the cadenzas (and whose were they?), though difficult, were so far from fiddler's fireworks they seemed almost stodgy.

This concert marked Mr. Schneiderhan's American debut. He was most cordially received, and deservedly so.

Next week Mr. Munch will present Bach's B minor Suite, Debussy's "Iberia," and the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 6 1956

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Loyal Subscribers Give Symphony Warm Welcome Back Home

BACK HOME from its successful 28-concert European tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Friday afternoon concert of its 76th season at Symphony Hall yesterday. Loyal subscribers gave a warm welcome to their beloved orchestra and Charles Munch, who started his eighth season as conductor. Tucked in each program was a copy of a letter from President Eisenhower to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, congratulating the orchestra for a job well done in advancing the cause of international understanding. Yesterday, Dr. Munch chose the work which was the very first he conducted at his first concert with the orchestra in Oct., 1949, the Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" by Weber. Then came the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of Vienna making his American debut. After the intermission Dr. Munch conducted Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which figured prominently in the orchestra's European repertoire and was rapturously received.

* * *

PERFECT FALL WEATHER added to the festive atmosphere of the opening concert as friends greeted friends after the long summer months. Trim tailored suits were much in evidence, some worn with mink stoles. And new hats of modish beaver appeared in the crop of usual Boston bonnets. Familiar in the large and enthusiastic throng were Mrs. John S. Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott, Mrs. Arthur W. Bell, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Jerome C. Hunsaker, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs Edwin Cave, Mrs. F. Delano Putnam, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, Mrs. Frank C. Nichols, Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Mrs. George Gaston Smith, Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, Jr., Mrs. Gilbert King, Mrs. Percival Gilbert, Sr., Mrs. Henderson Inches, Jr., Mrs. G. Glenn Potter, Mrs. H. James Crossan, Jr., Mrs. Sydney Harwood, Mrs. B. Harrison Ragle and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark.

MRS. CLARK

* * *

A CALIFORNIA READER of the Social Chatter column writes to tell us about "Chailey," her former home in Newburyport, which we mentioned the other day as being the new home of Col. and Mrs. Ronald V. C. Bodley, formerly of Brimmer Street. She's Mrs. George O. Clark of Santa Barbara, where she and her husband, Dr. Clark, moved within the last month. They continue to subscribe to the Herald. Mrs. Clark tells us that the original part of the house was built in 1792. It belonged to her uncle, Charles W. Moseley. When he died he willed to the town of Newburyport a beautiful portion of this land to be used as a recreational park and also provided a fund for its upkeep. He also left in his will to his brother, Frederick S. Moseley, Mrs. Bodley's father, a portion of his estate called Laurel Hill, where once stood the famous and picturesque Moulton wooden castle. Thirty-five years ago, when Charles Moseley died, Dr. and Mrs. Clark bought "Chailey" from his estate. They lived there ever since during the summer months and recently spent two winters there. During those years the grounds at "Chailey" developed to such an extent that they were awarded the Hollis H. Hunnewell medal for horticultural excellence, especially for rhododendrons, azaleas, mountain laurel and liliums, among which were many specimens hybridized by Dr. Clark and recognized as worthwhile contributions to horticulture.

* * *

A DINNER DANCE will be given for Ellen Thorndike, Saturday evening, Oct. 13, by her parents, the Albert Thorndikes of Milton, and her grandmother, Mrs. Frank C. Paine. The party will take place at "Greenways", Mrs. Paine's home in Wayland. Christopher Grant will be the head usher, assisted by Albert Thorndike, Jr. Other ushers will include Anthony Low, John P. Ganson, W. Luke Marbury, 3rd, Michael Robertson, Henry H. Thayer, Brenton H. Dickson, IV, Thomas A. Robertson, 2nd, Thomas W. Synott, 3rd, and Robert Cabot. Ruby Newman will furnish the music for dancing. Ellen was graduated from Milton Academy and is a freshman at Bryn Mawr College. She's a provisional member of the Junior League.

* * *

TWO BOSTON POST-DEBS at Smith College are coming in for their share of prominence. Susan Hale Bowditch, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Francis Bowditch of Cambridge and Little Boar's Head, Rye Beach, N.H., and a sophomore at Smith, was recently appointed to be a member of Gold Key, an honorary association of student guides who conduct visitors about the campus. She was president of her class at Smith last year and is now serving as acting president of the freshman class. Eleanor Baldwin Tripp, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William V. Tripp, Jr., of Chestnut Hill, and a junior at the college, was recently appointed to be head chairman of Sophia's Circus, the annual Smith College Carnival which launches the campaign for the campus community fund chest drive, which aids students here and abroad. Sophia's Circus will be held Oct. 17 and this year's event will be based on "The Odyssey" theme.

MISS BOWDITCH

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 6 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the first concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Wolfgang Schneidrhan, violinist. The program:
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in D, Op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55, Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

If there was any indication that the 104 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra had completed an 11,000 mile tour of Europe less than seven days ago and had plunged into its strenuous new season without any vacation whatever (and only one rehearsal) I missed it entirely yesterday afternoon as it began its 76th year. It played with all the elan, all the vitality, all the incomparable virtuosity of an ensemble fresh from a six week vacation . . . and did so without the slightest sense of strain, weariness of spirit or fatigue.

What, when you get right down to it, a monument to the morale, the essential vigor of this incomparable organization.

There were no novelties on yesterday's program. The Eroica has been its tour de force throughout the European tour and, although I heard it done from Edinburgh to the Chartres cathedral, from a chair in the audience or sitting on a trunk backstage, it excited me as much yesterday as it did in Moscow. One might expect that Mr. Munch had now explored every facet of this mighty work, yet he does it a little differently each time, finding new aspects of its inexhaustible riches with every reading. Yesterday, in the familiar acoustic frame of Symphony Hall, he gave its funeral march a feeling of overwhelming tragic implication, yet relieved by the most tender quality of solace in the contrasted lyrical section.

All in all it was a highly charged affair, from the turbulent opening movement to the astonishing evolutions of the final variation. And it was flawlessly performed, which is all the more astonishing for the fact that the orchestra has played it so much in recent weeks that it might well approach it carelessly as the result of over-familiarity.

A distinguished Viennese violinist made his American debut on this occasion. He was Wolfgang Schneiderhan, a dark, compact sort of man of great attainment on his instrument. He produces a big tone, one that displays a wide variety of coloration, and his technique, if it does not seem to suggest the virtuoso of the very highest level, is very brilliant. He obviously knows this great work inside out and his phrasing was of high artistry. It took him a while to play his way in, which is hardly surprising considering the hazards of a debut, but he warmed to the task admirably and finished in very fine style. I was baffled by the cadenza he used in the first movement. It is not, I am afraid, any too suited to the work, the heavy quadruple stoppings proved often harsh and out-of-key with the preceding materials presented by the composer. I could not, in any case, find much to admire in it, though the violinist overcame its obvious difficulties well enough.

Next week the orchestra settles down to the new season with Bach's B minor Suite for Flute and Strings (Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist); Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and the following weeks starts off on its travels again. No rest, it seems, for the weary!

* * *

Dr. Munch closed the program with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, one that he played through Europe. Both he and his musicians knew it so well that it was more than ever surcharged with Munchian electricity, and there were times when one expected thunderbolts to fly from the tip of his baton.

This wasn't true, of course, of the Funeral March, dramatically done in the best sense of the word, but it was again true of the Scherzo and the Finale. Dr. Munch has also developed a few stylistic variations to his conducting which add to the impact—the technique, for instance, of becoming almost motionless when the music is most active. It is the power gained through restraint.

* * *

Wolfgang Schneiderhan has just arrived from Vienna and made his American debut yesterday as soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto. As a performer he is exceedingly fine, a statement intended to be more than faint praise and less than ecstatic. In the opening movement his playing was appropriately done and pleasing to listen to, not often warming the heart but taking fire in the brilliantly done cadenza.

He gave a superb account of himself in the Larghetto, however, with Mr. Munch backing him up in each tender and delicate nuance. In the Rondo (in which Beethoven's theme never

AMUSE

131

Globe Oct 6

Home Audience Cheers Symphony; Ike Lauds European Tour Success

By CYRUS DURGIN

The home audience of Boston Symphony subscribers cheered the orchestra as it began a new season—the 76th—at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Meanwhile, President Eisenhower had sent to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, a letter congratulating the orchestra upon the success of the recent tour in Europe and Soviet Russia.

"Since all people want peace, it is necessary for the people of all nations to correspond at all levels and work out methods by which we can gradually learn more of each other. The exchange of artists is one of the most effective methods of strengthening world friendship," wrote the chief executive. "Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

This letter was printed in facsimile, and a copy inserted in each program book.

Because of the resounding triumph across the Atlantic, there was more than usual of an expectant buzz in the lobby as the audience took their seats before the concert. When Mr. Munch appeared on stage, the gathering rose to greet him, as usual at season openings. But, I think, they applauded a little more ardently and stood a little longer than customary.

A Beginning in Theory

The initial program began with the Overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber; included one of the works featured on the European tour—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and had as it middle portion the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan as soloist.

In a sense of continuous operation, this beginning of a season was only theoretical, for actually the Orchestra has not ceased to function for a full year. The usual vacation period had to be omitted, since the players took off for Europe as soon as the Berkshire Festival was over. For them, this week's concerts are but a resumption of activity following a few days of rest.

Tired they may be, in comparison to their state of health and well-being usual at this time of year. But no fatigue showed in the brilliance and the verge of their playing yesterday. Indeed, Mr. Munch started off with just a trifle too much speed and brio in the Weber Overture, and the musicians readily responded to his wishes.

This is indication of the fact the Orchestra are all "old pros." Time and again, when we were in Europe, I marveled at the consistent virtuosity, magnificence even, of their playing when all connected with the tour knew they were tired. Old pros never show that, they go on their nerve and play their best, and because they are so fine, individually and as an ensemble, they make the music "sing" freshly and with

The "Eroica" A Test

The "Eroica" must have been a test for them, and for Mr. Munch too, in this respect, for they had played it eight times overseas. Enough to make it wear very thin for them, temporarily. You would not have judged so by the vigorous and generally polished performance yesterday. True, the slow movement was not quite so tidy as it might have been, but that, I think, stemmed from the conductor's basic treatment of the movement.

Mr. Munch takes the funeral march as a symphonic movement of steady progress and "long line," and perhaps just a hair too fast. Inherently the march is music of steady rhythm overlaid with an enormous amount of sculptured detail, in which extremely precise note values, exact attacks and very delicate balance between sections of the orchestra—and solo instruments—are of the utmost importance. It may be that the conductor's temperament leads him to avoid such fussiness of detail, as if he were impatient of it. But little nuances demand the first consideration in this movement.

Schneiderhan Excellent

Wolfgang Schneiderhan is a Viennese, a little over 41. He is also the husband of soprano Irmgard Seefried, a fact included for the sake of a biographical record. He is an excellent violinist, and he is also a musician of much taste and technical resource. I kept thinking of Fritz Kreisler as Mr. Schneiderhan played the Beethoven Concerto, for his interpretation has something of Kreisler's intimacy, tenderness and relaxed singing ease. The articulation of notes was impeccably clear, each phrase was turned with the rhythm and the grace of a born musician.

Schneiderhan takes the first movement rather more slowly than most play it today. That may have meant less brilliance, but it did not alter essential character. The tempo was in keeping with Schneiderhan's own quality, for he seems to play with but one object: to let the music sound for itself. Though a virtuoso, Mr. Schneiderhan commendably never indulged in personal display, and there is no tight-nerved strain. Even the cadenzas (and whose were they?), though difficult, were so far from fiddler's fireworks they seemed almost stodgy.

This concert marked Mr. Schneiderhan's American debut. He was most cordially received, and deservedly so.

Next week Mr. Munch will present Bach's B minor Suite, Debussy's "Iberia," and the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

Monitor Oct 6 1956

132

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
Circ. D. 121,929
OCT 6 1956

In Radio Music Battle: Big-Name Live Shows

Network radio wheels up some of its big guns next week in the continuing battle between live music and recordings.

An ABC network show—Best Bands in the Land—has been installed in the 9:30 p.m. slot on WVET nightly, Monday through Saturday. Live programs by Lawrense Welk, the Dorsey Brothers, Freddie Martin and Vincent Lopez will be heard on the nightly programs.

Baritone Igor Gorin will be guest soloist on the Telephone Hour (9 p.m., Monday-WHAM). He'll sing "Sylvia," a Giordano soliloquy and two lieder by Franz Schubert.

The Percy Faith Hour tomorrow (1 p.m.-WHEC) will mark the birthdays of Vincent Youmans and Vernon Duke with a special program featuring Lois Hunt, Eileen Barton, Snooky Lanson and John Raitt.

Thomas L. Thomas will be soloist Monday when Barlow's Orchestra presents an all-Jerome Kern program (8:30 p.m. WVET).

WHAM will broadcast on a delayed basis the new series of NBC radio concerts by the Boston Symphony, beginning next week (8:30 p.m., Thursdays). Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist in the first program, featuring Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D-Major, Opus 61." Charles Munch will be conductor of the first program and for most others of the new series.

• • •

Today

Baseball: World Series. (1 p.m.—WBBF).

Football: Cornell vs. Navy. (2 p.m.—WHEC).

Political Speeches: Socialist Labor presidential nominee Eric Haas and vice presidential nominee, Mrs. Georgia Cozzini. (10:30 p.m.—WHEC).

• • •

Sunday

E. Powers Biggs: New series of Mozart sonatas for organ and orchestra, as played in Salzburg Cathedral. (10:05 a.m.—WHEC).

Igor Gorin Lois Hunt

Church of the Air: Alma Sonne, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, on "Faith, the Bedrock of Life." (11 a.m.—WHEC).

Baseball: World Series. (2 p.m.—WBBF).

Symphonette: Joseph Fuchs, violin soloist, in Tchaikovsky's "October." (2 p.m.—WHEC).

Junior Town Meeting: Genesee High School students on "Should Schools Be Open 12 Months?" (4:30 p.m.—WHEC).

Greatest Story Ever Told: "One Good Deed"; based on Matthew 13. (5:30 p.m.—WVET).

Meet the Press: James A. Finegan, campaign director for Adlai Stevenson. (6:30 p.m.—WHAM).

Answer to Previous Puzzle

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604
OCT 7 1956

Symphony Season Enters Second Week

Charles Munch conducts the second pair of this season's Friday-afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming week-end. The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the Orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the Second of the three "Images" for Orchestra by Debussy, will follow, and after the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts, and Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut), will each conduct one. Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried. A few subscriptions for this series are still available, and information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box-office. A few single subscriptions still remain for the Saturday evening series; information about these, too, may be obtained from Symphony Hall.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366
OCT 7 1956

CHARLES MUNCH

Boston Group Booked Here

Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a concert for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday night, Oct. 18, at 8:30 at the new Veterans Memorial.

Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony have completed, just last month, the longest tour in the seventy-five year history of the orchestra.

Tickets are at Heaton's and also at Zeisler's.

NITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1956 Art—Music—Theater 15

—Boston Symphony Opens 76th Season

Orchestra Welcomed Home From Tour

By Harold Rogers

President Eisenhower has sent the Boston Symphony Orchestra a letter of congratulation, the text of which was made available to the public yesterday afternoon at the orchestra's opening concert of its 76th season. Copies of the letter were slipped into the Symphony Hall concert bulletins.

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe have given me great satisfaction," the President wrote. "Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Since all people want peace, it is necessary for the people of all nations to correspond at all levels and work out methods by which we can gradually learn more of each other. The exchange of artists is one of the most effective methods of strengthening world friendship. Your orchestra has demonstrated this truth.

"I should add that it is gratifying to observe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed, in typical American fashion, with the sponsorship and devoted support of private citizens.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

So wrote the President, and a welcome no less enthusiastic was accorded Dr. Munch and his musicians by the audience yesterday afternoon, with the traditional rising tribute accorded the conductor when he mounted the podium.

Dr. Munch lifted his arms and his baton launched into a blazing performance of the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." There were a few of his customary contrasts—great fervor balanced by great serenity—but by and large it was a spine-tingling adventure.

seems to measure up to the rest of the material) the soloist was apparently more at ease and played with greater abandon. He was warmly applauded.

• • •

MENTS

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer Dispatch
Circ. D. 44,364 - S. 48,821
OCT 7 1956

Scottish Rite Pop Concert On Wednesday

The presentation of a "Pop Concert" by the Central City Scottish Rite Symphony Orchestra of Syracuse, Wednesday night in Thomas R. Proctor High School auditorium under sponsorship of the Yahnundasis Scottish Rite bodies, will be one of the outstanding musical treats of the season.

The more than 60-piece orchestra is being brought here by bus and the concert is free of charge to members of the Masonic craft and their friends.

Conductor Carl Silfer brings to Utica for the first time a musical organization which during the short space of several years has reached an outstanding position in the musical world.

The program will include an arrangement exclusive with the "Boston Pops" Orchestra, two original compositions by Richard Freitas and edicated exclusively to the Scottish Rite Orchestra.

Another feature will be the appearance of the Accordian Quartet performing a concerto written for these instruments.

"The Glow Worm Turns" in an entirely new symphonic arrangements which was premiered under direction of Conductor Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Pops. This is being presented here by special permission.

Commander in chief John E. Hughes of Yahnundasis Bodies will give the official welcome. Officers of the four lodges will serve as ushers.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
Circ. D. 136,302 - S. 146,180
OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony Opening Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," on Monday, Oct. 8 (8:15 -9 p.m. EST) over WSOC and WSOC-FM.

Charles Munch, starting his 8th season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct. Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
Circ. D. 121,929

OCT 6 1956

In Radio Music Battle: Big-Name Live Shows

Network radio wheels up some of its big guns next week in the continuing battle between live music and recordings.

An ABC network show—Best Bands in the Land—has been installed in the 9:30 p.m. slot on WVET nightly, Monday through Saturday. Live programs by Lawrense Welk, the Dorsey Brothers, Freddie Martin and Vincent Lopez will be heard on the nightly programs.

Baritone Igor Gorin will be guest soloist on the Telephone Hour (9 p.m., Monday-WHAM). He'll sing "Sylvia," a Giordano soliloquy and two lieder by Franz Schubert.

The Percy Faith Hour tomorrow (1 p.m.-WHEC) will mark the birthdays of Vincent Youmans and Vernon Duke with a special program featuring Lois Hunt, Eileen Barton, Snooky Lanson and John Raitt.

Thomas L. Thomas will be soloist Monday when Barlow's Orchestra presents an all-Jerome Kern program (8:30 p.m. WVET).

WHAM will broadcast on a delayed basis the new series of NBC radio concerts by the Boston Symphony, beginning next week (8:30 p.m., Thursdays). Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist in the first program, featuring Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D-Major, Opus 61." Charles Munch will be conductor of the first program and for most others of the new series.

• • •

Today

Baseball: World Series. (1 p.m.—WBBF).

Football: Cornell vs. Navy. (2 p.m.—WHEC).

Political Speeches: Socialist Labor presidential nominee Eric Haas and vice presidential nominee, Mrs. Georgia Cozzini. (10:30 p.m.—WHEC).

• • •

Sunday

E. Powers Biggs: New series of Mozart sonatas for organ and orchestra, as played in Salzburg Cathedral. (10:05 a.m.—WHEC).

Igor Gorin Lois Hunt

Church of the Air: Alma Sonne, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, on "Faith, the Bedrock of Life." (11 a.m.—WHEC).

Baseball: World Series. (2 p.m.—WBBF).

Symphonette: Joseph Fuchs, violin soloist, in Tchaikovsky's "October." (2 p.m.—WHEC).

Junior Town Meeting: Genesee High School students on "Should Schools Be Open 12 Months?" (4:30 p.m.—WHEC).

Greatest Story Ever Told: "One Good Deed"; based on Matthew 13. (5:30 p.m.—WVET).

Meet the Press: James A. Finegan, campaign director for Adlai Stevenson. (6:30 p.m.—WHAM).

Answer to Previous Puzzle

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

OCT 7 1956

Symphony Season Enters Second Week

Charles Munch conducts the second pair of this season's Friday-afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming week-end. The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the Orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the Second of the three "Images" for Orchestra by Debussy, will follow, and after the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts, and Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut), will each conduct one. Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried. A few subscriptions for this series are still available, and information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box-office. A few single subscriptions still remain for the Saturday evening series; information about these, too, may be obtained from Symphony Hall.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366

OCT 7 1956

CHARLES MUNCH

Boston Group Booked Here

Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a concert for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday night, Oct. 18, at 8:30 at the new Veterans Memorial.

Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony have completed, just last month, the longest tour in the seventy-five year history of the orchestra.

Tickets are at Heaton's and also at Zeisler's.

NITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1956 Art—Music—Theater 15

—Boston Symphony Opens 76th Season

Orchestra Welcomed Home From Tour

By Harold Rogers

President Eisenhower has sent the Boston Symphony Orchestra a letter of congratulation, the text of which was made available to the public yesterday afternoon at the orchestra's opening concert of its 76th season. Copies of the letter were slipped into the Symphony Hall concert bulletins.

"The reports of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its recent tour of Europe have given me great satisfaction," the President wrote. "Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced.

"Since all people want peace, it is necessary for the people of all nations to correspond at all levels and work out methods by which we can gradually learn more of each other. The exchange of artists is one of the most effective methods of strengthening world friendship. Your orchestra has demonstrated this truth.

"I should add that it is gratifying to observe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed, in typical American fashion, with the sponsorship and devoted support of private citizens.

"Please welcome home your musicians and distinguished conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and accept my congratulations on a job well done."

So wrote the President, and a welcome no less enthusiastic was accorded Dr. Munch and his musicians by the audience yesterday afternoon, with the traditional rising tribute accorded the conductor when he mounted the podium.

Dr. Munch lifted his arms and his baton launched into a blazing performance of the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." There were a few of his customary contrasts—great fervor balanced by great serenity—but by and large it was a spine-tingling adventure.

seems to measure up to the rest of the material) the soloist was apparently more at ease and played with greater abandon. He was warmly applauded.

VENTS

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer Dispatch
Circ. D. 44,364 - S. 48,821

OCT 7 1956

Scottish Rite Pop Concert On Wednesday

The presentation of a "Pop Concert" by the Central City Scottish Rite Symphony Orchestra of Syracuse, Wednesday night in Thomas R. Proctor High School auditorium under sponsorship of the Yahnundasis Scottish Rite bodies, will be one of the outstanding musical treats of the season.

The more than 60-piece orchestra is being brought here by bus and the concert is free of charge to members of the Masonic craft and their friends.

Conductor Carl Silfer brings to Utica for the first time a musical organization which during the short space of several years has reached an outstanding position in the musical world.

The program will include an arrangement exclusive with the "Boston Pops" Orchestra, two original compositions by Richard Freitas and edicated exclusively to the Scottish Rite Orchestra.

Another feature will be the appearance of the Accordian Quartet performing a concerto written for these instruments.

"The Glow Worm Turns" in an entirely new symphonic arrangements which was premiered under direction of Conductor Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Pops. This is being presented here by special permission.

Commander in chief John E. Hughes of Yahnundasis Bodies will give the official welcome. Officers of the four lodges will serve as ushers.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
Circ. D. 136,302 - S. 146,180

OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony Opening Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1956-57 season of NBC Radio concerts with a program devoted to Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61," on Monday, Oct. 8 (8:15 -9 p.m. EST) over WSOC and WSOC-FM.

Charles Munch, starting his 8th season as music director of the orchestra, will conduct. Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna will make his American debut as guest soloist.

TIGHT BINDING

133

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2070, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 7 1956

Bach Flute Suite on Symphony Program

Charles Munch conducts the second pair of this season's Friday-afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for Orchestra by Debussy, will follow, and after the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts, and Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut), will each conduct one. Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series are still available, and information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box-office. A few single subscriptions still remain for the Saturday evening series; information about these, too, may be obtained from Symphony Hall.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 17,744
OCT 11 1956

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
Circ. D. 173,051 - S. 210,554
OCT 7 1956

On local turntables

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

"THE LOVE FOR THREE ORANGES"—This is the first complete recording of Prokofieff's fairy tale opera based on the Gozzi comedy, although the orchestral suite has been done in a number of excellent versions. The complete opera, in the Italian tradition, is unusually well sung by members of the Slovenian National Opera and chorus under Bego Leskovich. The orchestra meets

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 204,260 - S. 237,502
OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony To Be Heard On KOMO-Radio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will be heard in a series of four Monday-night concerts beginning Monday at 7:15 over Station KOMO.

The opening concert will be

Arthur Fiedler

Walter Gieseking

Outstanding Musicians Are Named For Concert Series

With only two days in which to join the Wilmington Community Concerts Association, new residents of Wilmington are urged to call the special number, 3-7313, for complete information about becoming members—office hours are from 9 a. m. until 6 p. m. today, and on Friday, the last day of the drive, Concert Headquarters will be open from 9 a.m.until 9 p. m.

Those who join this week have a rare treat in store with the appearance of Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra and Walter Gieseking, master of the piano.

The Boston Pops is familiar wherever light music is loved and appreciated. For its local appearance, one of the highlights of the music season here, the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra has arranged a program of music carefully calculated to appeal to every taste. Critics everywhere have been quick to applaud their varied repertoire, the musical good taste which for the past twenty-seven seasons has made this music synonymous in Boston with Fiedler, the Pops and the springtime season.

Walter Gieseking has followed one sensational success with another--and not the least triumphant of his achievements is his repertoire. He is able to play, at a moment's notice and without score, 24 concertos with orchestra, several hundred sonatas, and approximately 1,000 shorter pieces. Paul Henry Lang, critic for the New York Herald Trubune, describes Gieseking as ". . .a great pianist, a musician of taste and imagination . . When Gieseking plays, the ivory keys themsleves lose their whiteness and acquire a thousand colors. He tosses out color patches that float around, mix with one another, their minute particles drenching the listener."

At least one more feature artist will be selected at the close of the campaign.

It is well to remember that positively no single admission to any Community Concerts are ever sold. All membership cards are transferable locally, and members may use their cards in a reciprocity agreement with several nearby community towns.

All members from last year should have been called for renewals. In some cases workers have not been able to make contacts. Any previous member who has not been reached is urged to call the special phone - 3-7313.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2070, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 7 1956

Mozart's "Great Mass" in Offered by Handel

Music lovers are coming from as far away as Providence, R.I. and New Bedford for tomorrow evening's concert by the Handel and Haydn Society to benefit the Taft Memorial Foundation. Mozart's Great Mass in C minor will constitute the program. Dr. Thompson Stone will conduct and members of the Boston Symphony will accompany the singers, at Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Members of the huge concert committee, headed by Basil Brewer, F. Otis Drayton and Judge Vincent Mottola, include James Bayley, Robert H. Beaudreau, Floyd L. Bell, G. Sherman Blair Jr., Hon. Ralph H. Bonnell, Oscar J. Cahoon, Eldridge E. Campbell, Hon. Laurence Curtis, Adm Louis E. Denfield (ret.), Patrick H. Dupuis, Raymond A. Fitzgerald, Mrs. Felix Forte, Floyd H. Gilbert, John J. Gobell, Rep. T tian A. ins, C Charles C. Ho Sen. Jo Lewin, Beatric John S Olsen, F. Pete bin, M Mr. and Regnan Michael main, S tonstall Mrs. G H. Ed Speers Sen. Emma Treadw John A dron, H ert H. mond Whitne glesworth, Judge Francis S. Wyner and Mrs. Anne M. Zyfers.

Patrons of the arts attending the concert will be Mrs. John Shillito, George B. Rowell, Leonard Cushman, Ruby Willis, Peter C. Tandy, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Thomas B. Card, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mesar, Alice Lovett, Charles Lewin, C. F. Adams Jr., Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. George W. Hemenway, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Eliot, Howard Filston, Mrs. C. A. Weatherly, Mrs. Rutherford Bingham, Blanche T. Bigelow, Roger E. Clapp, Mary M. Cochrane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Seton, Edward C. Stone, Steven B. Wilson, F. C. Ingalls, Amelia Peabody and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd.

Still others are Mrs. Austin Maxim, Mrs. Philip Stockton, William M. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Brewer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Weyerhaeuser, Robert H. Beaudreau, Mrs. William B. Thomas, H. Frederick Hagemann Sr., Francis S. Wyner, Juliet B. Maxim, Mr. and Mrs. Latimer Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Jeff Sibley, Walter C. Small, Mrs. Ann McLean Griffin and E. W. Smyth.

rtho- qual- n't go here's sters, ts in show that are And PHY," us in have ulous Like back one belts guste has reign edy in um is s Miss retire- adway d valnable addition to record libraries. (DECCA).

"BURL IVES SINGS FOR FUN"—And you'll have fun listening to "The Wayfaring Stranger" singing a variety of songs in the best Burl Ives manner in this new Hi-Fi album. The fellow is priceless, and he makes the most of such numbers as "Blue Tail Fly," "Boll Weevil," "The Fox," "Erie Canal" and "I'm Goin' Down the Road." (DECCA).

Key West, Florida
Coral Tribune
October 12, 1956

Community Concerts

voted to make this season a gala one. Consquently, we will present for our January concert the world-famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra. This will be the first time a symphony orchestra has played in Key West.

As with any large group of this type, the Boston "Pops" had to be contracted for months ahead of time, and we are announcing it ahead of the campaign with considerable pride and pleasure.

"Perhaps you would enjoy working with our group in this exciting and rewarding activity.

"Our corps of workers includes both Navy and civilian residents, and winter visitors as well. There are prizes for the workers including one free membership for every fifteen memberships sold.

"For more information either as a potential member, or worker please call Mrs. Delio Cobo, Membership Chairman, at CY 6-4401, or Commander Joseph Wheeler, USN, Co-Chairman, at CY 4-1508."

ewsclip Agency, Inc.
6 • RIchmond 2-4200
ican (e) N, Mass.
pendent
184,973
8 1956

ekend Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch will conduct the second pair of this season's Friday afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for orchestra by Debussy, will follow. Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony will make up the latter half of the program.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts. Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut) will each conduct a concert.

Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series still are available as well as a few single subscriptions for the Saturday night series. Information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box office.

TIGHT BINDING

133

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 7 1956

Bach Flute Suite on Symphony Program

Charles Munch conducts the second pair of this season's Friday-afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for Orchestra by Debussy, will follow, and after the intermission Dr. Munch will conduct the "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts, and Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut), will each conduct one. Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series are still available, and information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box-office. A few single subscriptions still remain for the Saturday evening series: information about these, too, may be obtained from Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 7 1956

Mozart's "Great Mass" in C Minor Offered by Handel, Haydn Society

Music lovers are coming from as far away as Providence, R.I. and New Bedford for tomorrow evening's concert by the Handel and Haydn Society to benefit the Taft Memorial Foundation. Mozart's Great Mass in C minor will constitute the program. Dr. Thompson Stone will conduct and members of the Boston Symphony will accompany the singers, at Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Members of the huge concert committee, headed by Basil Brewer, F. Otis Drayton and Judge Vincent Mottola, include James Bayley, Robert H. Beaudreau, Floyd L. Bell, G. Sherman Blair Jr., Hon. Ralph H. Bonnell, Oscar J. Cahoon, Eldridge E. Campbell, Hon. Laurence Curtis, Adm Louis E. Denfield (ret.), Patrick H. Dupuis, Raymond A. Fitzgerald, Mrs. Felix Forte, Lloyd H. Gilbert, John J. Gobell, Rep. Thomas T. Gray, Mrs. Christian A. Herter, Vernon B. Hitchins, Carrol J. Hoffman, Rep. Charles F. Holman, Prof. Bruce C. Hopper, Kenneth Hutchins, Sen. John F. Kennedy, Charles J. Lewin, William Lewis and Mrs. Beatrice Hancock Mullaney. Also John S. Nolan, Hon. George A. Olsen, Thomas A. Pappas, Magnus F. Peterson, Hon. Philip J. Philbin, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Pigeon, Mr. and Mrs. Selo Pini, Theodore Regnante, George B. Rowell, Michael Robbins, D. J. St. Germain, Sen. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mrs. Mary J. Schindler, Mrs. George C. Schofield, Judge H. Edward Snow, William J. Speers Jr., Charles F. Sprague, Sen. Edward C. Stone, Mrs. Emma S. Tousant, Richard F. Treadway, Talbot T. Tweedy, John A. Volpe, James T. Waldron, Hon. Sinclair Weeks, Robert H. W. Welch Jr., Mrs. Raymond W. Wheeler, Mrs. Otis M. Whitney, Hon. Richard B. Wigglesworth, Judge Francis S. Wyner and Mrs. Anne M. Zyfers.

Patrons of the arts attending the concert will be Mrs. John Shillito, George B. Rowell, Leonard Cushman, Ruby Willis, Peter C. Tandy, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Thomas B. Card, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mesar, Alice Lovett, Charles Lewin, C. F. Adams Jr., Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. George W. Hemenway, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Eliot, Howard Filston, Mrs. C. A. Weatherly, Mrs. Rutherford Bingham, Blanche T. Bigelow, Roger E. Clapp, Mary M. Cochrane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Seton, Edward C. Stone, Steven B. Wilson, F. C. Ingalls, Amelia Peabody and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd.

Still others are Mrs. Austin Maxim, Mrs. Philip Stockton, William M. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Brewer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Weyerhaeuser, Robert H. Beaudreau, Mrs. William B. Thomas, H. Frederick Hagemann Sr., Francis S. Wyner, Juliet B. Maxim, Mr. and Mrs. Latimer Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Jeff Sibley, Walter C. Small, Mrs. Ann McLean Griffin and E. W. Smyth.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
Circ. D. 173,051 - S. 210,554
OCT 7 1956

On local turntables

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

"THE LOVE FOR THREE ORANGES"—This is the first complete recording of Prokofieff's fairy tale opera based on the Gozzi comedy, although the orchestral suite has been done in a number of excellent versions. The complete opera, in the Italian tradition, is unusually well sung by members of the Slovenian National [illegible] chorus under Bego[illegible] recognition of the [illegible] 75th anniversary. New Orthophonic sound of excellent quality. (RCA-VICTOR).

ROCK 'N' ROLL—I don't go for this, but if you do, here's a new album by the masters, Bill Haley and His Comets in a rousing Rock-'N'-Roll show. A dozen of the numbers that are socking the country are included on the recording. And in Hi-Fi. (DECCA).

"A MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY," brings Ethel Merman to us in many great tunes that have played a part in her fabulous career in show business. Like other albums that bring back memories of yesterday, this one is nostalgic. And Ethel belts across with her usual gusto scores of numbers she has made hits during her long reign as queen of musical comedy in show business. The album is timely, being released as Miss Merman, after a brief "retirement," returns to the Broadway stage. Good listening and valuable addition to record libraries. (DECCA).

"BURL IVES SINGS FOR FUN"—And you'll have fun listening to "The Wayfaring Stranger" singing a variety of songs in the best Burl Ives manner in this new Hi-Fi album. The fellow is priceless, and he makes the most of such numbers as "Blue Tail Fly," "Boll Weevil," "The Fox," "Erie Canal" and "I'm Goin' Down the Road." (DECCA).

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 17,744
OCT 11 1956

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 204,260 - S. 237,502
OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony To Be Heard On KOMO-Radio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will be heard in a series of four Monday-night concerts beginning Monday at 7:15 over Station KOMO.

The opening concert will be

LOOK FOR THE BLUE MILL ON THE PACKAGE
ONAL BISCUIT COMPANY
nness, the tantalizing d, honey bread. Not e present-day breads,
-at-home bread. And er! Get yours now.
BROOK BREAD
VEET-HOME" FLAVOR
OME AND GET THAT MILLBROOK
HOME STYLE
ENRICHED BREAD
MILLBROOK
WHITE

Outstanding Musicians Are Named For Concert Series

With only two days in which to [illegible] the Wilmington Community [illegible]certs Association, new resi[illegible]ts of Wilmington are urged to [illegible] the special number, 3-7313, for [illegible]mplete information about be[illegible]ming members—office hours are [illegible]m 9 a. m. until 6 p. m. today, [illegible]d on Friday, the last day of [illegible] drive, Concert Headquarters [illegible]ll be open from 9 a.m.until [illegible]p. m.

Those who join this week have [illegible] rare treat in store with the ap[illegible]arance of Arthur Fiedler con[illegible]cting the Boston Pops Orchestra [illegible]d Walter Gieseking, master of [illegible] piano.

The Boston Pops is familiar [illegible]erever light music is loved and [illegible]preciated. For its local appear[illegible]ce, one of the highlights of the [illegible]usic season here, the Boston [illegible]ps Tour Orchestra has arranged [illegible]rogram of music carefully cal[illegible]ated to appeal to every taste. [illegible]tics everywhere have been [illegible]uick to applaud their varied re[illegible]pertoire, the musical good taste [illegible]hich for the past twenty-seven seasons has made this music synonymous in Boston with Fiedler, the Pops and the springtime season.

Walter Gieseking has followed one sensational success with another--and not the least triumphant of his achievements is his repertoire. He is able to play, at a moment's notice and without score, 24 concertos with orchestra, several hundred sonatas, and approximately 1,000 shorter pieces. Paul Henry Lang, critic for the New York Herald Trubune, describes Gieseking as ". . .a great pianist, a musician of taste and imagination .When Gieseking plays, the ivory keys themsleves lose their whiteness and acquire a thousand colors. He tosses out color patches that float around, mix with one another, their minute particles drenching the listener."

At least one more feature artist will be selected at the close of the campaign.

It is well to remember that positively no single admission to any Community Concerts are ever sold. All membership cards are transferable locally, and members may use their cards in a reciprocity agreement with several nearby community towns.

All members from last year should have been called for renewals. In some cases workers have not been able to make contacts. Any previous member who has not been reached is urged to call the special phone - 3-7313.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
[illegible]rican (e)
[illegible]ON, Mass.
[illegible]pendent
[illegible] 184,973
[illegible] 8 1956

[illegible]eekend Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch will conduct the second pair of this season's Friday afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for orchestra by Debussy, will follow. Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony—will make up the latter half of the program.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts. Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut) will each conduct a concert.

Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series still are available as well as a few single subscriptions for the Saturday night series. Information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box office.

Key West, Florida
Coral Tribune
October 12, 1956

Community Concerts

voted to make this season a gala one. Consquently, we will present for our January concert the world-famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra. This will be the first time a symphony orchestra has played in Key West.

As with any large group of this type, the Boston "Pops" had to be contracted for months ahead of time, and we are announcing it ahead of the campaign with considerable pride and pleasure.

"Perhaps you would enjoy working with our group in this exciting and rewarding activity.

"Our corps of workers includes both Navy and civilian residents, and winter visitors as well. There are prizes for the workers including one free membership for every fifteen memberships sold.

"For more information either as a potential member, or worker, please call Mrs. Delio Cobo, Membership Chairman, at CY 6-4401, or Commander Joseph Wheeler, USN, Co-Chairman, at CY 4-1503."

TIGHT BINDING

Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Day Globe
TON, Mass.
ependent
. 374,544
7 1956

Flute Suite on Symphony Program

Munch conducts the sec-of this season's Friday-Saturday evening sub-series of concerts by the ymphony Orchestra in Hall this coming week-

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 17,744
OCT 11 1956

Halloween Carnival Plans Made At PTA

The regular meeting of the St. Mary's PTA was held on Wednesday in the school at Fourth and Ann Sts. The president, Mrs. Benton, presided and the meeting was opened with a prayer by Monsignor Peter McNerney.

Mrs. L. C. Hanks reported on the successful bread sale held and gave the treasurer's report. Mrs. Joseph Eiden, health and safety chairman told of her Committee's activities during the past month, of cards sent, visits made to the sick and gift to a new baby. It was decided to omit flowers to the sick in as much as there were so many and the treasury would not permit.

A plan to serve hot lunches in the school cafeteria was presented to the meeting by Mrs. Harvey Williams, of a local lunch room, which will be decided upon after all parents can be contacted.

Mrs. Paul Starling reported that plans for the Halloween Carnival to be held Oct. 30 were well under way and a final committee meeting would be held on Oct. 23. The carnival for youngsters and the 7th through 9th give cakes for the cake walk.

D. K. Wiard, assistant ways and means chairman, announced that tickets on the portable TV, vacuum and portable radio would not be ready for sale until after the Bazaar of Nov. 9 and 10.

Next regular meeting will be Nov. 7 at 7:30 p.m.

Tournament A

The Thursday Evening Brid Club at the Young Women's Chr tian Association had five tables bridge. High score was won Mrs. Don Schuyler; low prize Mrs. C. W. Shaw. Others playi were Mrs. Caroline Montgome Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Narron, M Elizabeth Matthews, Mrs. E. Halleck, Mrs. W. H. Hatcher, M Lola Eubanks, Mrs. Gussie L den, Mrs. H. F. Koonce, M Mary C. Warren, Miss Luc Moore, Mrs. Edna Wheat, M W. M. Simpson, Mr. Don Schuy

...hness, the tantalizing
...d, homey bread. Not
... present-day breads,
...at-home bread. And
...er! Get yours now.
...ONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

Great Mass" in ... ered by Hande

...e coming from Providence, R.I. ... for tomorrow ... by the Handel ... to benefit the ...undation. Mo... in C minor will ... program. Dr. ...ill conduct and ...ton Symphony ...e singers, at ... 8:15.

...huge concert ... by Basil ... Drayton and ...tola, include ...rt H. Beau... G. Sherman ...H. Bonnell, ... Eldridge E. ...rence Curtis, ...nfield (ret.), ... Raymond A. ...elix Forte, ...hn J. Gobell, Rep. T... tian A... ins, C... Charle... C. Ho... Sen. J... Lewin, ... Beatric... John ... Olsen, ... F. Pete... bin, M... Mr. an... Regnar... Michae... main, ... tonstal... Mrs. G... H. Ed... Speers ... Sen. ... Emma ... Treadw... John ... dron, ... ert H. ... mond ... Whitne... glesworth, Jurt ... Wyner and Mrs. Anne M. Zyters.

Patrons of the arts attending the concert will be Mrs. John Shillito, George B. Rowell, Leonard Cushman, Ruby Willis, Peter C. Tandy, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Thomas B. Card, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mesar, Alice Lovett, Charles Lewin, C. F. Adams Jr., Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. George W. Hemenway, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Eliot, Howard Filston, Mrs. C. A. Weatherly, Mrs. Rutherford Bingham, Blanche T. Bigelow, Roger E. Clapp, Mary M. Cochrane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Seton, Edward C. Stone, Steven B. Wilson, F. C. Ingalls, Amelia Peabody and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd.

Still others are Mrs. Austin Maxim, Mrs. Philip Stockton, William M. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Brewer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Weyerhaeuser, Robert H. Beaudreau, Mrs. William B. Thomas, H. Frederick Hagemann Sr., Francis S. Wyner, Juliet B. Maxim, Mr. and Mrs. Latimer Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Jeff Sibley, Walter C. Small, Mrs. Ann McLean Griffin and E. W. Smyth.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
Circ. D. 173,051 S. 210,554
OCT 7 1956

On local turntables

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

"THE LOVE FOR THREE ORANGES"—This is the first complete recording of Prokofieff's fairy tale opera based on the Gozzi comedy, although the orchestral suite has been done in a number of excellent versions. The complete opera in the Italian tradition, is unusually well sung by members of the Slovenian National Opera and chorus under Bego Leskovich. The orchestra meets the demanding tempestuous score with its rousing marches and stormy scenes. Good Radial Sound. (EPIC).

BEETHOVEN'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY—Another in music-art series, this album in superior new Orthophonic sound finds the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under that Caesar of the podium Fritz Reiner in fine form. Recognized as one of the world's finest conductors of the German repertoire, Reiner has combined Beethoven's Seventh with the composer's Fidelio Overture. In both he masters the problems of balance and sonority. (RCA-VICTOR)

MOZART—A sort of double-anniversary album, this new recording of Mozart's Symphony No. 41 in C, K-551, coupled with his No. 39 in E-Flat Major, K-543, bows to the composer on his Centennial Celebration Year, and takes a deeper bow to Bruno Walter, his 80th birthday anniversary and 60 years of conducting. It's an inspiring occasion, and the recording is distinguished by superb high-fidelity sound. (COLUMBIA).

BEETHOVEN'S SIXTH SYMPHONY—The "Pastoral," music that expresses everything that a human can feel, is given the best of the four recently recorded performances in this album by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch. The disc is released in recognition of the orchestra's 75th anniversary. New Orthophonic sound of excellent quality. (RCA-VICTOR).

ROCK 'N' ROLL—I don't go for this, but if you do, here's a new album by the masters, Bill Haley and His Comets in a rousing Rock-'N'-Roll show. A dozen of the numbers that are socking the country are included on the recording. And in Hi-Fi. (DECCA).

"A MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY," brings Ethel Merman to us in many great tunes that have played a part in her fabulous career in show business. Like other albums that bring back memories of yesterday, this one is nostalgic. And Ethel belts across with her usual gusto scores of numbers she has made hits during her long reign as queen of musical comedy in show business. The album is timely, being released as Miss Merman, after a brief "retirement," returns to the Broadway stage. Good listening and valuable addition to record libraries. (DECCA).

"BURL IVES SINGS FOR FUN"—And you'll have fun listening to "The Wayfaring Stranger" singing a variety of songs in his best Burl Ives manner in this new Hi-Fi album. The fellow is priceless, and he makes the most of such numbers as "Blue Tail Fly," "Boll Weevil," "The Fox," "Erie Canal" and "I'm Goin' Down the Road." (DECCA).

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 204,260 S. 237,502
OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony To Be Heard On KOMO-Radio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will be heard in a series of four Monday-night concerts beginning Monday at 7:15 over Station KOMO.

The opening concert will be devoted to Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major, Opus 61, with Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna making his American debut as guest soloist.

Other concerts will be heard on KOMO at the same time on October 15, 22 and 29.

The series will consist of major selections from the orchestra's Friday-afternoon concerts at Boston's Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Ben Grauer will be the commentator for the series.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973
OCT 8 1956

Weekend Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch will conduct the second pair of this season's Friday afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for orchestra by Debussy, will follow. Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony will make up the latter half of the program.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts. Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut) will each conduct a concert.

Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series still are available as well as a few single subscriptions for the Saturday night series. Information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box office.

Key West, Florida
Coral Tribune
October 12, 1956

Community Concerts

voted to make this season a gala one. Consquently, we will present for our January concert the world-famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra. This will be the first time a symphony orchestra has played in Key West.

As with any large group of this type, the Boston "Pops" had to be contracted for months ahead of time, and we are announcing it ahead of the campaign with considerable pride and pleasure.

"Perhaps you would enjoy working with our group in this exciting and rewarding activity.

"Our corps of workers includes both Navy and civilian residents, and winter visitors as well. There are prizes for the workers including one free membership for every fifteen memberships sold.

"For more information either a potential member or worker please call Mrs. Delio Cobo, Membership Chairman, at CY 6-4401, or Commander Joseph Wheeler, USN, Co-Chairman, at CY 4-1508."

TIGHT BINDING

133

Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Boston Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 7 1956

Flute Suite on Symphony Program

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 17,744
OCT 11 1956

Halloween Carnival Plans Made At PTA

The regular meeting of the St. Mary's PTA was held on Wednesday in the school at Fourth and Ann Sts. The president, Mrs. Benton, presided and the meeting was opened with a prayer by Monsignor Peter McNerney.

Mrs. L. C. Hanks reported on the successful bread sale held and gave the treasurer's report. Mrs. Joseph Eiden, health and safety chairman told of her Committee's activities during the past month, of cards sent, visits made to the sick and gift to a new baby. It was decided to omit flowers to the sick in as much as there were so many and the treasury would not permit.

A plan to serve hot lunches in the school cafeteria was presented to the meeting by Mrs. Harvey Williams, of a local lunch room, which will be decided upon after all parents can be contacted.

Mrs. Paul Starling reported that plans for the Halloween Carnival to be held Oct. 30 were well under way and a final committee meeting would be held on Oct. 23. The carnival for youngsters and the 7th through 9th give cakes for the cake walk.

D. K. Wiard, assistant ways and means chairman, announced that tickets on the portable TV, vacuum and portable radio would not be ready for sale until after the Bazaar of Nov. 9 and 10.

Next regular meeting will be Nov. 7 at 7:30 p.m.

Tournament A

The Thursday Evening Brid Club at the Young Women's Chr tian Association had five tables bridge. High score was won Mrs. Don Schuyler; low prize Mrs. C. W. Shaw. Others playi were Mrs. Caroline Montgome Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Narron, M Elizabeth Matthews, Mrs. E. Halleck, Mrs. W. H. Hatcher, M Lola Eubanks, Mrs. Gussie L den, Mrs. H. F. Koonce, M Mary C. Warren, Miss Luc Moore, Mrs. Edna Wheat, M W. M. Simpson, Mr. Don Schuy ges ty Bordeaux wedding last tson looking ewly-pressed bert Hodgin

l steps. Bill
e East Cam-oming skits

hness, the tantalizing
d, homey bread. Not present-day breads,
at-home bread. And er! Get yours now.
ONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

Great Mass" in ered by Hande

re coming from Rep. T
Providence, R.I. tian A for tomorrow ins, C by the Handel Charle y to benefit the C. Ho undation. Mo- Sen. J n C minor will Lewin, program. Dr. Beatric ill conduct and John S ton Symphony Olsen, he singers, at F. Pete
8:15. bin, M
huge concert Mr. an
by Basil Regnar
Drayton and Michae
tola, include main, S rt H. Beau- tonstall
G. Sherman Mrs. G
H. Bonnell, H. Ed
Eldridge E. Speers
rence Curtis, Sen.
nfield Cet., Emma Raymond A. Treadw
elix Forte, John n J. Goboll, dron, ert H.
mond Whitne
glesworth, Jut
Wyner and Mrs. Anne M. Zyfers.

Patrons of the arts attending the concert will be Mrs. John Shillito, George B. Roweil, Leonard Cushman, Ruby Willis, Peter C. Tandy, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Thomas B. Card, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mesar, Alice Lovett, Charles Lewin, C. F. Adams Jr., Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. George W. Hemenway, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Eliot, Howard Filston, Mrs. C. A. Weatherly, Mrs. Rutherford Bingham, Blanche T. Bigelow, Roger E. Clapp, Mary M. Cochrane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Seton, Edward C. Stone, Steven B. Wilson, F. C. Ingalls, Amelia Peabody and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd.

Still others are Mrs. Austin Maxim, Mrs. Philip Stockton, William M. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Brewer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Weyerhaeuser, Robert H. Beaudreau, Mrs. William B. Thomas, H. Frederick Hagemann Sr., Francis S. Wyner, Juliet B. Maxim, Mr. and Mrs. Latimer Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Jeff Sibley, Walter C. Small, Mrs. Ann McLean Griffin and E. W. Smyth.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
Circ. D. 173,051 - S. 210,554
OCT 7 1956

On local turntables

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

"THE LOVE FOR THREE ORANGES"—This is the first complete recording of Prokofieff's fairy tale opera based on the Gozzi comedy, although the orchestral suite has been done in a number of excellent versions. The complete opera, in the Italian tradition, is unusually well sung by members of the Slovenian National Opera and chorus under Bego Leskovich. The orchestra meets the demanding tempestuous score with its rousing marches and stormy scenes. Good Radial Sound. (EPIC).

BEETHOVEN'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY—Another in music-art series, this album in superior new Orthophonic sound finds the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under that Caesar of the podium Fritz Reiner in fine form. Recognized as one of the world's finest conductors of the German repertoire, Reiner has combined Beethoven's Seventh with the composer's Fidelio Overture. In both he masters the problems of balance and sonority. (RCA-VICTOR)

MOZART—A sort of double-anniversary album, this new recording of Mozart's Symphony No. 41 in C, K-551, coupled with his No. 39 in E-Flat Major, K-543, bows to the composer on his Centennial Celebration Year, and takes a deeper bow to Bruno Walter, his 80th birthday anniversary and 60 years of conducting. It's an inspiring occasion, and the recording is distinguished by superb high-fidelity sound. (COLUMBIA).

BEETHOVEN'S SIXTH SYMPHONY—The "Pastoral," music that expresses everything that a human can feel, is given the best of the four recently recorded performances in this album by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch. The disc is released in recognition of the orchestra's 75th anniversary. New Orthophonic sound of excellent quality. (RCA-VICTOR).

ROCK 'N' ROLL—I don't go for this, but if you do, here's a new album by the masters, Bill Haley and His Comets in a rousing Rock-'N'-Roll show. A dozen of the numbers that are socking the country are included on the recording. And in Hi-Fi. (DECCA).

"A MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY," brings Ethel Merman to us in many great tunes that have played a part in her fabulous career in show business. Like other albums that bring back memories of yesterday, this one is nostalgic. And Ethel belts across with her usual gusto scores of numbers she has made hits during her long reign as queen of musical comedy in show business. The album is timely, being released as Miss Merman, after a brief "retirement," returns to the Broadway stage. Good listening and valuable addition to record libraries. (DECCA).

"BURL IVES SINGS FOR FUN"—And you'll have fun listening to "The Wayfaring Stranger" singing a variety of songs in the best Burl Ives manner in this new Hi-Fi album. The fellow is priceless, and he makes the most of such numbers as "Blue Tail Fly," "Boll Weevil," "The Fox," "Erie Canal" and "I'm Goin' Down the Road." (DECCA).

Key West, Florida
Coral Tribune
October 12, 1956

Community Concerts

voted to make this season a gala one. Consquently, we will present for our January concert the world-famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra. This will be the first time a symphony orchestra has played in Key West.

As with any large group of this type, the Boston "Pops" had to be contracted for months ahead of time, and we are announcing it ahead of the campaign with considerable pride and pleasure.

"Perhaps you would enjoy working with our group in this exciting and rewarding activity.

"Our corps of workers includes both Navy and civilian residents, and winter visitors as well. There are prizes for the workers, including one free membership for every fifteen memberships sold.

"For more information either as a potential member, or worker, please call Mrs. Delio Cobo, Membership Chairman, at CY 6-4401, or Commander Joseph Wheeler, USN, Co-Chairman, at CY 4-1503."

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 204,260 - S. 237,502
OCT 7 1956

Boston Symphony To Be Heard On KOMO-Radio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will be heard in a series of four Monday-night concerts beginning Monday at 7:15 over Station KOMO.

The opening concert will be devoted to Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major, Opus 61, with Wolfgang Schneiderman of Vienna making his American debut as guest soloist.

Other concerts will be heard on KOMO at the same time on October 15, 22 and 29.

The series will consist of major selections from the orchestra's Friday-afternoon concerts at Boston's Symphony Hall and will be heard by recording.

Ben Grauer will be the commentator for the series.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973
OCT 8 1956

Weekend Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch will conduct the second pair of this season's Friday afternoon-Saturday evening subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this coming weekend.

The program will begin with the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings by Bach, with the orchestra's solo flutist, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, playing the prominent flute part. "Iberia," the second of the three "Images" for orchestra by Debussy, will follow. Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony will make up the latter half of the program.

The first of this season's six Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Nov. 4. Dr. Munch will conduct four of the concerts. Pierre Monteux and Jean Martinon, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris (who will then be making his American debut) will each conduct a concert.

Soloists in this series will be the Roumanian-Swiss pianist, Clara Haskil, and the soprano, Irmgard Seefried.

A few subscriptions for this series still are available as well as a few single subscriptions for the Saturday night series. Information may be obtained at the Symphony Hall box office.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Circ. D. 90,767 - S. 104,268
OCT 7 1956

New Year Here For Records

Angel recording artists with recent releases are (left to right) Antonietta Stella, whose first for Angel is "La Traviata;" Otto Klemperer, conducting the Philharmonia in Beethoven's "Eroica;" Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano who is one of the singers in the Shiller episode of Beethoven's Eight and Ninth package; Herbert von Karajan, conductor for the Eighth and Ninth; Guiseppe Di Stefano, tenor who sings with Miss Stella on the "La Traviata" wax; and Andre Gluytens, French conductor who recorded Gounod's "Mireille."

Orchestral Works Of Beethoven Fare Well; Brahms Also Gets Fine Representation

By JAMES N. CAIN

Fall is here. In the record business it means the beginning of a new year. If events of recent weeks can serve as a forecast of things to come, the year is sure to be exciting.

NOT ONLY are we living in the age of advanced sciences, but never before has the world experienced such a high degree of virtuosity in music. No longer can it be said that our big Eastern orchestras surpass those of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit or Minneapolis. Al fine ensembles.

Generally, the point of departure for both the amateur and professional critics must be directed toward such things as style. Often this can be determined through a knowledge of music history. But all too frequently it's a personal thing. A musical performance can be in the best of taste and supported by tradition, yet fail to win the heart and mind of its listener.

ORCHESTRAL works of Beethoven have fared usually well in recent weeks. Angel has the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies packaged in a two record set. Von Karajan conducts the Philharmonica Orchestra. The singers in the Schiller episode are Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, Marga Hoeffgen, Ernest Haeflinger, Otto Edelmann and the Chorus of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna.

Another Angel release features Klemperer conducting the Philharmonica in Beethoven's "Eroica"—The Third Sympathy.

VICTOR has released the Pastorale Symphony, by the Boston Symphony led by Munch. The same artists also have recorded all of the Overtures Beethoven intended at one time or another for Fidelio, together with Coriolan.

Also on RCA Victor, the Seventh Symphony by Beethoven has appeared with Reiner conductng the Chicago Symphony.

AND FROM COLUMBIA we have a new recording of Beethoven's Emperor Concerto. Soloist is Robert Casadesus with the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos. The recording was made in Paris last year during the Philharmonic's European tour.

From the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, Columbia has recorded the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and Mozart's G Minor with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Ormandy conducting.

IN A TECHNICAL sense, all of the above recordings can be recommended. And each performance contains many moments of inner beauty and perception. Yet the recording I find most satisfying is Klemperer's Eroica. Here, everything is fulfilled. The pace seems right and while the reading speaks of dramatic intensity, it still contains much warmth.

BOTH MUNCH and Reiner dazzle the ears. Ormandy is suave and beautiful, but all three conductors seem a trifle impersonal at times. We could hope for a little more excitement from von Karajan, especially in the Ninth. Casadesus' poetic reading suffers occasionally from a metallic tone. But again, I emphasize, these are highly personal elements. Each has something wonderful to offer.

THE MUSIC of Brahms has also received fine representation from recent catalogue additions. The artistic temperament of Eugene Ormandy has always been best revealed in the works dating from late 19th century romanticism to the present. (Whether we refer to Ormandy or the Philadephia Orchestra doesn't really matter, for they are identified as one in the same).

With their devoted friend Rudolf Serkin, the Philadelphians have re-recorded their memorable reading of the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. And on another Columbia LP, they've joined forces with Zino Francescatti to record the Brahms Violin Concerto. Everyone concerned is at his best. Serkin will unquestionably remain the standard bearer for the B flat Piano Concerto for years to come.

EIGHTY-YEAR-OLD Bruno Walter, the most eloquent champion of Brahms, has recorded the Double Concerto in A Minor. With Isaac Stern, violinist, and Leonard Rose, cellist, with the New York Philharmonic, Dr. Walter's Columbia recording also includes the Tragic Overture and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

The Tragic Overture has been paired with the Brahms Second Symphony on a Victor recording. Munch conducts the Boston Symphony. Munch is slightly erratic in handling the overture, but his steady treatment of the symphony is free from mannerisms. All of the instrumental voices are especially bright and clear.

FOR ANGEL, von Karajan conducts the Philharmonia Orchestra in a rather unconventional Brahms' Fourth. Yet it seems closer to the heart of the score than any previous interpretation I've heard. The first two movements are intimate and lyrical, seeming at times to touch into the realm of chamber music. The third movement is boisterous and brassy, as it should be. The last movement is a composite of all these characteristics.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
OCT 11 1956

Lack of Courtesy at Symphony

To The Editor of The Herald:

Last Friday afternoon I left Symphony Hall after the season's first concert, in a state of frustrated rage. It was not the concert, as that was superb. The habit that some people have of leaving the Hall during the last part of the Friday concert has been going on for years, to the disturbance of both orchestra and audience.

On this particular Friday the orchestra had just returned from its triumphant tour of Europe where it was received with tremendous ovations for orchestra and conductor after each concert. I can only imagine the state of mind of Mr. Munch on this, the occasion of his home coming concert. An unusually large number of people broke the spell of the beautifully played first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony by leaving the hall as the music ceased. It was impossible for Mr. Munch to carry on into the second movement without a jarring and discordant break. And, as usual, a trickle of early leavers continued on through the rest of the Symphony. I was astounded that at least on this memorable occasion the audience could not do Mr. Munch and the orchestra the courtesy of sitting through to the end of the concert.

I should like to make a practical suggestion which I am sure will be seconded by all Friday afternoon symphony goers who are aware of the privilege that we have in Boston of being able to attend regular concerts by such a conductor and such an orchestra. We are spoiled and take them too much for granted. Is it too much to ask that those who must leave do so during the intermission or at the end of a piece and, please, never between movements or when the piece is in progress? Do symphony goers not owe this courtesy to both Mr. Munch and their fellow listeners?

Milton, ANN B. CARTER.

CHARLOTTE, N. C. NEWS
OCT 8 1956

FINE ARTS CALENDAR

By EDWIN S. BERGAMINI

MONDAY

Charlotte Music Club, opening banquet, Woman's Club, 7 p.m. Thomas Holt, baritone, guest soloist.

Little Theater of Charlotte, opening, "The Seven Year Itch," 8:15 p.m. Through Saturday, Oct. 20.

TUESDAY

Claire Coci, organist, Belk Chapel, Queens College, 8 p.m. Dedication of organ.

WEDNESDAY

Charlotte Music Club, "Morning Musicale" (workshop), Stultz Hall, Queens College, 10 a.m.

Mint Museum, annual tour of Charlotte Homes.

THURSDAY

Mint Museum, annual tour of Charlotte Homes, repeated.

Duke Ellington, pianist-composer, Ovens Auditorium, 8 p.m.

FRIDAY

South Piedmont District meeting of the N. C. Education Association; music program and demonstration at Myers Park Methodist Church, 10 a.m.

SUNDAY

John E. Williams, of Flora Macdonald College, organ recital, Belk Chapel, Queens College, 4 p.m.

Pianist Jean Miller and soprano Eleanor Ritterskamp had a selling job to do at Wingate Junior College Thursday evening, where they gave a joint recital. The youthful audience seemed to have rock and roll in mind; credit the two Charlotte artists with beguiling them into good attentiveness toward Vivaldi, Brahms, Dvorak, and Persichetti.

The Persichetti Third Sonata, which we recall Miss Miller played at a Music Club event a year or two ago, continues to attract with a moving Coplandesque "Episode," second of its movements. We hope Miss Ritterskamp will repeat in Charlotte the Dvorak "Eight Liebeslieder" she offered; such healthy, warm, unspoiled songs should be heard more often.

MESSIAH REHEARSAL

Attendance is essential, we understand, at the opening rehearsal for the annual "Messiah" chorus to be held Sunday, 3-4:30 p. m., First Methodist Church. Conducting this year's Charlotte Community Christmas Chorus is Earl F. Berg.

Disc of the Week: We feel the Stevenson camp should be at least a bit concerned with this one. Victor has brought out a disc entitled, "The President's Favorite Music," complete with an attractive jacket photograph of the President and Mrs. Eisenhower.

The chief executive's taste seems to embrace Bach to Gershwin, with excursions into spirituals (Marian Anderson doing "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands") and movie music excerpts. Much of the material Victor has given us elsewhere, earlier; new to their catalog is the best thing on the record, a near-perfect performance of Mendelssohn's inspired portrait, his "Fingal's Cave Overture," by Fritz Reiner and the Chicago Symphony.

EGGHEAD BID

The record jacket tells us of other Eisenhower favorites. Sousa marches; Mussorgsky's "Boris." The Boston Pops in musical comedy medleys. Handel's "Water Music" Suite; Brahms and Mendelssohn symphonies. The Beethoven Ninth symphony. This sounds to us like a bid for the egghead vote. Unless the Democrats expect to take this lying down, we'd expect a release of "Stevenson Favorites" before the campaign is over!

Radio opener of the regular season: the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D, op. 61, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan as soloist (WSOC, Monday, 8:15 p.m).

Jerome Kern's music makes up the entire Voice of Firestone program (WAYS, Monday, 8:30 p.m.), with baritone Thomas L. Thomas soloing in "Look for the Silver Lining" and other numbers.

PHONE HOUR

Baritone Igor Gorin will sing "Nemico della Patria" from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier" on the Telephone Hour (WSOC, Monday, 9 p.m.).

Mark Bucci's "American horse opera," "Sweet Betsy from Pike," will receive its first television performance Tuesday on NBC network's "Home" program (11 a.m.).

"What Makes Music?" is the feature of Thursday's "Carolina Hour" (WBTV, 9:30 p.m.). A group of children from the Charlotte city schools will serve as a demonstration group in this program. The Charlotte Little Symphony Orchestra will be directed by James Christian Pfohl.

How he got that way: 81-year-old Pierre Monteux, of the handful of the world's practicing conductorial greats, recently admitted, in an interview with New York Herald Tribune reporter Art Buchwald, that he has conducted 70 different symphony orchestras in his lifetime. The best one? Why, "the Boston Symphony, without any doubt, is the greatest in the world. You have no idea what that orchestra can do."

Well—not Mr. Buchwald, to be sure. But we'd say Maitre Monteux knows very well what the great orchestra, which appeared here last fall, is capable of!

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Circ. D. 90,767 - S. 104,268

OCT 7 1956

New Year Here For Records

Angel recording artists with recent releases are (left to right) Antonietta Stella, whose first for Angel is "La Traviata;" Otto Klemperer, conducting the Philharmonia in Beethoven's "Eroica;" Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano who is one of the singers in the Shiller episode of Beethoven's Eight and Ninth package; Herbert von Karajan, conductor for the Eighth and Ninth; Guiseppe Di Stefano, tenor who sings with Miss Stella on the "La Traviata" wax; and Andre Gluytens, French conductor who recorded Gounod's "Mireille."

Orchestral Works Of Beethoven Fare Well; Brahms Also Gets Fine Representation

By JAMES N. CAIN

Fall is here. In the record business it means the beginning of a new year. If events of recent weeks can serve as a forecast of things to come, the year is sure to be exciting.

NOT ONLY are we living in the age of advanced sciences, but never before has the world experienced such a high degree of virtuosity in music. No longer can it be said that our big Eastern orchestras surpass those of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit or Minneapolis. Al fine ensembles.

Generally, the point of departure for both the amateur and professional critics must be directed toward such things as style. Often this can be determined through a knowledge of music history. But all too frequently it's a personal thing. A musical performance can be in the best of taste and supported by tradition, yet fail to win the heart and mind of its listener.

ORCHESTRAL works of Beethoven have fared usually well in recent weeks. Angel has the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies packaged in a two record set. Von Karajan conducts the Philharmonica Orchestra. The singers in the Schiller episode are Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, Marga Hoeffgen, Ernest Haeflinger, Otto Edelmann and the Chorus of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna.

Another Angel release features Klemperer conducting the Philharmonica in Beethoven's "Eroica"—The Third Sympathy.

VICTOR has released the Pastorale Symphony, by the Boston Symphony led by Munch. The same artists also have recorded all of the Overtures Beethoven intended at one time or another for Fidelio, together with Coriolan.

Also on RCA Victor, the Seventh Symphony by Beethoven has appeared with Reiner conductng the Chicago Symphony.

AND FROM COLUMBIA we have a new recording of Beethoven's Emperor Concerto. Soloist is Robert Casadesus with the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos. The recording was made in Paris last year during the Philharmonic's European tour.

From the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, Columbia has recorded the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and Mozart's G Minor with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Ormandy conducting.

IN A TECHNICAL sense, all of the above recordings can be recommended. And each performance contains many moments of inner beauty and perception. Yet the recording I find most satisfying is Klemperer's Eroica. Here, everything is fulfilled. The pace seems right and while the reading speaks of dramatic intensity, it still contains much warmth.

BOTH MUNCH and Reiner dazzle the ears. Ormandy is suave and beautiful, but all three conductors seem a trifle impersonal at times. We could hope for a little more excitement from von Karajan, especially in the Ninth. Casadesus' poetic reading suffers occasionally from a metallic tone. But again, I emphasize, these are highly personal elements. Each has something wonderful to offer.

THE MUSIC of Brahms has also received fine representation from recent catalogue additions. The artistic temperament of Eugene Ormandy has always been best revealed in the works dating from late 19th century romanticism to the present. (Whether we refer to Ormandy or the Philadephia Orchestra doesn't really matter, for they are identified as one in the same).

With their devoted friend Rudolf Serkin, the Philadelphians have re-recorded their memorable reading of the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. And on another Columbia LP, they've joined forces with Zino Francescatti to record the Brahms Violin Concerto. Everyone concerned is at his best. Serkin will unquestionably remain the standard bearer for the B flat Piano Concerto for years to come.

EIGHTY-YEAR-OLD Bruno Walter, the most eloquent champion of Brahms, has recorded the Double Concerto in A Minor. With Isaac Stern, violinist, and Leonard Rose, cellist, with the New York Philharmonia, Dr. Walter's Columbia recording also includes the Tragic Overture and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

The Tragic Overture has been paired with the Brahms Second Symphony on a Victor recording. Munch conducts the Boston Symphony. Munch is slightly erratic in handling the overture, but his steady treatment of the symphony is free from mannerisms. All of the instrumental voices are especially bright and clear.

FOR ANGEL, von Karajan conducts the Philharmonia Orchestra in a rather unconventional Brahms' Fourth. Yet it seems closer to the heart of the score than any previous interpretation I've heard. The first two movements are intimate and lyrical, seeming at times to touch into the realm of chamber music. The third movement is boisterous and brassy, as it should be. The last movement is a composite of all these characteristics.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 11 1956

Lack of Courtesy at Symphony

To The Editor of The Herald:

Last Friday afternoon I left Symphony Hall after the season's first concert, in a state of frustrated rage. It was not the concert, as that was superb. The habit that some people have of leaving the Hall during the last part of the Friday concert has been going on for years, to the disturbance of both orchestra and audience.

On this particular Friday the orchestra had just returned from its triumphant tour of Europe where it was received with tremendous ovations for orchestra and conductor after each concert. I can only imagine the state of mind of Mr. Munch on this, the occasion of his home coming concert. An unusually large number of people broke the spell of the beautifully played first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony by leaving the hall as the music ceased. It was impossible for Mr. Munch to carry on into the second movement without a jarring and discordant break. And, as usual, a trickle of early leavers continued on through the rest of the Symphony. I was astounded that at least on this memorable occasion the audience could not do Mr. Munch and the orchestra the courtesy of sitting through to the end of the concert.

I should like to make a practical suggestion which I am sure will be seconded by all Friday afternoon symphony goers who are aware of the privilege that we have in Boston of being able to attend regular concerts by such a conductor and such an orchestra. We are spoiled and take them too much for granted. Is it too much to ask that those who must leave do so during the intermission or at the end of a piece and, please, never between movements or when the piece is in progress? Do symphony goers not owe this courtesy to both Mr. Munch and their fellow listeners?

Milton, ANN B. CARTER.

CHARLOTTE, N. C. NEWS

OCT 8 1956

FINE ARTS CALENDAR

By EDWIN S. BERGAMINI

MONDAY

Charlotte Music Club, opening banquet, Woman's Club, 7 p.m. Thomas Holt, baritone, guest soloist.

Little Theater of Charlotte, opening, "The Seven Year Itch," 8:15 p.m. Through Saturday, Oct. 20.

TUESDAY

Claire Coci, organist, Belk Chapel, Queens College, 8 p.m. Dedication of organ.

WEDNESDAY

Charlotte Music Club, "Morning Musicale" (workshop), Stultz Hall, Queens College, 10 a.m.

Mint Museum, annual tour of Charlotte Homes.

THURSDAY

Mint Museum, annual tour of Charlotte Homes, repeated.

Duke Ellington, pianist-composer, Ovens Auditorium, 8 p.m.

FRIDAY

South Piedmont District meeting of the N. C. Education Association; music program and demonstration at Myers Park Methodist Church, 10 a.m.

SUNDAY

John E. Williams, of Flora Macdonald College, organ recital, Belk Chapel, Queens College, 4 p.m.

Pianist Jean Miller and soprano Eleanor Ritterskamp had a selling job to do at Wingate Junior College Thursday evening, where they gave a joint recital. The youthful audience seemed to have rock and roll in mind; credit the two Charlotte artists with beguiling them into good attentiveness toward Vivaldi, Brahms, Dvorak, and Persichetti.

The Persichetti Third Sonata, which we recall Miss Miller played at a Music Club event a year or two ago, continues to attract with a moving Coplandesque "Episode," second of its movements. We hope Miss Ritterskamp will repeat in Charlotte the Dvorak "Eight Liebeslieder" she offered; such healthy, warm, unspoiled songs should be heard more often.

MESSIAH REHEARSAL

Attendance is essential, we understand, at the opening rehearsal for the annual "Messiah" chorus to be held Sunday, 3-4:30 p. m., First Methodist Church. Conducting this year's Charlotte Community Christmas Chorus is Earl F. Berg.

Disc of the Week: We feel the Stevenson camp should be at least a bit concerned with this one. Victor has brought out a disc entitled, "The President's Favorite Music," complete with an attractive jacket photograph of the President and Mrs. Eisenhower.

The chief executive's taste seems to embrace Bach to Gershwin, with excursions into spirituals (Marian Anderson doing "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands") and movie music excerpts. Much of the material Victor has given us elsewhere, earlier; new to their catalog is the best thing on the record, a near - perfect performance of Mendelssohn's inspired portrait, his "Fingal's Cave Overture," by Fritz Reiner and the Chicago Symphony.

EGGHEAD BID

The record jacket tells us of other Eisenhower favorites. Sousa marches; Mussorgsky's "Boris." The Boston Pops in musical comedy medleys. Handel's "Water Music" Suite; Brahms and Mendelssohn symphonies. The Beethoven Ninth symphony. This sounds to us like a bid for the egghead vote. Unless the Democrats expect to take this lying down, we'd expect a release of "Stevenson Favorites" before the campaign is over!

Radio opener of the regular season: the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D, op. 61, with Wolfgang Schneiderhan as soloist (WSOC, Monday, 8:15 p.m).

Jerome Kern's music makes up the entire Voice of Firestone program (WAYS, Monday, 8:30 p.m.), with baritone Thomas L. Thomas soloing in "Look for the Silver Lining" and other numbers.

PHONE HOUR

Baritone Igor Gorin will sing "Nemico della Patria" from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier" on the Telephone Hour (WSOC, Monday, 9 p.m.).

Mark Bucci's "American horse opera," "Sweet Betsy from Pike," will receive its first television performance Tuesday on NBC network's "Home" program (11 a.m.).

"What Makes Music?" is the feature of Thursday's "Carolina Hour" (WBTV, 9:30 p.m.). A group of children from the Charlotte city schools will serve as a demonstration group in this program. The Charlotte Little Symphony Orchestra will be directed by James Christian Pfohl.

How he got that way: 81-year-old Pierre Monteux, of the handful of the world's practicing conductorial greats, recently admitted, in an interview with New York Herald Tribune reporter Art Buchwald, that he has conducted 70 different symphony orchestras in his lifetime. The best one? Why, "the Boston Symphony, without any doubt, is the greatest in the world. You have no idea what that orchestra can do."

Well—not Mr. Buchwald, to be sure. But we'd say Maitre Monteux knows very well what the great orchestra, which appeared here last fall, is capable of!

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
Circ. D. 138,887

OCT 1 3 1956

CHARLES MUNCH
Conducts Boston Symphony

CHARLOTTE HOLLOMAN
Gives Severance Recital

Orchestra to Play Music Written for Gingold

By ETHEL BOROS

Josef Gingold, concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra, will be the soloist with the orchestra under the baton of George Szell at the third pair of symphony concerts in Severance Hall, Thursday and Saturday evenings, October 18 and 20.

"Portrait" for violin and orchestra by the contemporary composer Bernard Rogers, which was written specially for Mr. Gingold, will receive its first performance in Cleveland at the Thursday concert.

The composer created the "Portrait" as a tribute to a great Post-impressionist painter savagely ignored in his brief lifetime. He states that he "wanted to reflect memories and moods of the artists' short, tortured life, and the conflicts and contradictions of his nature."

The program opens with another American work, Paul Creston's "Dance Overture," Op. 62, composed in 1954 and a "first" performance at these concerts.

The Creston work is an idealization of the dance rhythms of four countries which have ruled the Florida territory, the Spanish bolero, the English country dance, the French Loura, and the American Square Dance.

Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 38, and Saint-Saens' Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, with Gingold as violinist, complete the program. The Schumann work is the first of the commemorative performances scheduled by George Szell in honor of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's death.

SUNDAY NIGHT, OCTOBER 14, THE CLEVELAND Orchestra under George Szell launches the second season of "West Shore Concerts" in Lakewood Civic Auditorium. Selections include the Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor and Wagnerian works including "Prelude and Love-Death" (Tristan), "Forest Murmurs" (Siegfried), "Ride of the Valkyries," "Votan's Farewell" and "Magic Fire Music" from "Die Walkure."

Boston Symphony Here Friday

The Boston Symphony, which is celebrating its 75th anniversary with its current concert season, comes to Cleveland on Friday, October 19 at 8:30 p. m. in Music Hall.

Noted for its playing of new music, the repertory for the past five years has included almost 30 premieres as well as performances of many other contemporary works by American and European composers. For its Cleveland concert, however, conductor Charles Munch has selected several oldies, the Bach Suite No. 2 B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique" Symphony.

Societa Correli

The 13-piece Italian Chamber Orchestra, Societa Corelli, makes its Cleveland bow Monday, October 15 at Severance Hall, under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Chamber Music Society. Program includes works by Corelli, Paganini, Mannino, Vivaldi and Bartok. This is the first in the series of seven chamber music concerts.

Next Saturday and Sunday, under the sponsorship of G. Bernardi, the Yugoslav "Kolo" or State company of dancers, singers and musicians will perform in Music Hall in its first U. S. tour.

The program promises to be thrilling, varied and different. "Slavonic Rhapsody" is an elaborate dance and music festival based on folk dances of the country. Greek, Turkish, Hungarian, Russian, Rumanian, Italian and even Moslem influences are felt in the dances of the various regions of the country.

On October 20 the "Kolo" performs at 8:30 and on October 21 at 3:30 p. m.

The Bernardi offering this weekend is Carmen Amaya at WHK's Studio One.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

OCT 13 1956

SYMPHONY LIBRARIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 12 (AP)—Leslie J. Rogers, 62, music librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 44 years, died Thursday night at the U. S. Army Hospital at Stuttgart, Germany. News of Rogers' death was received tonight by Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the orchestra.

Rogers became ill in Vienna Sept. 12 dring the orchestra's European tour. Vienna was the 11th city out of 19 visited by the symphony. When the orchestra moved to Stuttgart for a concert on the 13th, Dr. Keran Chobanian, traveling physician with the party, ordered Rogers to the Army hospital. Death was the result of double pneumonia and complications.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently planned these performances with more attention than usual to the single flute part. He reduced the number of strings considerably, and even placed mutes upon the first violins so that the flute always would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Mrs. Dwyer made it "sing" in every measure. As always, the fast pace of the concluding badinerie gave the flute extra brilliance above the busy string weavings. The flutist is left, here, to deal as well as may be with coordination of breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer played as if there were no difficulties whatever, and she much deserved the applause received when the conductor directed her to take two bows alone.

Keeping the strings so far down, however, made the Suite sound less like Bach than I would have liked. In Bach's time no doubt the Suite was performed as a chamber piece, with the flute less in evidence, unless the reputed coarse tone of that time forced it to attention.

Today you can play the Suite with a small number of strings, yet with more resonance, naturally, and a greater concerted effect. Or you can do as Mr. Munch did and make it a miniature with solo. Nice as it was always to hear Mrs. Dwyer's instrument, the concerted effect is better, I think, for mutes lend a color alien to Bach. And why not a harpsichord for continuo?

Debussy's Iberia, with the final brass phrase of "Festival Day" taken quite slow and carefully articulated, was, on the whole, Mr. Munch's best reading of the afternoon. He is a superb conductor with Debussy, bringing out the muscularity of that composer, who once was performed as if his Impressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apart from an overly fast beat in the allegro of the first movement that reduced much of the string ensemble to a confused gabble. But the finale, in its faster pages, was much too fast and anything but clear; the orchestra was not together in simultaneous entrances, there were some coarse details, as the last pizzicati from the double-basses, and the movement had far too much suggestion of having been improvised.

The performance might have been superlative for some other orchestras, but it was not the Boston Symphony's best. Mr. Munch seems not to work with the strings, especially the violins, as much as formerly, and he fails to mold important phrases, or indicate important nuances as much as he ought. In Tchaikovsky these matters are absolute essentials.

Though but recently back from 11,000 miles of traveling, the orchestra takes to the road again next week. At the next Boston concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Munch will present Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings; the Fourth Symphony by Schumann; Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, and La Valse, by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 13 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the second concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute. The program:

Suite No. 2 in B minor..... Bach
Iberia ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony as performed by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony orchestra provides one of the supreme musical experiences to to be found anywhere in the world. It was so when Mr. Munch did it several years ago; it was so yesterday.

The reason is perhaps not too hard to find: Mr. Munch seems to have a singular affinity for this work both as man and musician. Koussevitzky had it too, but his beat was too mystical and eratic to convey all his intentions: the difficult passage for the brass in the last movement never went well. And close as he was to the work traditionally and emotionally, he emphasized its sentiment to the point of sentimentality; one always felt it was Koussevitzky's heart on his sleeve, no Tchaikovsky's.

Munch's deep sentiment never touches sentimentality, nor, despite the intense theatricality of the work, does he allow its flaming drama to descend to melodrama. In his hands the pathos of the first and last movements rises to a tragic level. There is, about them, a quality of affirmation as well; the tragedy is relieved in the reassuring lyric passages following the turbulent agitation and tonal weight of the darker moments.

Yet despite his obvious personal indentification in the music and his depth of feeling in the traversal of it, he never forgets his essential role, that of drawing from his men a unified musical performance. There were trivial flaws yesterday, but the overall performance was an extraordinary example of orchestral virtuosity in its highest expression. The orchestral response to Mr. Munch's rhythmic bouyancy in the endless grateful second movement, to his wild demands for ever more excitement in the march was awesome and although we have all heard this work again and again, I am sure I speak for the whole audience when I say that the gathering momentum of the march sent chills down our backs.

Inner Impact

It was, all in all, a remarkable feat to endow this familiar work, which comes so close to vulgarity, with so much power, so much inner impact and so much distinction. And had it ended with the march I am sure the orchestra and conductor might have got a European ovation, for it is not easy to explode with applause following the final stillness of this symphony. Even as it was, the audience was unusually generous in its appreciation.

It had been all afternoon, for that matter. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, following a perfectly charming performance of Bach's B minor suite with the string orchestra, was repeatedly called up for a bow. But here, for the first time in a long time, I found Mr. Munch's tempos out of character. He took the rondo much too slowly in my view, and the exquisite polonaise seemed slow as well. In the "double" of the polonaise, he also used the first violins in a pizzicato accompaniment and doubled the first viola with the cello, which sounded very well, but I wonder whose idea that was? It wasn't Bach's anyway. Be that as it may, though the performance as a whole was a shade listless in my view, Mrs. Anthony again demonstrated that she has few equals in either sex as a flute virtuoso.

Debussy's "Iberia" seems almost written with Mr. Munch in mind. He does this colorful work, so filled with musical perfume as to be almost fragrant to the nose itself, with the most subtle magic, seeking out its every nuance, its every fleeting phrase, its every tonal and rhythmic essence. It was beautiful to hear and it was beautifully done by the orchestra, too, which shows no more effect of its weary days and nights on the European road than if the journey had been merely from Tanglewood to Boston.

The orchestra is off on its first tour of the season next week, returning on Oct. 26 to repeat Piston's Sixth Symphony. Other works include Barber's Adagio, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse."

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
Circ. D. 138,887

OCT 13 1956

CHARLES MUNCH
Conducts Boston Symphony

CHARLOTTE HOLLOMAN
Gives Severance Recital

Orchestra to Play Music Written for Gingold

By ETHEL BOROS

Josef Gingold, concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra, will be the soloist with the orchestra under the baton of George Szell at the third pair of symphony concerts in Severance Hall, Thursday and Saturday evenings, October 18 and 20.

"Portrait" for violin and orchestra by the contemporary composer Bernard Rogers, which was written specially for Mr. Gingold, will receive its first performance in Cleveland at the Thursday concert.

The composer created the "Portrait" as a tribute to a great Post-impressionist painter savagely ignored in his brief lifetime. He states that he "wanted to reflect memories and moods of the artists' short, tortured life, and the conflicts and contradictions of his nature."

The program opens with another American work, Paul Creston's "Dance Overture," Op. 62, composed in 1954 and a "first" performance at these concerts.

The Creston work is an idealization of the dance rhythms of four countries which have ruled the Florida territory, the Spanish bolero, the English country dance, the French Loura, and the American Square Dance.

Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 38, and Saint-Saens' Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, with Gingold as violinist, complete the program. The Schumann work is the first of the commemorative performances scheduled by George Szell in honor of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's death.

SUNDAY NIGHT, OCTOBER 14, THE CLEVELAND Orchestra under George Szell launches the second season of "West Shore Concerts" in Lakewood Civic Auditorium. Selections include the Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor and Wagnerian works including "Prelude and Love-Death" (Tristan), "Forest Murmurs" (Siegfried), "Ride of the Valkyries," "Votan's Farewell" and "Magic Fire Music" from "Die Walkure."

Boston Symphony Here Friday

The Boston Symphony, which is celebrating its 75th anniversary with its current concert season, comes to Cleveland on Friday, October 19 at 8:30 p. m. in Music Hall.

Noted for its playing of new music, the repertory for the past five years has included almost 30 premieres as well as performances of many other contemporary works by American and European composers. For its Cleveland concert, however, conductor Charles Munch has selected several oldies, the Bach Suite No. 2 B Minor for flute and strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and "Images" for Orchestra No. 2, and the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique" Symphony.

Societa Correli

The 13-piece Italian Chamber Orchestra, Societa Corelli, makes its Cleveland bow Monday, October 15 at Severance Hall, under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Chamber Music Society. Program includes works by Corelli, Paganini, Mannino, Vivaldi and Bartok. This is the first in the series of seven chamber music concerts.

Next Saturday and Sunday, under the sponsorship of G. Bernardi, the Yugoslav "Kolo" or State company of dancers, singers and musicians will perform in Music Hall in its first U. S. tour.

The program promises to be thrilling, varied and different. "Slavonic Rhapsody" is an elaborate dance and music festival based on folk dances of the country. Greek, Turkish, Hungarian, Russian, Rumanian, Italian and even Moslem influences are felt in the dances of the various regions of the country.

On October 20 the "Kolo" performs at 8:30 and on October 21 at 3:30 p. m.

The Bernardi offering this weekend is Carmen Amaya at WHK's Studio One.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

OCT 13 1956

SYMPHONY LIBRARIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 12 (AP)—Leslie J. Rogers, 62, music librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 44 years, died Thursday night at the U. S. Army Hospital at Stuttgart, Germany. News of Rogers' death was received tonight by Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the orchestra.

Rogers became ill in Vienna Sept. 12 dring the orchestra's European tour. Vienna was the 11th city out of 19 visited by the symphony. When the orchestra moved to Stuttgart for a concert on the 13th, Dr. Keran Chobanian, traveling physician with the party, ordered Rogers to the Army hospital. Death was the result of double pneumonia and complications.

135

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently planned these performances with more attention than usual to the single flute part. He reduced the number of strings considerably, and even placed mutes upon the first violins so that the flute always would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Mrs. Dwyer made it "sing" in every measure. As always, the fast pace of the concluding badinerie gave the flute extra brilliance above the busy string weavings. The flutist is left, here, to deal as well as may be with coordination of breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer played as if there were no difficulties whatever, and she much deserved the applause received when the conductor directed her to take two bows alone.

Keeping the strings so far down, however, made the Suite sound less like Bach than I would have liked. In Bach's time no doubt the Suite was performed as a chamber piece, with the flute less in evidence, unless the reputed coarse tone of that time forced it to attention.

Today you can play the Suite with a small number of strings, yet with more resonance, naturally, and a greater concerted effect. Or you can do as Mr. Munch did and make it a miniature with solo. Nice as it was always to hear Mrs. Dwyer's instrument, the concerted effect is better, I think, for mutes lend a color alien to Bach. And why not a harpsichord for continuo?

Debussy's Iberia, with the final brass phrase of "Festival Day" taken quite slow and carefully articulated, was, on the whole, Mr. Munch's best reading of the afternoon. He is a superb conductor with Debussy, bringing out the muscularity of that composer, who once was performed as if his Impressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apart from an overly fast beat in the allegro of the first movement that reduced much of the string ensemble to a confused gabble. But the finale, in its faster pages, was much too fast and anything but clear; the orchestra was not together in simultaneous entrances, there were some coarse details, as the last pizzicati from the double-basses, and the movement had far too much suggestion of having been improvised.

The performance might have been superlative for some other orchestras, but it was not the Boston Symphony's best. Mr. Munch seems not to work with the strings, especially the violins, as much as formerly, and he fails to mold important phrases, or indicate important nuances as much as he ought. In Tchaikovsky these matters are absolute essentials.

Though but recently back from 11,000 miles of traveling, the orchestra takes to the road again next week. At the next Boston concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Munch will present Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings; the Fourth Symphony by Schumann; Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, and La Valse, by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 13 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the second concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute. The program:

Suite No. 2 in B minor.....Bach
Iberia ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony as performed by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony orchestra provides one of the supreme musical experiences to to be found anywhere in the world. It was so when Mr. Munch did it several years ago; it was so yesterday.

The reason is perhaps not too hard to find: Mr. Munch seems to have a singular affinity for this work both as man and musician. Koussevitzky had it too, but his beat was too mystical and eratic to convey all his intentions: the difficult passage for the brass in the last movement never went well. And close as he was to the work traditionally and emotionally, he emphasized its sentiment to the point of sentimentality; one always felt it was Koussevitzky's heart on his sleeve, no Tchaikovsky's.

Munch's deep sentiment never touches sentimentality, nor, despite the intense theatricality of the work, does he allow its flaming drama to descend to melodrama. In his hands the pathos of the first and last movements rises to a tragic level. There is, about them, a quality of affirmation as well; the tragedy is relieved in the reassuring lyric passages following the turbulent agitation and tonal weight of the darker moments.

Yet despite his obvious personal indentification in the music and his depth of feeling in the traversal of it, he never forgets his essential role, that of drawing from his men a unified musical performance. There were trivial flaws yesterday, but the overall performance was an extraordinary example of orchestral virtuosity in its highest expression. The orchestral response to Mr. Munch's rhythmic bouyancy in the endless grateful second movement, to his wild demands for ever more excitement in the march was awesome and although we have all heard this work again and again, I am sure I speak for the whole audience when I say that the gathering momentum of the march sent chills down our backs.

Inner Impact

It was, all in all, a remarkable feat to endow this familiar work, which comes so close to vulgarity, with so much power, so much inner impact and so much distinction. And had it ended with the march I am sure the orchestra and conductor might have got a European ovation, for it is not easy to explode with applause following the final stillness of this symphony. Even as it was, the audience was unusually generous in its appreciation.

It had been all afternoon, for that matter. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, following a perfectly charming performance of Bach's B minor suite with the string orchestra, was repeatedly called up for a bow. But here, for the first time in a long time, I found Mr. Munch's tempos out of character. He took the rondo much too slowly in my view, and the exquisite polonaise seemed slow as well. In the "double" of the polonaise, he also used the first violins in a pizzicato accompaniment and doubled the first viola with the cello, which sounded very well, but I wonder whose idea that was? It wasn't Bach's anyway. Be that as it may, though the performance as a whole was a shade listless in my view, Mrs. Anthony again demonstrated that she has few equals in either sex as a flute virtuoso.

Debussy's "Iberia" seems almost written with Mr. Munch in mind. He does this colorful work, so filled with musical perfume as to be almost fragrant to the nose itself, with the most subtle magic, seeking out its every nuance, its every fleeting phrase, its every tonal and rhythmic essence. It was beautiful to hear and it was beautifully done by the orchestra, too, which shows no more effect of its weary days and nights on the European road than if the journey had been merely from Tanglewood to Boston.

The orchestra is off on its first tour of the season next week, returning on Oct. 26 to repeat Piston's Sixth Symphony. Other works include Barber's Adagio, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse."

136

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 154,300

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently planned these performances with more attention than usual to the single flute part. He reduced the number of strings considerably, and even placed mutes upon the first violins so that the flute always would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Mrs. Dwyer made it "sing" in every measure. As always, the fast pace of the concluding badinerie gave the flute extra brilliance above the busy string weavings. The flutist is left, here, to deal as well as may be with coordination of breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer played as if there were no difficulties whatever, and she much deserved the applause received when the conductor directed her to take two bows alone.

Keeping the strings so far down, however, made the Suite sound less like Bach than I would have liked. In Bach's time no doubt the Suite was performed as a chamber piece, with the flute less in evidence, unless the reputed coarse tone of that time forced it to attention.

Today you can play the Suite with a small number of strings, yet with more resonance, naturally, and a greater concerted effect. Or you can do as Mr. Munch did and make it a miniature with solo. Nice as it was always to hear Mrs. Dwyer's instrument, the concerted effect is better, I think, for mutes lend a color alien to Bach. And why not a harpsichord for continuo?

Debussy's Iberia, with the final brass phrase of "Festival Day" taken quite slow and carefully articulated, was, on the whole, Mr. Munch's best reading of the afternoon. He is a superb conductor with Debussy, bringing out the muscularity of that composer, who once was performed as if his Impressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apart from an overly fast beat in the allegro of the first movement that reduced much of the string ensemble to a confused gabble. But the finale, in its faster pages, was much too fast and anything but clear; the orchestra was not together in simultaneous entrances, there were some coarse details, as the last pizzicati from the double-basses, and the movement had far too much suggestion of having been improvised.

The performance might have been superlative for some other orchestras, but it was not the Boston Symphony's best. Mr. Munch seems not to work with the strings, especially the violins, as much as formerly, and he fails to mold important phrases, or indicate important nuances as much as he ought. In Tchaikovsky these matters are absolute essentials.

Though but recently back from 11,000 miles of traveling, the orchestra takes to the road again next week. At the next Boston concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Munch will present Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings; the Fourth Symphony by Schumann; Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, and La Valse, by Ravel.

MARJORY ADAMS

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382

OCT 14 1956

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will play music by German and French composers for the second program of its 1956-57 broadcast season on WRCA tomorrow at 8:15 p.m. The concert, from Symphony Hall in Boston, will open with a performance of Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings." Claude De Bussy's impressionistic "Iberia ("Images" for orchestra No. 2) will complete the concert.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 252,604

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 14 1956

BSO, Still Unpacked Off on Another Tour

With some of its baggage not yet arrived back home from its recent tour of Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra again sets out on tour this week, playing concerts in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Cleveland, Syracuse and Ithaca. The orchestra's music director, Charles Munch, will conduct all of the concerts on tour.

Returning home a week from next Tuesday, Oct. 23, Dr. Munch and the orchestra will give the first concert of this season's Tuesday evening series that night in Symphony Hall, and the third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27. Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra, by Samuel Barber; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor; the Sixth Symphony, by Walter Piston, composed for the orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last November, and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 13 1956

Bach, Debussy ... ovsky

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Sym... n Flute Suite

By Harold Rogers

Back in 1952 Charles Munch, y way of introducing the Boson Symphony's new lady flutist, programed Bach's ingratiating little Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings, and Doriot Anthony, the lady in question, showed us why Dr. Munch had chosen her for the first chair.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Munch again programed the flute suite, and the lady in question, now Doriot Anthony Dwyer, gave further conclusive evidence that he had made the right choice. Her playing is graced with more maturity, more delicacy, and a greater variety of tone. She and Dr. Munch collaborated in a gentle performance—everything was given a dulcet touch, even the provocative badinage of the sparkling Badinerie. Her ovation, also on the gentle side, was no less sincere and heartfelt than was her playing.

* * *

Dr. Munch then launched into the Andalusian moods of Debussy's "Iberia," giving us at first the cheerful, carefree rhythms of "the streets and byways," and then growing pensive, restless, and romantic as the music evoked "the fragrance of the night." Thus far Debussy's tone painting rates high when measured by his masterworks, but not so high as Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, the summit of Franco-Hispanic musical poetry.

The third section of "Ibéria," which brings us the "morning of a festival day," is a sporadic patchwork thing that wanders like a peasant through the crowd, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Finally it just gives up in an anticlimactic finish that leaves one wondering if Debussy, too, wasn't too tuckered out to enjoy the feast.

* * *

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony was a little lackluster at first, but with the change in tempo from Adagio to Allegro non troppo Dr. Munch whipped the air with his baton and his musicians got down to business, scrubbing with the bows till the strings were emoting in unabashed fervor. ...

no disappointment yesterday because under Mr. Munch's guidance it did what it should. It tugged at the heartstrings with a pleading insistence. And what's more, it cried.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 11,930
OCT 12 1956

Carlos E. Pinfield, Violinist, Dead

Carlos E. Pinfield, ret... member of the Boston Symph... Orchestra, died last night at ... home, 127 Crafts Rd., Brook...

He retired last year afte... years service as violinist ... the orchestra. He was 68.

Although not actually a m... ber of the musical unit ... 1955, Pinfield remained ... ciated with the orchestra ... fund-raising capacity.

He was born in Roslindale ... attended Boston English ... School. He studied for two ... at the Royal Academy in ... lin and joined the Boston ... phony in 1912. He was a ... eran of World War I.

He leaves his wife, Lau... (Archambault) Pinfield.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
Circ. D. 82,527 - S. 101,248

OCT 14 1956

COMMUNITY ARTISTS . . . Top to bottom, pianist Rudolf Firkusny (Nov. 2), soprano Eileen Farrell (Dec. 5), and Arthur Fiedler of the Boston "Pops," three of the five events of the 1956-57 Community Concert season here at Municipal Auditorium. . . . Other events are the Chicago Opera Ballet with Marjorie Tallchief (Feb. 11), and the Philadelphia Orchestra (May 31). . . . Season tickets have gone into the mail to Community's bulging membership.

Concert Association Memberships ... Jean Madeira Among Artists To A...

This evening is the deadline for getting memberships in the Wilmington Community Concert Association for this coming season. The campaign, with headquarters in St. James Parish House, 314 Market St., will positively close at 9 o'clock tonight. After that time, no subscriptions will be accepted. The special phone is 3-7313 and workers will be on hand all day to receive subscriptions and give necessary information.

With a large seating capacity in Brogden Hall, an increase in memberships is desired. Members last year who have not been called are urged to call in at headquarters and let this be known.

Along with Walter Gieseking and the Boston Pops, your Community Concerts very probably will bring to Wilmington Jean Maderia, beautiful young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera and concert stage.

Currently touring aboard, this talented artist began her musical career by studying to be a concert pianist. As a student at the Julliard School of Music, however, she was advised to go into opera, and only eight years later signed her first contract with the Metropolitan Opera. A national news magazine, in reviewing her Vienna appearance, described her at the beginning of the concert as just from the states, but when she had finished Carmen's Habanera, ... the house vibrated with ecstatic shouting, and she was a star. The cast member counted 45 curtain calls."

With Gieseking's appearance members of the Community Concerts will have a chance to hear the master of the keyboard in person. It has been said of this artist that "he lets the music he makes do the talking, and it speaks in a competent manner."

The world of music is a big one, and it is one of the virtues of a democratic society in which we live that there is room enough in it for everybody. For more than a quarter of a century, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra have helped to span the gap between popular and classical music. In kind, Pops programs do not vary much, for all the vastness of the repertory. There is always a serious work, the shorter the ...r, ordinarily an overture or ... of the rauccous variety, and invariably some sumptuously-attir... popular tune or medley.

JEAN MADEIRA
Metropolitan Opera
Contralto

With the appearance of Gieseking ... evening series that night in Symphony Hall. The third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27.

Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra by Samuel Barber, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the Orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last Nov., and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse" by Ravel.

... will be no single ... individual concerts, and no tickets will be sold at the door. All membership cards are transferable locally; however, and members may use their cards in a reciprocity agreement with several nearby towns.

comes to Veterans Memorial Thursday.

...ny on U.S. Tour

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 154,300

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently planned these performances with more attention than usual to the single flute part. He reduced the number of strings considerably, and even placed mutes upon the first violins so that the flute always would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Mrs. Dwyer made it "sing" in every measure. As always, the fast pace of the concluding badinerie gave the flute extra brilliance above the busy string weavings. The flutist is left, here, to deal as well as may be with coordination of breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer played as if there were no difficulties whatever, and she much deserved the applause received when the conductor directed her to take two bows alone.

Keeping the strings so far down, however, made the Suite sound less like Bach than I would have liked. In Bach's time no doubt the Suite was performed as a chamber piece, with the flute less in evidence, unless the reputed coarse tone of that time forced it to attention.

Today you can play the Suite with a small number of strings, yet with more resonance, naturally, and a greater concerted effect. Or you can do as Mr. Munch did and make it a miniature with solo. Nice as it was always to hear Mrs. Dwyer's instrument, the concerted effect is better, I think, for mutes lend a color alien to Bach. And why not a harpsichord for continuo?

Debussy's Iberia, with the final brass phrase of "Festival Day" taken quite slow and carefully articulated, was, on the whole, Mr. Munch's best reading of the afternoon. He is a superb conductor with Debussy, bringing out the muscularity of that composer, who once was performed as if his Impressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apart from an overly fast beat in the allegro of the first movement that reduced much of the string ensemble to a confused gabble. But the finale, in its faster pages, was much too fast and anything but clear; the orchestra was not together in simultaneous entrances, there were some coarse details, as the last pizzicati from the double-basses, and the movement had far too much suggestion of having been improvised.

The performance might have been superlative for some other orchestras, but it was not the Boston Symphony's best. Mr. Munch seems not to work with the strings, especially the violins, as much as formerly, and he fails to mold important phrases, or indicate important nuances as much as he ought. In Tchaikovsky these matters are absolute essentials.

Though but recently back from 11,000 miles of traveling, the orchestra takes to the road again next week. At the next Boston concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Munch will present Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings; the Fourth Symphony by Schumann; Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, and La Valse, by Ravel.

MARJORY ADAMS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

OCT 13 1956

Bach, Debussy ... ovsky

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Sym... in Flute Suite

By Harold Rogers

Back in 1952 Charles Munch, by way of introducing the Boston Symphony's new lady flutist, programed Bach's ingratiating Little Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings, and Doriot Anthony, the lady in question, showed us why Dr. Munch had chosen her for the first chair.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Dr. Munch again programed the flute suite, and the lady in question, now Doriot Anthony Dwyer, gave further conclusive evidence that he had made the right choice. Her playing is graced with more maturity, more delicacy, and a greater variety of tone. She and Dr. Munch collaborated in a gentle performance—everything was given a dulcet touch, even the provocative badinage of the sparkling Badinerie. Her ovation, also on the gentle side, was no less sincere and heartfelt than was her playing.

* * *

Dr. Munch then launched into the Andalusian moods of Debussy's "Ibéria," giving us at first the cheerful, carefree rhythms of "the streets and byways," and then growing pensive, restless, and romantic as the music evoked "the fragrance of the night." Thus far Debussy's tone painting rates high when measured by his masterworks, but not so high as Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, the summit of Franco-Hispanic musical poetry.

The third section of "Ibéria," which brings us the "morning of a festival day," is a sporadic, patchwork thing that wanders like a peasant through the crowd, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Finally it just gives up in an anticlimactic finish that leaves one wondering if Debussy, too, wasn't too tuckered out to enjoy the feast.

* * *

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony was a little lack... luster at first, but with the change in tempo from Adagio to Allegro non troppo Dr. Munch whipped the air with his baton and his musicians got down to business, scrubbing with the bows till the strings were emoting in unabashed fervor. H...

no disappointment yesterday because under Mr. Munch's guidance it did what it should. It tugged at the heartstrings with a pleading insistence. And what's more, it cried.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
Circ. D. 82,527 - S. 101,248

OCT ...

COMMUNITY ARTISTS . . . Top to bottom, pianist Rudolf Firkusny (Nov. 2), soprano Eileen Farrell (Dec. 5), and Arthur Fiedler of the Boston "Pops," three of the five events of the 1956-57 Community Concert season here at Municipal Auditorium. . . . Other events are the Chicago Opera Ballet with Marjorie Tallchief (Feb. 11), and the Philadelphia Orchestra (May 31). . . . Season tickets have gone into the mail to Community's bulging membership.

Carlos E. Pinfield, Violinist, Dead

Carlos E. Pinfield, ret... member of the Boston Symph... Orchestra, died last night at... home, 127 Crafts Rd., Brook...

He retired last year afte... years service as violinist ... the orchestra. He was 68.

Although not actually a m... ber of the musical unit s... 1955, Pinfield remained a... ciated with the orchestra ... fund-raising capacity.

He was born in Roslindale ... attended Boston English ... School. He studied for two y... at the Royal Academy in ... lin and joined the Boston ... phony in 1912. He was a ... eran of World War I.

He leaves his wife, Laur... (Archambault) Pinfield.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382

OCT 14 1956

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will play music by German and French composers for the second program of its 1956-57 broadcast season on WRCA tomorrow at 8:15 p.m. The concert, from Symphony Hall in Boston, will open with a performance of Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings." Claude De Bussy's impressionistic "Iberia ("Images" for orchestra No. 2) will complete the concert.

* * *

WILMINGTON, N. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 11,930

OCT 12 1956

Concert Association Memberships Jean Madeira Among Artists To A...

This evening is the deadline for getting memberships in the Wilmington Community Concert Association for this coming season. The campaign, with headquarters in St. James Parish House, 314 Market St., will positively close at 9 o'clock tonight. After that time, no subscriptions will be accepted. The special phone is 3-7313 and workers will be on hand all day to receive subscriptions and give necessary information.

With a large seating capacity in Brogden Hall, an increase in memberships is desired. Members last year who have not been called are urged to call in at headquarters and let this be known.

Along with Walter Gieseking and the Boston Pops, your Community Concerts very probably will bring to Wilmington Jean Maderia, beautiful young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera and concert stage.

Currently touring aboard, this talented artist began her musical career by studying to be a concert pianist. As a student at the Julliard School of Music, however, she was advised to go into opera, and only eight years later signed her first contract with the Metropolitan Opera. A national news magazine, in reviewing her Vienna appearance, described her at the beginning of the concert as just from the states, but when she had finished Carmen's Habanera, . . . the house vibrated with ecstatic shouting, and she was a star. Our cast member counted 45 curtain calls."

With Gieseking's appearance members of the Community Concerts will have a chance to hear the master of the keyboard in person. It has been said of this artist that "he lets the music he makes do the talking, and it speaks in a competent manner."

The world of music is a big one, and it is one of the virtues of a democratic society in which we live that there is room enough in it for everybody. For more than a quarter of a century, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra have helped to span the gap between popular and classical music. In kind, Pops programs do not vary much, for all the vastness of the repertory. There is always a serious work, the shorter the better, ordinarily an overture or two of the rauccous variety, and invariably some sumptuously-attired popular tune or medley.

With the appearance of Gieseking ...

JEAN MADEIRA
Metropolitan Opera
Contralto

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

OCT 14 1956

BSO, Still Unpacked Off on Another Tour

With some of its baggage not yet arrived back home from its recent tour of Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra again sets out on tour this week, playing concerts in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Cleveland, Syracuse and Ithaca. The orchestra's music director, Charles Munch, will conduct all of the concerts on tour.

Returning home a week from next Tuesday, Oct. 23, Dr. Munch and the orchestra will give the first concert of this season's Tuesday evening series that night in Symphony Hall, and the third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27. Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra, by Samuel Barber; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor; the Sixth Symphony, by Walter Piston, composed for the orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last November, and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

...ny on U.S. Tour

... not its ... Bos- ... gain ... day- ... De- ... gra- ... rom the ... con- ... sday

... the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the Orchestra's 75th anniversary and the introduced ... and the Choreographic Poem "La Valse" by Ravel.

... evening series that night in Symphony Hall. The third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27.

Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra by Samuel Barber, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor,

... will be no single admission ... individual concerts, and no tickets will be sold at the door. All membership cards are transferable locally; however, and members may use their cards in a reciprocity agreement with several nearby towns.

comes to Veterans Memorial Thursday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 154,300

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently planned these performances with more attention than usual to the single flute part. He reduced the number of strings considerably, and even placed mutes upon the first violins so that the flute always would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Mrs. Dwyer made it "sing" in every measure. As always, the fast pace of the concluding badinerie gave the flute extra brilliance above the busy string weavings. The flutist is left, here, to deal as well as may be with coordination of breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer played as if there were no difficulties whatever, and she much deserved the applause received when the conductor directed her to take two bows alone.

Keeping the strings so far down, however, made the Suite sound less like Bach than I would have liked. In Bach's time no doubt the Suite was performed as a chamber piece, with the flute less in evidence, unless the reputed coarse tone of that time forced it to attention.

Today you can play the Suite with a small number of strings, yet with more resonance, naturally, and a greater concerted effect. Or you can do as Mr. Munch did and make it a miniature with solo. Nice as it was always to hear Mrs. Dwyer's instrument, the concerted effect is better, I think, for mutes lend a color alien to Bach. And why not a harpsichord for continuo?

Debussy's Iberia, with the final brass phrase of "Festival Day" taken quite slow and carefully articulated, was, on the whole, Mr. Munch's best reading of the afternoon. He is a superb conductor with Debussy, bringing out the muscularity of that composer, who once was performed as if his Impressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apart from an overly fast beat in the allegro of the first movement that reduced much of the string ensemble to a confused gabble. But the finale, in its faster pages, was much too fast and anything but clear; the orchestra was not together in simultaneous entrances, there were some coarse details, as the last pizzicati from the double-basses, and the movement had far too much suggestion of having been improvised.

The performance might have been superlative for some other orchestras, but it was not the Boston Symphony's best. Mr. Munch seems not to work with the strings, especially the violins, as much as formerly, and he fails to mold important phrases, or indicate important nuances as much as he ought. In Tchaikovsky these matters are absolute essentials.

Though but recently back from 11,000 miles of traveling, the orchestra takes to the road again next week. At the next Boston concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Munch will present Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings; the Fourth Symphony by Schumann; Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, and La Valse, by Ravel.

MARJORY ADAMS

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382

OCT 14 1956

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will play music by German and French composers for the second program of its 1956-57 broadcast season on WRCA tomorrow at 8:15 p.m. The concert, from Symphony Hall in Boston, will open with a performance of Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings." Claude De Bussy's impressionistic "Iberia ("Images" for orchestra No. 2) will complete the concert.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,694

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 14 1956

BSO, Still Unpacked Off on Another Tour

With some of its baggage not yet arrived back home from its recent tour of Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra again sets out on tour this week, playing concerts in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Cleveland, Syracuse and Ithaca. The orchestra's music director, Charles Munch, will conduct all of the concerts on tour.

Returning home a week from next Tuesday, Oct. 23, Dr. Munch and the orchestra will give the first concert of this season's Tuesday evening series that night in Symphony Hall, and the third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27. Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra, by Samuel Barber; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor; the Sixth Symphony, by Walter Piston, composed for the orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last November, and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

OCT 13 1956

Bach, Debussy, Tchaikovsky

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Symphony Soloist in Flute Suite

By Harold Rogers

Back in 1952 Charles Munch, by way of introducing the Boston Symphony's new lady flutist, programed Bach's ingratiating little Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings, and Doriot Anthony, the lady in question, showed us why Dr. Munch had chosen her for the first chair.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Dr. Munch again programed the flute suite, and the lady in question, now Doriot Anthony Dwyer, gave further conclusive evidence that he had made the right choice. Her playing is graced with more maturity, more delicacy, and a greater variety of tone. She and Dr. Munch collaborated in a gentle performance—everything was given a dulcet touch, even the provocative badinage of the sparkling Badinerie. Her ovation, also on the gentle side, was no less sincere and heartfelt than was her playing.

* * *

Dr. Munch then launched into the Andalusian moods of Debussy's "Ibéria," giving us at first the cheerful, carefree rhythms of "the streets and byways," and then growing pensive, restless, and romantic as the music evoked "the fragrance of the night." Thus far Debussy's tone painting rates high when measured by his masterworks, but not so high as Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, the summit of Franco-Hispanic musical poetry.

The third section of "Ibéria," which brings us the "morning of a festival day," is a sporadic, patchwork thing that wanders like a peasant through the crowd, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Finally it just gives up in an anticlimactic finish that leaves one wondering if Debussy, too, wasn't too tuckered out to enjoy the feast.

* * *

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony was a little lackluster at first, but with the change in tempo from Adagio to Allegro non troppo Dr. Munch whipped the air with his baton, and his musicians got down to business, scrubbing with their bows till the strings were emoting in unabashed fervor. He took the Allegro con grazia a bit too fast to be truly grazia, so much so that the pedal-point section didn't weep the copious tears it can and should. It's difficult to cry on the run, and a dehydrated Tchaikovsky is a Tchaikovsky robbed of his most endearing quality.

The march went along at a more-than-martial zip, building to the grand finale that always deceives a few unalert listeners into applauding heartily as they rise from their seats to go home. Perhaps it's Tchaikovsky's fault for ending a third movement as if it were a fourth movement, and it must come as a disappointment to these listeners when the orchestra plunges into the sobbing despair of the Adagio lamentoso, the true finale.

This movement, however, was no disappointment yesterday because under Mr. Munch's guidance it did what it should. It tugged at the heartstrings with a pleading insistence. And what's more, it cried.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 11,930

OCT 12 1956

Carlos E. Pinfield, Violinist, Dead

Carlos E. Pinfield, retired member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at his home, 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

He retired last year after 42 years service as violinist with the orchestra. He was 68.

Although not actually a member of the musical unit since 1955, Pinfield remained associated with the orchestra in a fund-raising capacity.

He was born in Roslindale and attended Boston English High School. He studied for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin and joined the Boston Symphony in 1912. He was a veteran of World War I.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. (Archambault) Pinfield.

Concert Association Memberships Close Tonight; Jean Madeira Among Artists To Appear In Wilmington

This evening is the deadline for getting memberships in the Wilmington Community Concert Association for this coming season. The campaign, with headquarters in St. James Parish House, 314 Market St., will positively close at 9 o'clock tonight. After that time, no subscriptions will be accepted. The special phone is 3-7313 and workers will be on hand all day to receive subscriptions and give necessary information.

With a large seating capacity in Brogden Hall, an increase in memberships is desired. Members last year who have not been called are urged to call in at headquarters and let this be known.

Along with Walter Gieseking and the Boston Pops, your Community Concerts very probably will bring to Wilmington Jean Maderia, beautiful young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera and concert stage.

Currently touring aboard, this talented artist began her musical career by studying to be a concert pianist. As a student at the Julliard School of Music, however, she was advised to go into opera, and only eight years later signed her first contract with the Metropolitan Opera. A national news magazine, in reviewing her Vienna appearance, described her at the beginning of the concert as just from the states, but when she had finished Carmen's Habanera, the house vibrated with ecstatic shouting, and she was a star. One cast member counted 45 curtain calls."

With Gieseking's appearance members of the Community Concerts will have a chance to hear the master of the keyboard in person. It has been said of this artist that "he lets the music he makes do the talking, and it speaks in a competent manner."

The world of music is a big one, and it is one of the virtues of a democratic society in which we live that there is room enough in it for everybody. For more than a quarter of a century, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra have helped to span the gap between popular and classical music. In kind, Pops programs do not vary much, for all the vastness of the repertory. There is always a serious work, the shorter the better, ordinarily an overture or two of the rauccous variety, and invariably some sumptuously-attired popular tune or medley.

With the appearance [illegible] evening series that night in Symphony Hall. The third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27.

Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra by Samuel Barber, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the Orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last Nov., and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse" by Ravel.

JEAN MADEIRA
Metropolitan Opera
Contralto

king, the Boston Pops and Jean Maderia, Wilmington Community Concert members have a thrilling program of outstanding artists awaiting them, said Frederick Willetts, Association president.

It is well to remember that there will be no single admissions to individual concerts, and no tickets will be sold at the door. All membership cards are transferable locally; however, and members may use their cards in a reciprocity agreement with several nearby towns.

comes to Veterans Memorial Thursday.

...ny on U.S. Tour

the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the Orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last Nov., and the Choreographic Poem, "La Valse" by Ravel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 154,300

OCT 13 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Doriot Dwyer Soloist in Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the second program of the regular series, as follows: Bach: Suite in B minor (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute soloist); Debussy: Iberia; Tchaikovsky: Pathetic Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

A comfortable and familiar program, was this, of music long popular. Of the entire afternoon, the outstanding feature was the clean and agile flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Bach's B minor Suite.

Mr. Munch evidently these performances wi tention than usual to flute part. He reduced ber of strings consider even placed mutes upon violins so that the flute would come through.

It did, beautifully, and Dwyer made it "sing" in measure. As always, the fast of the concluding badinerie the flute extra brilliance the busy string weavings. flutist is left, here, to deal as we as may be with coordination o breathing and the rapid, exacting figurations. Mrs. Dwyer as if there were no d whatever, and she much the applause received conductor directed her two bows alone.

Keeping the strings however, made the less like Bach than liked. In Bach's time Suite was performed ber piece, with the evidence, unless the tone of that time tention.

Today you can with a small nu yet with more re ly, and a greater Or you can do and make it a m Nice as it was a Dwyer's instru effect is bette lend a color why not a tinuo?

Debussy's brass phras taken quite ticulated, Munch's b noon. He with Deb muscular once was pressionist harmonies and melting orchestral colors were so much tinted jelly. Mr. Munch has a feeling, too, for the blend of strong and subtle rhythms in Debussy, as well as for the entire descriptive aspect, which is especially powerful in "Iberia."

The first three movements of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony went well, apa an overly fast beat i of the first movem much of th confused its fast- st and hestra neous (6 arse from ve-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 13 1956

Bach, Debussy, Tchaikovsky

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Symphony Soloist in Flute Suite

By Harold Rogers

Back in 1952 Charles Munch, y way of introducing the Boson Symphony's new lady flutist, programed Bach's ingratiating little Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings, and Doriot Anthony, the lady in question, showed us why Dr. Munch had chosen her for the first chair.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Dr. Munch again programed the flute suite, and the lady in question, now Doriot Anthony Dwyer, gave further conclusive evidence that he had made the right choice. Her playtraced with more maturity, elicacy, and a greater vatone. She and Dr. Munch ted in a gentle per—everything was given touch, even the proadinage of the sparerie. Her ovation, gentle side, was no and heartfelt than ng.

en launched into moods of De- giving us at ful, carefree treets and by- growing pen- romantic as he fragrance far Debus- rates high is master- h as Ra- nole, the summit of Franco-Hispanic musical poetry.

The third section of "Ibéria," which brings us the "morning of a festival day," is a sporadic, patchwork thing that wanders like a peasant through the crowd, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Finally it just gives up in an anticlimactic finish that leaves one wondering if Debussy, too, wasn't too tuckered out to enjoy the feast.

* * *

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony was a little lackluster at first, but with the change in tempo from Adagio to Allegro non troppo Dr. Munch whipped the air with his baton, and his musicians got down to business, scrubbing with their bows till the strings were emoting in unabashed fervor. He took the Allegro con grazia a bit too fast to be truly grazia, so much so that the pedal-point section didn't weep the copious tears it can and should. It's difficult to cry on the run, and a dehydrated Tchaikovsky is a Tchaikovsky robbed of his most endearing quality.

The march went along at a more-than-martial zip, building to the grand finale that always deceives a few unalert listeners into applauding heartily as they rise from their seats to go home. Perhaps it's Tchaikovsky's fault for ending a third movement as if it were a fourth movement, and it must come as a disappointment to these listeners when the orchestra plunges into the sobbing despair of the Adagio lamentoso, the true finale.

This movement, however, was no disappointment yesterday because under Mr. Munch's guidance it did what it should. It tugged at the heartstrings with a pleading insistence. And what's more, it cried.

Carlos E. Pinfield, Violinist, Dead

Carlos E. Pinfield, retired member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at his home, 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

He retired last year after 42 years service as violinist with the orchestra. He was 68.

Although not actually a member of the musical unit since 1955, Pinfield remained associated with the orchestra in a fund-raising capacity.

He was born in Roslindale and attended Boston English High School. He studied for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin and joined the Boston Symphony in 1912. He was a veteran of World War I.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. (Archambault) Pinfield.

Services will be Thursday at 2:30 in the First Parish Unitarian Church, Jamaica Plain.

Tweet

Doriot Dwyer has the distinction of being first flutist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she having succeeded Georges Laurent who held that chair for 30 years. The Orchestra comes to Veterans Memorial Thursday.

OCT 14 1956

Boston Symphony On Concert Tour

With some of its baggage not yet arrived back home from its recent tour of Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra again sets out on tour this week, playing concerts in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Cleveland, Syracuse and Ithaca. The orchestra's music director, Charles Munch, will conduct all of the concerts on tour.

Returning home a week from next Tuesday, Oct. 23, Dr. Munch and the orchestra will give the first concert of this season's Tuesday evening series that night in Symphony Hall, and the third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27. Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra by Samuel Barber, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last November, and the Choreographic Poem, "I a Valse" by Revel.

Hub Symphony on U.S. Tour

With some of its baggage not yet arrived back home from its recent tour of Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra again sets out on tour this week, playing concerts in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Cleveland, Syracuse and Ithaca.

Returning home a week from tomorrow, Dr. Munch and the Orchestra will give the first concert of this season's Tuesday evening series that night in Symphony Hall. The third pair of Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts will be played on Oct. 26-27.

Dr. Munch will then conduct the Adagio for String Orchestra by Samuel Barber, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, the Sixth Symphony by Walter Piston, composed for the Orchestra's 75th anniversary and introduced last Nov[illegible] the Choreographic Poem "I a Valse" by Ravel.

TIGHT BINDING

Welcome Mat Spread for Boston Orchestra

By Herbert Elwell

It has been several years since the Boston Orchestra visited Cleveland, so the appearance of this distinguished organization at Music Hall next Friday night is an event of considerable importance to Cleveland music lovers.

The absence of visiting orchestras is not felt quite so much today as it was years ago when our own symphony orchestra was still growing up and had not yet attained the perfection and eminence it now possesses.

HERBERT ELWELL

Nevertheless, appearances here of such famous orchestras as the Boston and Vienna Philharmonic are still exceedingly welcome, and they constitute an enrichment of our musical life. Fears that the visitors might provide unwanted competition have been largely dispelled, if they ever existed to any serious extent.

The Cleveland Orchestra's shift of its Nov. 10 concert to Nov. 9 to avoid conflict with the Vienna Philharmonic, coming Nov. 10, was a friendly and hospitable gesture.

Responsible for the Boston and Vienna orchestra engagements here is the Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi, who is more active than ever this year in bringing musical entertainment to Cleveland. Of the many attractions being offered by Bernardi this season, it should be noticed that those included in his Popular Price Concert Course form a solid core of impressive musical values, and that persons of discriminating musical taste can not go wrong in subscribing to it.

The inclusion of the Boston and Vienna orchestras would alone make the course worthy of our endorsement. It is additionally enhanced by its listing of a performance of Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" by the NBC Opera, and a song recital by the eminent German soprano, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf.

Included as well are two group events about which I am less well informed but which look promising, "Little Singers of Paris" and "Ballet Basque de Biarritz."

To return to the Boston Orchestra, what a tradition it has to live up to, what names to conjure within its glamorous history since 1881! Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, all were giants. Then after World War I, came Monteux, and finally the great Koussevitzky, who reigned over the destinies of the orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

He last conducted the Boston Orchestra in Cleveland Dec. 4, 1946, an event to be remembered. Mrs. Emil Brudno and her Civic Concert Course were responsible for several visits of the Boston Orchestra over the years.

The program Friday evening will consists of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, Debussy's "Iberia," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique." It seems that another program was submitted for consideration, a program containing Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony. But since this work is to be performed at one of Robert Shaw's concerts in Severance Hall, it was, according to Bernardi, automatically ruled out, and the alternative program chosen.

More Tschaikowsky

I am not finding fault with the program, but some day I would like to see the Boston Orchestra come here and play something beside a Tchaikowsky symphony. Time after time Koussevitzky came here and gave us repeated hearings of Tschaikowsky's Fourth until it became just a little monotonous.

The Boston Orchestra has been under the direction of Charles Munch since the death of Koussevitsky. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, was one of France's foremost conductors, having conducted four orchestras in Paris. Boston audiences find in him a musician absorbed and possessed by the music he conducts.

The Boston Orchestra is practically unique among orchestras in the number of concerts it gives. Its season, one might say, lasts the year around. Its winter season consists of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home. This ends in April, when Arthur Fiedler takes over for a series of 60 Pop concerts.

Then come two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, after which, in July and early August, the orchestra moves to its summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the Berkshire Festival, which lasts six weeks. Thus the members of the orchestra are among the hardest working of musicians, but they are also among the best paid of orchestral players.

To change the subject, last Sunday I had a pleasant chat with Paul Henry Lang, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, who was here for the Critics' Workshop. I sensed almost a note of envy in his voice when he declared that he thought our Cleveland Orchestra was at present superior to the New York Philharmonic.

Also I saw clearly that there was nothing to envy about the life of a New York music critic. Lang complained about the Philharmonic having to depend to such a large degree on big name soloists to draw audiences, and the consequent frequent repetition of standard concertos.

With a bitter sigh he said: "Last season I had to listen to the Brahms Violin Concerto seven times. If I have to hear it that many times again this season, what in the world can I find more to write about it?"

Josef Gingold

Yugoslav Dancer

Charles Munch

'Circus Boy' Raiment Perils Parental Purse

NEW YORK—(UP)—Attention parents and other pursuholders: You'll remember Davy Crockett and the hats and the suits and other paraphernalia you buoght, later Robin Hood set you back a bit, too, for bows and arrows and items of apparel in Lincoln Green.

Well, there's a new budget menace on the way, a bit of playtime sartorial splendor for the young folks that is quite handsome in a dove gray sort of way. It's linked with the new filmed series on NBC called "Circus Boy."

Mickey Braddock, the 11-year-old Hollywood lad of the title role, has been here all week unconsciously modeling his regalia as he has gone about town trying to track down the Museum of Natural History, the Statue of Liberty and other items that New Yorkers are always too busy to see.

This costume consists of breeches of a sort of jodphur nature, a modified version of [illegible] quit[illegible] a figure in the neighbo[illegible] hood with a copy of same.

Son of Actor

Mickey, whose last name a[illegible] tually is Dolenz—son of act[illegible] George Dolenz who has be[illegible] TV's Count of Monte Cristo[illegible] is as blond as they come, ha[illegible] button nose and a grin [illegible] size of a quarter of pie.

"He was just one of abo[illegible] 300 boys the producers of 'C[illegible] cus Boy' interviewed in try[illegible] to cast the part," explained [illegible] mother, Janelle Dolenz, h[illegible] self a former actress. [illegible] made no special effort to [illegible] him into acting; a friend s[illegible] gested he might be right [illegible] the part, and we let him [illegible] out. He has done no other [illegible] ing.

"As a matter of fact, [illegible] seven-year-old sister, Gem[illegible] beat Mickey to the TV sc[illegible] when her father used he[illegible] small parts in a couple of 'Count of Monte Cristo' [illegible] sodes."

Mickey said he likes [illegible]

Mkhgan Oct 16

HILL AUDITORIUM:

Boston Symphony Proves Superiority

IF THE REASONS why the Boston Symphony should play two concerts here this week were puzzling, last night's performance should have dispelled any bewilderment. This orchestra is undoubtedly one of the finest collection of musicians in the world. There is no way to describe the string section except to say that they have the wonderful "Boston" sound. Similarly the brass and woodwinds have a quality that is unique to this organization. It is a shame that this fine organization can't be heard more often.

The high point of the program was Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. From the beautiful introduction by the bassoon, the graceful second movement, the dramatically forceful third and the dark resignation of the last movement, Charles Munch gave a reading of much feeling and warmth. The person who can't appreciate the beautiful melodies and romanticism of Tchaikovsky is certainly to be pitied.

In the first movement the flute and clarinet passages were exceptionally well executed. In the third movement the brass section was given ample opportunity to show its skill and precision.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony lacks the lyricism that has made Tchaikovsky's "Pathtique" a favorite it was excitingly refreshing. The work is filled with beautiful melodic fragments but none of them is heard for a long enough time to make any lasting impression. Only in the last movement is there a theme that one can begin to remember.

However, there are many nice features about this work. It is very traditional in its external form. The first of the four movements is quite clearly delineated sonata form. It makes use of several short soloistic passages that were played very nicely last night. The second movement is very light and fast. It sounds a great deal like the music which Hollywood and television associate with "busy New York." The third movement is quite slow with beautiful solos for the cello and flute. The fourth movement sounds a great deal like portions of Shostakovich's "Golden Age." Here two contrasting themes are pitted against each other. The work was performed very well and audience response would indicate that the work will prove quite successful. This work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's seventy-fifth anniversary last year.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" provided a suitably bombastic opening to the concert.

The Boston Symphony is certain to be one of the finest orchestras heard in Ann Arbor this fall. In fact, this organization and the Philadelphia Symphony are probably the two truly great orchestras in the United States.

—Bruce Jacobson

Cleveland Dealer Oct 15/56

Two Great Musical Events

Two musical experiences of the highest order await Clevelanders in the appearance here next Friday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concert on Nov. 10 of the famed Vienna Philharmonic on its first American tour.

Both organizations will appear at the Public Music Hall under the auspices of the Cleveland Opera Association as part of the season's program of musical events arranged by G. Bernardi.

To music lovers—and who in Cleveland is not?—neither orchestra needs an introduction. This summer the Boston group toured Russia, the first American orchestra to do so. The ovations its work received under the able baton of Charles Munch was a recognition of the high degree of American culture.

The Vienna Philharmonic, being directed alternately on its tour by Carl Schuricht and Andre Cluytens, has in its long history counted some of the world's greatest musicians and conductors among its members. It brings the soul of old Vienna. At one time George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor of this group. On the Saturday night when it appears the Cleveland Orchestra will not play so as not to detract from this great event.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 16 1956

Carlos Pinfield Services Set

Symphony Violinist Retired Last Year

CARLOS EDGAR PINFIELD

Funeral services will be Thursday for Carlos Edgar Pinfield, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 42 years, who continued to work in the orchestra's interests after his retirement.

He died Sunday night. After his retirement in 1955 he devoted a great deal of time to interesting Boston business leaders in contributing to the orchestra and was cited for that service by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. He lived at 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

BORN IN ROSLINDALE

Born in Roslindale, he studied in Boston under the late Henry Heindl and then for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin. He was fond of telling friends that he went to Berlin to find a place in the Boston Symphony.

He was signed for the Boston Symphony by the late conductor, Karl Muck, when the latter heard him play at the Royal Academy.

He had served as a guest conductor of Pops and Esplanade concert and for several summers conducted his own orchestra at Poland Spring, Me. Recently he had been conducting the High Pines orchestra in Milton.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. Archambault Pinfield.

Services will be at 2:30 p.m. at the First Parish Unitarian Church in Jamaica Plain.

TIGHT BINDING

Welcome Mat Spread for Boston Orchestra

By Herbert Elwell

It has been several years since the Boston Orchestra visited Cleveland, so the appearance of this distinguished organization at Music Hall next Friday night is an event of considerable importance to Cleveland music lovers.

The absence of visiting orchestras is not felt quite so much today as it was years ago when our own symphony orchestra was still growing up and had not yet attained the perfection and eminence it now possesses.

HERBERT ELWELL

Nevertheless, appearances here of such famous orchestras as the Boston and Vienna Philharmonic are still exceedingly welcome, and they constitute an enrichment of our musical life. Fears that the visitors might provide unwanted competition have been largely dispelled, if they ever existed to any serious extent.

The Cleveland Orchestra's shift of its Nov. 10 concert to Nov. 9 to avoid conflict with the Vienna Philharmonic, coming Nov. 10, was a friendly and hospitable gesture.

Responsible for the Boston and Vienna orchestra engagements here is the Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi, who is more active than ever this year in bringing musical entertainment to Cleveland. Of the many attractions being offered by Bernardi this season, it should be noticed that those included in his Popular Price Concert Course form a solid core of impressive musical values, and that persons of discriminating musical taste can not go wrong in subscribing to it.

The inclusion of the Boston and Vienna orchestras would alone make the course worthy of our endorsement. It is additionally enhanced by its listing of a performance of Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" by the NBC Opera, and a song recital by the eminent German soprano, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf.

Included as well are two group events about which I am less well informed but which look promising, "Little Singers of Paris" and "Ballet Basque de Biarritz."

To return to the Boston Orchestra, what a tradition it has to live up to, what names to conjure within its glamorous history since 1881: Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, all were giants. Then after World War I, came Monteux, and finally the great Koussevitzky, who reigned over the destinies of the orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

He last conducted the Boston Orchestra in Cleveland Dec. 4, 1946, an event to be remembered. Mrs. Emil Brudno and her Civic Concert Course were responsible for several visits of the Boston Orchestra over the years.

The program Friday evening will consists of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, Debussy's "Iberia," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique." It seems that another program was submitted for consideration, a program containing Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony. But since this work is to be performed at one of Robert Shaw's concerts in Severance Hall, it was, according to Bernardi, automatically ruled out, and the alternative program chosen.

More Tschaikowsky

I am not finding fault with the program, but some day I would like to see the Boston Orchestra come here and play something beside a Tchaikowsky symphony. Time after time Koussevitzky came here and gave us repeated hearings of Tschaikowsky's Fourth until it became just a little monotonous.

The Boston Orchestra has been under the direction of Charles Munch since the death of Koussevitsky. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, was one of France's foremost conductors, having conducted four orchestras in Paris. Boston audiences find in him a musician absorbed and possessed by the music he conducts.

The Boston Orchestra is practically unique among orchestras in the number of concerts it gives. Its season, one might say, lasts the year around. Its winter season consists of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home. This ends in April, when Arthur Fiedler takes over for a series of 60 Pop concerts.

Then come two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, after which, in July and early August, the orchestra moves to its summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the Berkshire Festival, which lasts six weeks. Thus the members of the orchestra are among the hardest working of musicians, but they are also among the best paid of orchestral players.

To change the subject, last Sunday I had a pleasant chat with Paul Henry Lang, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, who was here for the Critics Workshop. I sensed almost a note of envy in his voice when he declared that he thought our Cleveland Orchestra was at present superior to the New York Philharmonic.

Also I saw clearly that there was nothing to envy about the life of a New York music critic. Lang complained about the Philharmonic having to depend to such a large degree on big name soloists to draw audiences, and the consequent frequent repetition of standard concertos.

With a bitter sigh he said: "Last season I had to listen to the Brahms Violin Concerto seven times. If I have to hear it that many times again this season, what in the world can I find more to write about it?"

Josef Gingold

Yugoslav Dancer

Charles Munch

'Circus Boy' Raiment Perils Parental Purse

NEW YORK—(UP)—Attention parents and other pursuholders: You'll remember Davy Crockett and the hats and the suits and other paraphernalia you buoght, later Robin Hood set you back a bit, too, for bows and arrows and items of apparel in Lincoln Green.

Well, there's a new budget menace on the way, a bit of playtime sartorial splendor for the young folks that is quite handsome in a dove gray sort of way. It's linked with the new filmed series on NBC called "Circus Boy."

Mickey Braddock, the 11-year-old Hollywood lad of the title role, has been here all week unconsciously modeling his regalia as he has gone about town trying to track down the Museum of Natural History, the Statue of Liberty and other items that New Yorkers are always too busy to see.

This costume consists of breeches of a sort of jodphur nature, a modified version of qui[illegible] a figure in the neighbo[illegible]hood with a copy of same.

Son of Actor

Mickey, whose last name a[illegible]tually is Dolenz—son of act[illegible] George Dolenz who has be[illegible] TV's Count of Monte Cristo[illegible] is as blond as they come, ha[illegible] button nose and a grin [illegible] size of a quarter of pie.

"He was just one of abo[illegible] 300 boys the producers of 'C[illegible]cus Boy' interviewed in try[illegible] to cast the part," explained [illegible] mother, Janelle Dolenz, h[illegible]self a former actress. "[illegible] made no special effort to [illegible] him into acting; a friend s[illegible]gested he might be right [illegible] the part, and we let him [illegible] out. He has done no other [illegible]ing.

"As a matter of fact, [illegible] seven-year-old sister, Gem[illegible] beat Mickey to the TV sc[illegible] when her father used he[illegible] small parts in a couple of [illegible] 'Count of Monte Cristo' [illegible] sodes."

Mickey said he likes ac[illegible]

Charles Munch

Oct 16

HILL AUDITORIUM:

Boston Symphony Proves Superiority

IF THE REASONS why the Boston Symphony should play two concerts here this week were puzzling, last night's performance should have dispelled any bewilderment. This orchestra is undoubtedly one of the finest collection of musicians in the world. There is no way to describe the string section except to say that they have the wonderful "Boston" sound. Similarly the brass and woodwinds have a quality that is unique to this organization. It is a shame that this fine organization can't be heard more often.

The high point of the program was Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. From the beautiful introduction by the bassoon, the graceful second movement, the dramatically forceful third and the dark resignation of the last movement, Charles Munch gave a reading of much feeling and warmth. The person who can't appreciate the beautiful melodies and romanticism of Tchaikovsky is certainly to be pitied.

In the first movement the flute and clarinet passages were exceptionally well executed. In the third movement the brass section was given ample opportunity to show its skill and precision.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony lacks the lyricism that has made Tchaikovsky's "Pathtique" a favorite it was excitingly refreshing. The work is filled with beautiful melodic fragments but none of them is heard for a long enough time to make any lasting impression. Only in the last movement is there a theme that one can begin to remember.

However, there are many nice features about this work. It is very traditional in its external form. The first of the four movements is quite clearly delineated sonata form. It makes use of several short soloistic passages that were played very nicely last night. The second movement is very light and fast. It sounds a great deal like the music which Hollywood and television associate with "busy New York." The third movement is quite slow with beautiful solos for the cello and flute. The fourth movement sounds a great deal like portions of Shostakovich's "Golden Age." Here two contrasting themes are pitted against each other. The work was performed very well and audience response would indicate that the work will prove quite succesful. This work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's seventy-fifth anniversary last year.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" provided a suitably bombastic opening to the concert.

The Boston Symphony is certain to be one of the finest orchestras heard in Ann Arbor this fall. In fact, this organization and the Philadelphia Symphony are probably the two truly great orchestras in the United States.

—Bruce Jacobson

Cleveland Dealer
Oct 15/56

Two Great Musical Events

Two musical experiences of the highest order await Clevelanders in the appearance here next Friday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concert on Nov. 10 of the famed Vienna Philharmonic on its first American tour.

Both organizations will appear at the Public Music Hall under the auspices of the Cleveland Opera Association as part of the season's program of musical events arranged by G. Bernardi.

To music lovers—and who in Cleveland is not?—neither orchestra needs an introduction. This summer the Boston group toured Russia, the first American orchestra to do so. The ovations its work received under the able baton of Charles Munch was a recognition of the high degree of American culture.

The Vienna Philharmonic, being directed alternately on its tour by Carl Schuricht and Andre Cluytens, has in its long history counted some of the world's greatest musicians and conductors among its members. It brings the soul of old Vienna. At one time George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor of this group. On the Saturday night when it appears the Cleveland Orchestra will not play so as not to detract from this great event.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 16 1956

Carlos Pinfield Services Set

Symphony Violinist Retired Last Year

CARLOS EDGAR PINFIELD

Funeral services will be Thursday for Carlos Edgar Pinfield, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 42 years, who continued to work in the orchestra's interests after his retirement.

He died Sunday night. After his retirement in 1955 he devoted a great deal of time to interesting Boston business leaders in contributing to the orchestra and was cited for that service by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. He lived at 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

BORN IN ROSLINDALE

Born in Roslindale, he studied in Boston under the late Henry Heindl and then for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin. He was fond of telling friends that he went to Berlin to find a place in the Boston Symphony.

He was signed for the Boston Symphony by the late conductor, Karl Muck, when the latter heard him play at the Royal Academy.

He had served as a guest conductor of Pops and Esplanade concert and for several summers conducted his own orchestra at Poland Spring, Me. Recently he had been conducting the High Pines orchestra in Milton.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. Archambault Pinfield.

Services will be at 2:30 p.m. at the First Parish Unitarian Church in Jamaica Plain.

TIGHT BINDING

Welcome Mat Spread for Boston Orchestra

By Herbert Elwell

It has been several years since the Boston Orchestra visited Cleveland, so the appearance of this distinguished organization at Music Hall next Friday night is an event of considerable importance to Cleveland music lovers.

The absence of visiting orchestras is not felt quite so much today as it was years ago when our own symphony orchestra was still growing up and had not yet attained the perfection and eminence it now possesses.

HERBERT ELWELL

Nevertheless, appearances here of such famous orchestras as the Boston and Vienna Philharmonic are still exceedingly welcome, and they constitute an enrichment of our musical life. Fears that the visitors might provide unwanted competition have been largely dispelled, if they ever existed to any serious extent.

The Cleveland Orchestra's shift of its Nov. 10 concert to Nov. 9 to avoid conflict with the Vienna Philharmonic, coming Nov. 10, was a friendly and hospitable gesture.

Responsible for the Boston and Vienna orchestra engagements here is the Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi, who is more active than ever this year in bringing musical entertainment to Cleveland. Of the many attractions being offered by Bernardi this season, it should be noticed that those included in his Popular Price Concert Course form a solid core of impressive musical values, and that persons of discriminating musical taste can not go wrong in subscribing to it.

The inclusion of the Boston and Vienna orchestras would alone make the course worthy of our endorsement. It is additionally enhanced by its listing of a performance of Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" by the NBC Opera, and a song recital by the eminent German soprano, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf.

Included as well are two group events about which I am less well informed but which look promising, "Little Singers of Paris" and "Ballet Basque de Biarritz."

To return to the Boston Orchestra, what a tradition it has to live up to, what names to conjure within its glamorous history since 1881! Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, all were giants. Then after World War I, came Monteux, and finally the great Koussevitzky, who reigned over the destinies of the orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

He last conducted the Boston Orchestra in Cleveland Dec. 4, 1946, an event to be remembered. Mrs. Emil Brudno and her Civic Concert Course were responsible for several visits of the Boston Orchestra over the years.

The program Friday evening will consists of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, Debussy's "Iberia," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique." It seems that another program was submitted for consideration, a program containing Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony. But since this work is to be performed at one of Robert Shaw's concerts in Severance Hall, it was, according to Bernardi, automatically ruled out, and the alternative program chosen.

More Tschaikowsky

I am not finding fault with the program, but some day I would like to see the Boston Orchestra come here and play something beside a Tchaikowsky symphony. Time after time Koussevitzky came here and gave us repeated hearings of Tschaikowsky's Fourth until it became just a little monotonous.

The Boston Orchestra has been under the direction of Charles Munch since the death of Koussevitsky. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, was one of France's foremost conductors, having conducted four orchestras in Paris. Boston audiences find in him a musician absorbed and possessed by the music he conducts.

The Boston Orchestra is practically unique among orchestras in the number of concerts it gives. Its season, one might say, lasts the year around. Its winter season consists of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home. This ends in April, when Arthur Fiedler takes over for a series of 60 Pop concerts.

Then come two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, after which, in July and early August, the orchestra moves to its summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the Berkshire Festival, which lasts six weeks. Thus the members of the orchestra are among the hardest working of musicians, but they are also among the best paid of orchestral players.

To change the subject, last Sunday I had a pleasant chat with Paul Henry Lang, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, who was here for the Critics Workshop. I sensed almost a note of envy in his voice when he declared that he thought our Cleveland Orchestra was at present superior to the New York Philharmonic.

Also I saw clearly that there was nothing to envy about the life of a New York music critic. Lang complained about the Philharmonic having to depend to such a large degree on big name soloists to draw audiences, and the consequent frequent repetition of standard concertos.

With a bitter sigh he said: "Last season I had to listen to the Brahms Violin Concerto seven times. If I have to hear it that many times again this season, what in the world can I find more to write about it?"

Josef Gingold

Yugoslav Dancer

Charles Munch

Charlotte Holloman

Robert Shaw

CONCERT STARS. Josef Gingold will be violin soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra directed by George Szell, Thursday and Saturday evenings in Severance Hall. Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Friday evening at 8:30. This Yugoslav dancer will take part in "Slavonic Rhapsody," at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and next Sunday evening. Robert Shaw, associate conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in a young people's concert series tomorrow morning at 9:30 and 11, at Lakewood Civic Auditorium. Charlotte W. Holloman, soprano, will give a voice recita in Severance Hall, Friday evening at 8:15.

Mu Oct 16

HILL AUDITORIUM:

Boston Symphony Proves Superiority

IF THE REASONS why the Boston Symphony should play two concerts here this week were puzzling, last night's performance should have dispelled any bewilderment. This orchestra is undoubtedly one of the finest collection of musicians in the world. There is no way to describe the string section except to say that they have the wonderful "Boston" sound. Similarly the brass and woodwinds have a quality that is unique to this organization. It is a shame that this fine organization can't be heard more often.

The high point of the program was Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. From the beautiful introduction by the bassoon, the graceful second movement, the dramatically forceful third and the dark resignation of the last movement, Charles Munch gave a reading of much feeling and warmth. The person who can't appreciate the beautiful melodies and romanticism of Tchaikovsky is certainly to be pitied.

In the first movement the flute and clarinet passages were exceptionally well executed. In the third movement the brass section was given ample opportunity to show its skill and precision.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony lacks the lyricism that has made Tchaikovsky's "Pathtique" a favorite it was excitingly refreshing. The work is filled with beautiful melodic fragments but none of them is heard for a long enough time to make any lasting impression. Only in the last movement is there a theme that one can begin to remember.

However, there are many nice features about this work. It is very traditional in its external form. The first of the four movements is quite clearly delineated sonata form. It makes use of several short soloistic passages that were played very nicely last night. The second movement is very light and fast. It sounds a great deal like the music which Hollywood and television associate with "busy New York." The third movement is quite slow with beautiful solos for the cello and flute. The fourth movement sounds a great deal like portions of Shostakovich's "Golden Age." Here two contrasting themes are pitted against each other. The work was performed very well and audience response would indicate that the work will prove quite succesful. This work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's seventy-fifth anniversary last year.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" provided a suitably bombastic opening to the concert.

The Boston Symphony is certain to be one of the finest orchestras heard in Ann Arbor this fall. In fact, this organization and the Philadelphia Symphony are probably the two truly great orchestras in the United States.

—Bruce Jacobson

Cleveland Dealer Oct 15/56

Two Great Musical Events

Two musical experiences of the highest order await Clevelanders in the appearance here next Friday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concert on Nov. 10 of the famed Vienna Philharmonic on its first American tour.

Both organizations will appear at the Public Music Hall under the auspices of the Cleveland Opera Association as part of the season's program of musical events arranged by G. Bernardi.

To music lovers—and who in Cleveland is not?—neither orchestra needs an introduction. This summer the Boston group toured Russia, the first American orchestra to do so. The ovations its work received under the able baton of Charles Munch was a recognition of the high degree of American culture.

The Vienna Philharmonic, being directed alternately on its tour by Carl Schuricht and Andre Cluytens, has in its long history counted some of the world's greatest musicians and conductors among its members. It brings the soul of old Vienna. At one time George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor of this group. On the Saturday night when it appears the Cleveland Orchestra will not play so as not to detract from this great event.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 16 1956

Carlos Pinfield Services Set

Symphony Violinist Retired Last Year

Funeral services will be Thursday for Carlos Edgar Pinfield, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 42 years, who continued to work in the orchestra's interests after his retirement.

He died Sunday night. After his retirement in 1955 he devoted a great deal of time to interesting Boston business leaders in contributing to the orchestra and was cited for that service by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. He lived at 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

CARLOS EDGAR PINFIELD

BORN IN ROSLINDALE

Born in Roslindale, he studied in Boston under the late Henry Heindl and then for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin. He was fond of telling friends that he went to Berlin to find a place in the Boston Symphony. He was signed for the Boston Symphony by the late conductor, Karl Muck, when the latter heard him play at the Royal Academy.

He had served as a guest conductor of Pops and Esplanade concert and for several summers conducted his own orchestra at Poland Spring, Me. Recently he had been conducting the High Pines orchestra in Milton.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. Archambault Pinfield.

Services will be at 2:30 p.m. at the First Parish Unitarian Church — Jamaica Plain.

TIGHT BINDING

Welcome Mat Spread for Boston Orchestra

By Herbert Elwell

It has been several years since the Boston Orchestra visited Cleveland, so the appearance of this distinguished organization at Music Hall next Friday night is an event of considerable importance to Cleveland music lovers.

The absence of visiting orchestras is not felt quite so much today as it was years ago when our own symphony orchestra was still growing up and had not yet attained the perfection and eminence it now possesses.

HERBERT ELWELL

Nevertheless, appearances here of such famous orchestras as the Boston and Vienna Philharmonic are still exceedingly welcome, and they constitute an enrichment of our musical life. Fears that the visitors might provide unwanted competition have been largely dispelled, if they ever existed to any serious extent.

The Cleveland Orchestra's shift of its Nov. 10 concert to Nov. 9 to avoid conflict with the Vienna Philharmonic, coming Nov. 10, was a friendly and hospitable gesture.

Responsible for the Boston and Vienna orchestra engagements here is the Cleveland Opera Association managed by G. Bernardi, who is more active than ever this year in bringing musical entertainment to Cleveland. Of the many attractions being offered by Bernardi this season, it should be noticed that those included in his Popular Price Concert Course form a solid core of impressive musical values, and that persons of discriminating musical taste can not go wrong in subscribing to it.

The inclusion of the Boston and Vienna orchestras would alone make the course worthy of our endorsement. It is additionally enhanced by its listing of a performance of Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" by the NBC Opera, and a song recital by the eminent German soprano, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf.

Included as well are two group events about which I am less well informed but which look promising, "Little Singers of Paris" and "Ballet Basque de Biarritz."

To return to the Boston Orchestra, what a tradition it has to live up to, what names to conjure within its glamorous history since 1881! Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, all were giants. Then after World War I, came Monteux, and finally the great Koussevitzky, who reigned over the destinies of the orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

He last conducted the Boston Orchestra in Cleveland Dec. 4, 1946, an event to be remembered. Mrs. Emil Brudno and her Civic Concert Course were responsible for several visits of the Boston Orchestra over the years.

The program Friday evening will consists of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, Debussy's "Iberia," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique." It seems that another program was submitted for consideration, a program containing Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony. But since this work is to be performed at one of Robert Shaw's concerts in Severance Hall, it was, according to Bernardi, automatically ruled out, and the alternative program chosen.

More Tschaikowsky

I am not finding fault with the program, but some day I would like to see the Boston Orchestra come here and play something beside a Tchaikowsky symphony. Time after time Koussevitzky came here and gave us repeated hearings of Tschaikowsky's Fourth until it became just a little monotonous.

The Boston Orchestra has been under the direction of Charles Munch since the death of Koussevitsky. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, was one of France's foremost conductors, having conducted four orchestras in Paris. Boston audiences find in him a musician absorbed and possessed by the music he conducts.

The Boston Orchestra is practically unique among orchestras in the number of concerts it gives. Its season, one might say, lasts the year around. Its winter season consists of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home. This ends in April, when Arthur Fiedler takes over for a series of 60 Pop concerts.

Then come two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, after which, in July and early August, the orchestra moves to its summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the Berkshire Festival, which lasts six weeks. Thus the members of the orchestra are among the hardest working of musicians, but they are also among the best paid of orchestral players.

To change the subject, last Sunday I had a pleasant chat with Paul Henry Lang, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, who was here for the Critics Workshop. I sensed almost a note of envy in his voice when he declared that he thought our Cleveland Orchestra was at present superior to the New York Philharmonic.

Also I saw clearly that there was nothing to envy about the life of a New York music critic. Lang complained about the Philharmonic having to depend to such a large degree on big name soloists to draw audiences, and the consequent frequent repetition of standard concertos.

With a bitter sigh he said: "Last season I had to listen to the Brahms Violin Concerto seven times. If I have to hear it that many times again this season, what in the world can I find more to write about it?"

Josef Gingold

Yugoslav Dancer

Charles Munch

Charlotte Holloman

Robert Shaw

CONCERT STARS. Josef Gingold will be violin soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra directed by George Szell, Thursday and Saturday evenings in Severance Hall. Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Friday evening at 8:30. This Yugoslav dancer will take part in "Slavonic Rhapsody," at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and next Sunday evening. Robert Shaw, associate conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in a young people's concert series tomorrow morning at 9:30 and 11, at Lakewood Civic Auditorium. Charlotte W. Holloman, soprano, will give a voice recita in Severance Hall, Friday evening at 8:15.

Oct 16

HILL AUDITORIUM:

Boston Symphony Proves Superiority

IF THE REASONS why the Boston Symphony should play two concerts here this week were puzzling, last night's performance should have dispelled any bewilderment. This orchestra is undoubtedly one of the finest collection of musicians in the world. There is no way to describe the string section except to say that they have the wonderful "Boston" sound. Similarly the brass and woodwinds have a quality that is unique to this organization. It is a shame that this fine organization can't be heard more often.

The high point of the program was Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. From the beautiful introduction by the bassoon, the graceful second movement, the dramatically forceful third and the dark resignation of the last movement, Charles Munch gave a reading of much feeling and warmth. The person who can't appreciate the beautiful melodies and romanticism of Tchaikovsky is certainly to be pitied.

In the first movement the flute and clarinet passages were exceptionally well executed. In the third movement the brass section was given ample opportunity to show its skill and precision.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony lacks the lyricism that has made Tchaikovsky's "Pathtique" a favorite it was excitingly refreshing. The work is filled with beautiful melodic fragments but none of them is heard for a long enough time to make any lasting impression. Only in the last movement is there a theme that one can begin to remember.

However, there are many nice features about this work. It is very traditional in its external form. The first of the four movements is quite clearly delineated sonata form. It makes use of several short soloistic passages that were played very nicely last night. The second movement is very light and fast. It sounds a great deal like the music which Hollywood and television associate with "busy New York." The third movement is quite slow with beautiful solos for the cello and flute. The fourth movement sounds a great deal like portions of Shostakovich's "Golden Age." Here two contrasting themes are pitted against each other. The work was performed very well and audience response would indicate that the work will prove quite succesful. This work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's seventy-fifth anniversary last year.

Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" provided a suitably bombastic opening to the concert.

The Boston Symphony is certain to be one of the finest orchestras heard in Ann Arbor this fall. In fact, this organization and the Philadelphia Symphony are probably the two truly great orchestras in the United States.

—Bruce Jacobson

Cleveland Dealer

Two Great Musical Events

Oct 15

Two musical experiences of the highest order await Clevelanders in the appearance here next Friday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concert on Nov. 10 of the famed Vienna Philharmonic on its first American tour.

Both organizations will appear at the Public Music Hall under the auspices of the Cleveland Opera Association as part of the season's program of musical events arranged by G. Bernardi.

To music lovers—and who in Cleveland is not?—neither orchestra needs an introduction. This summer the Boston group toured Russia, the first American orchestra to do so. The ovations its work received under the able baton of Charles Munch was a recognition of the high degree of American culture.

The Vienna Philharmonic, being directed alternately on its tour by Carl Schuricht and Andre Cluytens, has in its long history counted some of the world's greatest musicians and conductors among its members. It brings the soul of old Vienna. At one time George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor of this group. On the Saturday night when it appears the Cleveland Orchestra will not play so as not to detract from this great event.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 16 1956

Carlos Pinfield Services Set

Symphony Violinist Retired Last Year

CARLOS EDGAR PINFIELD

Funeral services will be Thursday for Carlos Edgar Pinfield, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 42 years, who continued to work in the orchestra's interests after his retirement.

He died Sunday night. After his retirement in 1955 he devoted a great deal of time to interesting Boston business leaders in contributing to the orchestra and was cited for that service by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. He lived at 127 Crafts Rd., Brookline.

BORN IN ROSLINDALE

Born in Roslindale, he studied in Boston under the late Henry Heindl and then for two years at the Royal Academy in Berlin. He was fond of telling friends that he went to Berlin to find a place in the Boston Symphony.

He was signed for the Boston Symphony by the late conductor, Karl Muck, when the latter heard him play at the Royal Academy.

He had served as a guest conductor of Pops and Esplanade concert and for several summers conducted his own orchestra at Poland Spring, Me. Recently he had been conducting the High Pines orchestra in Milton.

He leaves his wife, Laura L. Archambault Pinfield.

Services will be at 2:30 p.m. at the First Parish Unitarian Church in Jamaica Plain.

138

Windsor Daily News Oct 19

DISTINGUISHED CONDUCTOR—Dr. Charles Munch, who directed the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in concert at Detroit's Masonic Temple auditorium.

Detroit Press Oct 17

MUSIC

Piston's Work Wins Acclaim

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, composed for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the highlight of the orchestra's concert Tuesday night at Masonic Temple Auditorium.

The concert was the first in the annual series by visiting orchestras, and attracted a near-capacity audience.

* * *

CHARLES MUNCH gave the program the driving direction that has been his notable feature since he took over the organization some years ago. It is a pace that causes considerable comment on the part of listeners, both for and against.

It is the privilege of a conductor to set his own interpretation of the movement markings of a symphony, providing his approach is logical and in line with the general concept of the work.

There may be many who will quarrel with the furious tempo of the allegro section of the first movement of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony, with the thought that the added "non troppo" was let go by the board. As part of the whole presentation, though, it was well considered and excellently done.

As all important conductors do, Munch has left his own personal mark on the orchestra, so that it is quite different in many regards. It is still, however, one of the greatest of orchestras.

* * *

THE PISTON symphony, according to the composer, was written with the special sonorities of this orchestra well in mind at all times. This became quite evident as the work unfolded.

The first movement gave prominence to the strings in a bold, yet gracefully flowing melody. There was fine use of percussion, which was to be noted throughout the symphony, especially in the second movement.

The battery punctuated the perpetual-motion rush of a sort of skittering figure that brought the movement to an end in a mood of high good humor.

Piston's writing for solo instruments was very effective, with moments of nobility in the passages for flute and cello. The final movement took on a martial character, with a fugato section for brasses that was most striking.

It was marked by the rattle of side drums and the high flourishes of trumpets, quite in the anniversary celebration mood.

The concert was opened by the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," providing a very effective bit of programming with the modern Piston being heard between two of the old favorites of the concert repertoire.

THE

The Theatre and Its People

By JOHN GARDINER

Boston Symphony

The world-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening opened the seasonal symphonic series at Detroit's Masonic Temple auditorium with a magnificent program of truly classic persuasion.

Dr. Charles Munch, one of the country's most eminent conductors, was on the podium to lead his musicians through the intricate passages which characterize von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 (the Pathetique) and Piston's Symphony No. 6.

Only recently the Boston Symphony returned from a triumphant tour of Soviet Russia where it won wide and generous acclaim.

Without apologies and without pulling punches, let us assert at once that the Boston symphony is slipping fast from its once much-vaunted superiority. The program last night was soporific, tedious and completely without inspiration. World-renowned though it be, the Boston Symphony lacks fire and why Munch should have chosen such a macabre program is difficult to understand.

From the impressionistic and tuneful viewpoint, the Tschaikowsky symphony was the Boston group's best offering — both as to interpretation and performance.

As most music lovers know, the Pathetique" was the work best beloved by the composer. It is thoroughly lugubrious and soul-searing in its impact. From the opening movement, described as a "convulsion of the soul," the pathos of the work makes itself felt. When the opening theme is taken over by strings and woodwinds, one experiences greater moods of melancholy.

Too, a funeral idea is interpolated — a quotation from the Russian requiem service — believed to indicate Tschaikowsky's own premonition of death.

The second movement, scherzo in form, begins with a graceful dance by the cellos carried on by the woodwinds against plucked strings. But joy soon departs and we are again plunged into the abyss of grief.

We get a touch of invigorating march tempo in the third movement but the fourth movement returns to that music known as "suicide music." The orchestral instruments cry with grief; listeners are deep in the morass of despair; there is a mournful elegy for the strings. Gradually the music dies away as though the sorrow and pain were too great to be expressed openly.

Tschaikowsky's Sixth is a masterpiece of emotion and the Boston Symphony brought to bear its full — if weak — resources to emphasize such emotion.

In von Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the opening is an eight measure tempetuous outburst with the wind section presenting the first principal theme. Second most important theme is a soaring song for the first violins.

However, the most wonderful page of this overture is the spiritual largo for muted violins and in this one recognizes the kinship between von Weber's Largo and the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin."

As to Piston's Symphony No. 6, the less said the better. Here is an abortion of music beyond comparison — a jumble of dissonant, discordant notes which clash and bump with every ear. It was a horrible example of how not to write music. Piston should hang his head in shame for writing it and Munch should have had the decency never to play it.

RUSHVILLE, IND.
REPUBLICAN
Circ. D. 3,480

OCT 17 1956

Soprano Will Open Connersville Series

The appearance of Saramae Endich, soprano, Wednesday evening at 8:15 in the Connersville High School auditorium, heralds the start of another concert series in Connersville.

Miss Endich was born in Steubenville, O., is a graduate of Ohio University and a voice pupil of Emmy Joseph and Winifred Cecil. During two seasons at Tanglewood she won outstanding successes both in opera and in concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rush County Concert members are permitted to use receipt stubs as admittance to the Connersville program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4206

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 18 1956

Works by Debussy and Ravel Conducted by Charles Munch

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

Though at least five American orchestras are newsworthy, owing to their new recordings, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been cornering headlines for its recent triumphal tour of Europe, including the Soviet Union. It was, in fact, the first American orchestra to play in Russia, and the Russians, according to reports, were rhapsodic about the performances, if considerably reserved about some of our American music.

Now that this "virtuoso orchestra" has covered itself with glory, many collectors of orchestral recordings will be attracted to a new Victor disk by the Boston Symphony called The Virtuoso Orchestra (LM-1984). Here we find an assemblage of Charles Munch's most brilliant performances—Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, Bolero, and La Valse. The jacket includes a set of notes in which Rudolph Elie gives us an illuminating exposition of what constitutes the virtuoso orchestra.

But a virtuoso orchestra can hardly exist without a virtuoso conductor, and in the electric Dr. Munch the Boston Symphony has just that. Victor, too, has done a virtuosic piece of recording, capturing nuances in La Valse that are not often heard on disks, and even Dr. Munch's battery of snare drums for the Bolero, so deafening in the hall, are caught in a good measure of their dynamic glory.

* * *

While this is an entertaining disk, there is a more important release from the Boston Symphony, one in which the subtleties of orchestral playing are delicately incised. It is Debussy's "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," given the same loving treatment by Dr. Munch that he accords all French music. This Victor disk (LM-2030) is further distinguished by the spoken voice of Dr. Munch, heard in the role of the narrator.

This is the music composed in 1911 by Debussy for D'Annunzio's mystery play dealing with the life of Saint Sebastian in mystical terms. An early criticism, that it was "offensive to Christian consciences," appears to have been mitigated by the passage of years.

Listeners approaching the work for the first time, however, should be prepared to hear music that emphasizes the sensuous beauties of instrumental sound and the human voice. The religious character of the work may not be apparent or appealing to those who eschew mysticism. The vocal portions are superbly sung by Florance Kopleff and Catherine Akos, contraltos, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, ably trained by their conductor, Lorna Cooke deVaron.

* * *

Another French conductor who knows his Debussy is Paul Paray, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and on a new Mercury disk (MG-50101) he brings us his rhapsodic readings of Debussy's "Ibéria," "La Mer," and the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." The Detroit ensemble, reorganized several seasons ago, does not yet appear to have the gloss of an older orchestra, but even so Mr. Paray has turned out some impressive recordings.

Mercury has also brought out a new disk by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Antal Dorati's expert guidance—Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 and Symphony No. 8 (MG-50100.) These two ingratiating works, in company with the composer's other even-numbered symphonies, are in his sunnier moods.

Mercury's "living presence" technique, however, does not measure up on this disk to the brilliance one finds in Fritz Reiner's traversal of the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra for Victor (LM-1991). Here we have superb clarity, distinct contrasts, and tonal vitality.

* * *

Another American orchestra, the Dallas Symphony, has not yet reached the point in its progress where it has joined the major league of recording orchestras. Under Walter Hendl, however, it has offered the citizens of Dallas a fair measure of contemporary works, and last season it presented a notable première — notable because Jascha Heifetz, to whom the work is dedicated, was the soloist, and because the composer, Miklos Rózsa, has turned out a number of worthy screen scores.

The new work is Rózsa's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, a piece filled with modern vigor, yet romantic in style. A native of Budapest, the composer has poured a lot of Hungarian dash into his score, and he keeps the fiddler hard at work.

Heifetz has turned in more gracious performances of more gracious works, but Heifetz fans need not be disappointed in this Victor disk (LM-2027), for it also includes winning traversals of Spohr's Concerto No. 8 in A minor, played with the RCA Victor Orchestra under Izler Solomon, and Tchaikovsky's Sérénade Mélancholique, done with the Los Angeles Philharmonic under Alfred Wallenstein.

138

Windsor Daily News Oct. 19

DISTINGUISHED CONDUCTOR—Dr. Charles Munch, who directed the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in concert at Detroit's Masonic Temple auditorium.

Detroit Free Press Oct 17

MUSIC

Piston's Work Wins Acclaim

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Walter Piston's Sixth Symphony, composed for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the highlight of the orchestra's concert Tuesday night at Masonic Temple Auditorium.

The concert was the first in the annual series by visiting orchestras, and attracted a near-capacity audience.

* * *

CHARLES MUNCH gave the program the driving direction that has been his notable feature since he took over the organization some years ago. It is a pace that causes considerable comment on the part of listeners, both for and against.

It is the privilege of a conductor to set his own interpretation of the movement markings of a symphony, providing his approach is logical and in line with the general concept of the work.

There may be many who will quarrel with the furious tempo of the allegro section of the first movement of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony, with the thought that the added "non troppo" was let go by the board. As part of the whole presentation, though, it was well considered and excellently done.

As all important conductors do, Munch has left his own personal mark on the orchestra, so that it is quite different in many regards. It is still, however, one of the greatest of orchestras.

* * *

THE PISTON symphony, according to the composer, was written with the special sonorities of this orchestra well in mind at all times. This became quite evident as the work unfolded.

The first movement gave prominence to the strings in a bold, yet gracefully flowing melody. There was fine use of percussion, which was to be noted throughout the symphony, especially in the second movement.

The battery punctuated the perpetual-motion rush of a sort of skittering figure that brought the movement to an end in a mood of high good humor.

Piston's writing for solo instruments was very effective, with moments of nobility in the passages for flute and cello. The final movement took on a martial character, with a fugato section for brasses that was most striking.

It was marked by the rattle of side drums and the high flourishes of trumpets, quite in the anniversary celebration mood.

The concert was opened by the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," providing a very effective bit of programming with the modern Piston being heard between two of the old favorites of the concert repertoire.

THE

The Theatre and Its People

By JOHN GARDINER

Boston Symphony

The world-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening opened the seasonal symphonic series at Detroit's Masonic Temple auditorium with a magnificent program of truly classic persuasion.

Dr. Charles Munch, one of the country's most eminent conductors, was on the podium to lead his musicians through the intricate passages which characterize von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 (the Pathetique) and Piston's Symphony No. 6.

Only recently the Boston Symphony returned from a triumphant tour of Soviet Russia where it won wide and generous acclaim.

Without apologies and without pulling punches, let us assert at once that the Boston symphony is slipping fast from its once much-vaunted superiority. The program last night was soporific, tedious and completely without inspiration. World-renowned though it be, the Boston Symphony lacks fire and why Munch should have chosen such a macabre program is difficult to understand.

From the impressionistic and tuneful viewpoint, the Tschaikowsky symphony was the Boston group's best offering — both as to interpretation and performance.

As most music lovers know, the Pathetique" was the work best beloved by the composer. It is thoroughly lugubrious and soul-searing in its impact. From the opening movement, described as a "convulsion of the soul," the pathos of the work makes itself felt. When the opening theme is taken over by strings and woodwinds, one experiences greater moods of melancholy.

Too, a funeral idea is interpolated — a quotation from the Russian requiem service — believed to indicate Tschaikowsky's own premonition of death.

The second movement, scherzo in form, begins with a graceful dance by the cellos carried on by the woodwinds against plucked strings. But joy soon departs and we are again plunged into the abyss of grief.

We get a touch of invigorating march tempo in the third movement but the fourth movement returns to that music known as "suicide music." The orchestral instruments cry with grief; listeners are deep in the morass of despair; there is a mournful elegy for the strings. Gradually the music dies away as though the sorrow and pain were too great to be expressed openly.

Tschaikowsky's Sixth is a masterpiece of emotion and the Boston Symphony brought to bear its full — if weak — resources to emphasize such emotion.

In von Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the opening is an eight measure tempetuous outburst with the wind section presenting the first principal theme. Second most important theme is a soaring song for the first violins.

However, the most wonderful page of this overture is the spiritual largo for muted violins and in this one recognizes the kinship between von Weber's Largo and the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin."

As to Piston's Symphony No. 6, the less said the better. Here is an abortion of music beyond comparison — a jumble of dissonant, discordant notes which clash and bump with every ear. It was a horrible example of how not to write music. Piston should hang his head in shame for writing it and Munch should have had the decency never to play it.

RUSHVILLE, IND.
REPUBLICAN
Circ. D. 3,480

OCT 17 1956

Soprano Will Open Connersville Series

The appearance of Saramae Endich, soprano, Wednesday evening at 8:15 in the Connersville High School auditorium, heralds the start of another concert series in Connersville.

Miss Endich was born in Steubenville, O., is a graduate of Ohio University and a voice pupil of Emmy Joseph and Winifred Cecil. During two seasons at Tanglewood she won outstanding successes both in opera and in concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rush County Concert members are permitted to use receipt stubs as admittance to the Connersville program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4206

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 18 1956

Works by Debussy and Ravel Conducted by Charles Munch

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

Though at least five American orchestras are newsworthy, owing to their new recordings, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been cornering headlines for its recent triumphal tour of Europe, including the Soviet Union. It was, in fact, the first American orchestra to play in Russia, and the Russians, according to reports, were rhapsodic about the performances, if considerably reserved about some of our American music.

Now that this "virtuoso orchestra" has covered itself with glory, many collectors of orchestral recordings will be attracted to a new Victor disk by the Boston Symphony called The Virtuoso Orchestra (LM-1984). Here we find an assemblage of Charles Munch's most brilliant performances—Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, Bolero, and La Valse. The jacket includes a set of notes in which Rudolph Elie gives us an illuminating exposition of what constitutes the virtuoso orchestra.

But a virtuoso orchestra can hardly exist without a virtuoso conductor, and in the electric Dr. Munch the Boston Symphony has just that. Victor, too, has done a virtuosic piece of recording, capturing nuances in La Valse that are not often heard on disks, and even Dr. Munch's battery of snare drums for the Bolero, so deafening in the hall, are caught in a good measure of their dynamic glory.

♪ ♪ ♪

While this is an entertaining disk, there is a more important release from the Boston Symphony, one in which the subtleties of orchestral playing are delicately incised. It is Debussy's "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," given the same loving treatment by Dr. Munch that he accords all French music. This Victor disk (LM-2030) is further distinguished by the spoken voice of Dr. Munch, heard in the role of the narrator.

This is the music composed in 1911 by Debussy for D'Annunzio's mystery play dealing with the life of Saint Sebastian in mystical terms. An early criticism, that it was "offensive to Christian consciences," appears to have been mitigated by the passage of years.

Listeners approaching the work for the first time, however, should be prepared to hear music that emphasizes the sensuous beauties of instrumental sound and the human voice. The religious character of the work may not be apparent or appealing to those who eschew mysticism. The vocal portions are superbly sung by Florance Kopleff and Catherine Akos, contraltos, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, ably trained by their conductor, Lorna Cooke deVaron.

♪ ♪ ♪

Another French conductor who knows his Debussy is Paul Paray, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and on a new Mercury disk (MG-50101) he brings us his rhapsodic readings of Debussy's "Ibéria," "La Mer," and the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." The Detroit ensemble, reorganized several seasons ago, does not yet appear to have the gloss of an older orchestra, but even so Mr. Paray has turned out some impressive recordings.

Mercury has also brought out a new disk by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Antal Dorati's expert guidance—Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 and Symphony No. 8 (MG-50100.) These two ingratiating works, in company with the composer's other even-numbered symphonies, are in his sunnier moods.

Mercury's "living presence" technique, however, does not measure up on this disk to the brilliance one finds in Fritz Reiner's traversal of the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra for Victor (LM-1991). Here we have superb clarity, distinct contrasts, and tonal vitality.

♪ ♪ ♪

Another American orchestra, the Dallas Symphony, has not yet reached the point in its progress where it has joined the major league of recording orchestras. Under Walter Hendl, however, it has offered the citizens of Dallas a fair measure of contemporary works, and last season it presented a notable première — notable because Jascha Heifetz, to whom the work is dedicated, was the soloist, and because the composer, Miklos Rózsa, has turned out a number of worthy screen scores.

The new work is Rózsa's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, a piece filled with modern vigor, yet romantic in style. A native of Budapest, the composer has poured a lot of Hungarian dash into his score, and he keeps the fiddler hard at work.

Heifetz has turned in more gracious performances of more gracious works, but Heifetz fans need not be disappointed in this Victor disk (LM-2027), for it also includes winning traversals of Spohr's Concerto No. 8 in A minor, played with the RCA Victor Orchestra under Izler Solomon, and Tchaikovsky's Sérénade Mélancholique, done with the Los Angeles Philharmonic under Alfred Wallenstein.

CLEVELAND NEWS, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1956

TRAVELING BOSTONIAN—Thomas D. Perry, (right) manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes to Cleveland tomorrow for its first concert in Our Town since 1946 spoke yesterday at a luncheon given in his honor at the Hotel Auditorium. He had quite a lot to say about the recently concluded European tour of the orchestra which included five days in Soviet territory. Shown with Perry, against a backdrop of some of the foreign posters which were used on the tour, are William Stinchcomb (left), chairman of the Cleveland Opera Association, Inc., (Bernardi) the sponsoring organization which is bringing symphony here, and Carl N. Osborne, treasurer of the (Cleveland Orchestra) Musical Arts Association. Mr. Osborne was especially interested in the photographs since the Cleveland Orchestra expects to make a similar European tour in the spring.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
Circ. D. 159,492

OCT 1 8 1956

Community Concert First

Leon Fleisher, pianist, is the first attraction on the second season of concerts offered here by Community Concerts. He will play December 19 in the Murat Theater. Other artists on the series will be Lily Pons, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, Tossy Spivakovsky and the Duo di Roma. There are about 150 season tickets unsold. Admission to the concerts is by season ticket only; no single admissions are sold.

The Boston Pops, one of the nations favorite orchestras, with Arthur Fiedler as conductor will be presented as the second feature of the University of Massachusetts Concert Series Thursday Jan. 3.

THURSDAY, OCT. 18, 1956 Ann Arbor News

Boston Symphony Plays Standard Works Well

By Carl Gehring

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard here Monday evening in the second concert of the Choral Union Series, returned to present the second offering in the Extra Concert Series last evening at Hill Auditorium. On this occasion, Charles Munch and his musicians played J. S. Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for flute and strings, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the orchestra, as soloist; "Iberia," Images for Orchestra, No. 2, by Debussy, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major, the "Eroica."

The program listed nothing new, to be sure, but it offered an opportunity to renew acquaintance with three old friends through the medium of Munch's magical ministrations. As is the case with real interpreters, as against the pedestrian type, Munch re-interprets the works he presents without violating their essential character or their composers' intentions. This is creative interpretation, revealing new and unsuspected points of interest in well-known scores and revivifying them with imaginative intuition.

Bach B-Minor Suite

The first of the three works to have the audience so by the ears, the Bach Suite was pointed up by a scholarly reading which was far from dry. A deeply moving performance of the Overture was followed by delightful projections of the Rondo, Bourree I, Bourree II, Polonaise and Double, Minuet and Badinerie which were altogether fanciful. Tempi, dynamics and the over-all conception of the Suite were just right, and the music came off in the finest Bach tradition.

As was the case in another memorable performance of this Suite, at the May Festival of 1945 when the Philadelphia Orchestra, with first flutist William M. Kincaid as soloist, did it so well, Mrs. Dwyer was adroit in her handling of the solo line. Her tone was exceptional, of a limpid and bird-like quality of extraordinary grace. Munch's addition of two flutes in the piece, inquiry revealed, is to gain more volume where needed and because of his belief that the flute is natural to Bach and warrants emphasis. In any case, the ensemble in the Suite was perfect.

Debussy 'Iberia'

With the Debussy came music of a different kind. Completely pagan in contrast with the Bach, atmospheric, rhythmically saucy, and orchestrated by a master of instrumental coloring, the "Iberia" projects a real challenge to the imaginative conductor. Munch made the most of it with an evocative performance wherein the atmospheric qualities of the music were definitely non-spiritual and the score's orchestral canvas was reproduced with a cornucopia of color.

As to instrumental highlights, the woodwinds were especially effective; with the oboes and clarinets outdoing themselves and the latter utterly pellucid on occasion. Some excellent French horn playing also was heard, while the pizzicato chords in the strings in the last movement were plucked with great precision. Concerning the strings, so wondrous as expressive media in the Bach, they were adjuncts of a more incidental sort in the Debussy, and admirable in the role.

Beethoven Symphony

Beethoven's "Eroica" was played in an appropriately heroic manner; and showed Munch as a god of the podium in his fabulous handling of a work by music's great "Titan." A mighty first movement, which could become turgid in lesser hands, unfolded with great clarity; the second movement, designated as a Funeral March, might easily have been identified as the swan song of a people, so faithfully was Beethoven's concept extended by an interpreter of titanic stature; the Scherzo was quite a dream, with its energetic opening and closing sections well contrasted with the more placid Trio; in the Finale, a noteworthy summation of its materials was evolved.

Orchestrally, matters were on a similarly high plane. The string choirs were extremely vital, with the double basses especially so in the Funeral March. Likewise superb were the French horns in the Trio of the Scherzo. Here a high E-flat, in particular, can embarrass the first horn player, but not a crack was heard. These examples were typical of the playing of the Symphony entire, and the evening over-all, and another factor in the high esteem with which the Boston orchestra is regarded.

A Serene Scene!

5272

An exquisite needle-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Chronicle
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 2,400

OCT 1 8 195-

Leslie Rogers Dies While In Germany

Leslie J. Rogers of Brookline, music librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last Thursday at the United States Army Hospital in Stuttgart, Germany, in his 63rd year. He was stricken with pneumonia a month before while on the European tour of the orchestra.

Mr. Rogers became associated with the orchestra in 1912 and was its senior member in point of service. He also was dean of music librarians among the major symphony orchestras of the country. He leaves his wife, and a daughter, Mrs. Phyllis McCleary of Arlington, Virginia; also his mother, Mrs. Cora P. Howe of Winthrop.

CLEVELAND NEWS, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1956

TRAVELING BOSTONIAN—Thomas D. Perry, (right) manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes to Cleveland tomorrow for its first concert in Our Town since 1946 spoke yesterday at a luncheon given in his honor at the Hotel Auditorium. He had quite a lot to say about the recently concluded European tour of the orchestra which included five days in Soviet territory. Shown with Perry, against a backdrop of some of the foreign posters which were used on the tour, are William Stinchcomb (left), chairman of the Cleveland Opera Association, Inc., (Bernardi) the sponsoring organization which is bringing symphony here, and Carl N. Osborne, treasurer of the (Cleveland Orchestra) Musical Arts Association. Mr. Osbo[illegible] pecially [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
AMHERST, Mass.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 1,574

OCT 18 1956

THURSDAY, OCT. 18, 1956 Ann Arbor News

Boston Symphony Plays Standard Works Well

By Carl Gehring

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard here Monday evening in the second concert of the Choral Union Series, returned to present the second offering in the Extra Concert Series last evening at Hill Auditorium. On this occasion, Charles Munch and his musicians played J. S. Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for flute and strings, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the orchestra, as soloist; "Iberia," Images for Orchestra, No. 2, by Debussy, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major, the "Eroica."

The program listed nothing new, to be sure, but it offered an opportunity to renew acquaintance with three old friends through the medium of Munch's magical ministrations. As is the case with real interpreters, as against the pedestrian type, Munch re-interprets the works he presents without violating their essential character or their composers' intentions. This is creative interpretation, revealing new and unsuspected points of interest in well-known scores and revivifying them with imaginative intuition.

Bach B-Minor Suite

The first of the three works to have the audience so by the ears, the Bach Suite was pointed up by a scholarly reading which was far from dry. A deeply moving performance of the Overture was followed by delightful projections of the Rondo, Bourree I, Bourree II, Polonaise and Double, Minuet and Badinerie which were altogether fanciful. Tempi, dynamics and the over-all conception of the Suite were just right, and the music came off in the finest Bach tradition.

As was the case in another memorable performance of this Suite, at the May Festival of 1945 when the Philadelphia Orchestra, with first flutist William M. Kincaid as soloist, did it so well, Mrs. Dwyer was adroit in her handling of the solo line. Her tone was exceptional, of a limpid and bird-like quality of extraordinary grace. Munch's addition of two flutes in the piece, inquiry revealed, is to gain more volume where needed and because of his belief that the flute is natural to Bach and warrants emphasis. In any case, the ensemble in the Suite was perfect.

Debussy 'Iberia'

With the Debussy came music of a different kind. Completely pagan in contrast with the Bach, atmospheric, rhythmically saucy, and orchestrated by a master of instrumental coloring, the "Iberia" projects a real challenge to the imaginative conductor. Munch made the most of it with an evocative performance wherein the atmospheric qualities of the music were definitely non-spiritual and the score's orchestral canvas was reproduced with a cornucopia of color.

As to instrumental highlights, the woodwinds were especially effective; with the oboes and clarinets outdoing themselves and the latter utterly pellucid on occasion. Some excellent French horn playing also was heard, while the pizzicato chords in the strings in the last movement were plucked with great precision. Concerning the strings, so wondrous as expressive media in the Bach, they were adjuncts of a more incidental sort in the Debussy, and admirable in the role.

Beethoven Symphony

Beethoven's "Eroica" was played in an appropriately heroic manner; and showed Munch as a god of the podium in his fabulous handling of a work by music's great "Titan." A mighty first movement, which could become turgid in lesser hands, unfolded with great clarity; the second movement, designated as a Funeral March, might easily have been identified as the swan song of a people, so faithfully was Beethoven's concept extended by an interpreter of titanic stature; the Scherzo was quite a dream, with its energetic opening and closing sections well contrasted with the more placid Trio; in the Finale, a noteworthy summation of its materials was evolved.

Orchestrally, matters were on a similarly high plane. The string choirs were extremely vital, with the double basses especially so in the Funeral March. Likewise superb were the French horns in the Trio of the Scherzo. Here a high E-flat, in particular, can embarrass the best horn player, but not a crack was heard. These examples were typical of the playing of the Symphony entire, and the evening over-all, and another factor in the high esteem with which the Boston orchestra is regarded.

A Serene Scene!

An exquisite needl[illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Chronicle
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 2,400

OCT 18 1956

Leslie Rogers Dies While In Germany

Leslie J. Rogers of Brookline, music librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last Thursday at the United States Army Hospital in Stuttgart, Germany, in his 63rd year. He was stricken with pneumonia a month before while on the European tour of the orchestra.

Mr. Rogers became associated with the orchestra in 1912 and was its senior member in point of service. He also was dean of music librarians among the major symphony orchestras of the country. He leaves his wife, and a daughter, Mrs. Phyllis McCleary of Arlington, Virginia; also his mother, Mrs. Cora P. Howe of Winthrop.

The Boston Pops, one of the nations favorite orchestras, with Arthur Fiedler as conductor will be presented as the second feature of the University of Massachusetts Concert Series Thursday Jan. 3.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Republican
Circ. 5614
OCT 18 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Concert Series

By Elizabeth Huntington

The Wellesley College Concerts for 1956-57 opened on October 10 in Alumnae Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch, in a vigorous and varied program given to an appreciative full house.

In this first immediately local concert following the long 11,000-mile European tour of the summer, a tour which included playing behind the Iron Curtain in Russia, it was to be expected that, beginning a new season with no vacation, they would include on this program the major work given on their tour: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which together with the Euryanthe Overture of Von Weber opened the Boston Friday and Saturday series last week.

The Weber overture, with its theatrical interest of subject and description, was a familiar and effective program opener. This was followed by the new Walter Piston Sixth Symphony, a work composed for the 75th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony last year, dedicated to the memories of Serge and Natalie Koussevitsky, and first given in that city in November, 1955. Caprice with a sly dash of humor characterized the rapid second movement, while the high spot was the third movement, a serene Adagio, its first theme a cello solo by Wellesley's own first cellist, Samuel Mayes, who played it with great sensitivity. This work seems easily the best and most interesting of Mr. Piston's major symphonic works to date, and the composer, who was present and acknowledged the applause of the audience, must have been pleased over its splendid reading.

The concert concluded with an electrifying performance of the mighty "Eroica."

Bostonians In Fine Form But Hall Still Needs Work

By NORMAN NADEL

After hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra open the Symphony Club of Central Ohio's 33rd season, in Veterans Memorial last night, it's easy to imagine the impact this sterling ensemble had on the Soviet citizens during its Russian tour this past summer.

CONDUCTOR CHARLES Munch opened his program with the Bach Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings, with the Boston's talented young flutist, Doriot Dwyer, as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is a fastidious flutist. Her tone is clear, fingering facile and phrasing fluent. Her playing is at home in the classic structures of Bach, yet it speaks with enthusiasm and individual style.

Unfortunately for the circumstances last night, the Bach Suite was not written to be played in a 3900-seat hall. Strings are muted, and volume is modest throughout. As a result, the music didn't have quite the warmth it would have in a normal chamber music setting. Too much distance between players and audience.

It's hard to imagine a more exquisite reading of Debussy's "Iberia" than the orchestra presented. It takes a special genius — which Munch obviously has — to maintain organization and continuity in a work as free and episodic as this.

THE MUSIC MOVED easily. Transitions from one mood, one tempo, one orchestral color to another were invariably easy and seemingly spontaneous.

It takes a man like Munch, and a band like the Boston, to bring out the nuances, the refinement, of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. Only then can it be distinguished from florid and assertive orchestral writing, and assessed as the complex, delicate and genuinely emotional masterwork it is.

IN THE AUDIENCE, and among the musicians backstage at intermission, there was talk of the acoustical flaws that still have not been corrected in our otherwise attractive new hall. These, and what seem to be the best ways of treating them, are:

- 1—Loss of volume, due to sound that is trapped in the area directly above stage, at the sides, and absorbed in the heavy backdrop and side hangings. Needed, a removable shell—sides, back and ceiling—to direct this presently lost music out into the auditorium.
- 2—Echo from rear of the balcony. Absorbent wall material, properly placed, or hangings back there should fix it.
- 3—Noise from the lobby during the concert. Remedy: have someone there to ask employes and strays to keep quiet.
- 4—Squeaking sound from what probably is a ventilating fan; it was a nuisance during first movement of the Tchaikovsky. Remedy: petition the Franklin County Veterans Memorial commission to oil it.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
Circ. D. 444,193 - S. 469,816
OCT 14 1956

Charles Munch

Boston Symphony To Play Here

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in Detroit and Ann Arbor this week.

At 8:20 p.m. Tuesday, the orchestra will be heard at Masonic Temple, Detroit, in a program consisting of the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber; Walter Piston's "Sixth Symphony" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

The same program will be played at 8:30 p.m. Monday in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, in the University of Michigan Choral Union Series.

The Wednesday program on the Extra Series will consist of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor; Debussy's "Iberia" and the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony.

Columbus
Oct 19

ON THE SAM Dispatc

Boston Orche Memorably F

The air conditioning system at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium was blowing up miniature gales all over the place and down many necks on Thursday evening.

The wide open spaces above the stage and the draperies around it affected section and full ensemble resonance and dimmed tonal luster.

But for all this the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, opened the Symphony Club's thirty-third season with so cogent and so beautiful a performance of a program of comfortably familiar music that major defects of the concert room were turned into almost minor annoyances for the occasion.

AT THE START of the evening subtley sensible and elegantly substantial account was given of the Bach Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings. Doriot Anthony Dwyer was the most admirable flutist of the performance. The Boston strings were the Boston strings!

Debussy's "Iberia" was played in a fashion fairly to ravish the ears and so to stir the imagination to fullest extent. The second section, Les parfums de la nuit, was especially affecting.

TREMENDOUS emotional impulse under excitingly absolute control made the performance of the Tchaikowsky "Pathetique," which ended the program, a profoundly stirring one. There was greatest eloquence but no bombast to the terminal movements while the central allegros were polished off with breath-taking virtuosity.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
Circ. D. 92,760
OCT 2 1956

PRETTY Doriot Anthony has the important job as first flutist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday evening Oct. 18, at Veterans Memorial.

Boston Symphony's Concert Overwhelms

By ROSEMARY CURTIN HITE

If Columbus' musical fare for the rest of the season proves to be as rich as that offered at the opening concert of the Symphony Club, listeners may expect to be well fed indeed. The Boston Symphony under the direction of Charles Munch was heard Thursday night at the Veterans Memorial in a program almost overwhelming in its opulence.

Most stunning work of the evening was Debussy's Iberia. Proving himself to be a master of the great French composer, Mr. Munch revealed to the audience the very essence of impressionism. Timbre was laid upon timbre, textures lovingly delineated, and transitions effortlessly manipulated to result in a dazzling illusion of Iberian colors and odors.

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, solo flutist of the Symphony, was heard in Suite No. 2 in B minor by J. S. Bach. An admirable artist, Mrs. Dwyer played with a tone which, despite the unflattering effects of the Auditorium's acoustics, was velvety in quality and well-projected.

Particularly noteworthy were the crispness of her staccato, notably in the Badinerie, and the lovely lyric quality of the Polonaise and Double.

The final work of the program, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, rounded out the feast in luxurious style. Surely, strings have never been more silken, woodwinds more eloquent, or brass and percussion more overpowering than they were in this familiar work.

Under Mr. Munch's precise and compelling direction, no detail was lost nor effect overlooked. And yet, despite demanding the most extreme dynamic range, Mr. Munch maintained an emotional restraint which prevented the work from falling into the over-sentimentalism which so often characterizes performances of it.

The audience cannot be blamed for bursting into applause at the end of the third movement, for surely Mr. Munch brought this section to a climax so tremendous that it seemed to defy anything to succeed it.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL — Oct 19 '56

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 408,705 - S. 521,6
OCT 14 1956

Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony in concert this Tuesday night at Masonic Auditorium.

Boston Symphony Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting, will present the following program Tuesday evening at 8:20 in Masonic Auditorium:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 6.....Piston
Fluendo espressivo
Leggerissimo vivace
Adagio sereno
Allegro energico
INTERMISSION
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique" Op. 74.....Tchaikovsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: Adagio lamentoso

148

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Republican
Circ. 5614

OCT 18 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Concert Series

By Elizabeth Huntington

The Wellesley College Concerts for 1956-57 opened on October 10 in Alumnae Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch, in a vigorous and varied program given to an appreciative full house.

In this first immediately local concert following the long 11,000-mile European tour of the summer, a tour which included playing behind the Iron Curtain in Russia, it was to be expected that, beginning a new season with no vacation, they would include on this program the major work given on their tour: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which together with the Euryanthe Overture of Von Weber opened the Boston Friday and Saturday series last week.

The Weber overture, with its theatrical interest of subject and description, was a familiar and effective program opener. This was followed by the new Walter Piston Sixth Symphony, a work composed for the 75th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony last year, dedicated to the memories of Serge and Natalie Koussevitsky, and first given in that city in November, 1955. Caprice with a sly dash of humor characterized the rapid second movement, while the high spot was the third movement, a serene Adagio, its first theme a cello solo by Wellesley's own first cellist, Samuel Mayes, who played it with great sensitivity. This work seems easily the best and most interesting of Mr. Piston's major symphonic works to date, and the composer, who was present and acknowledged the applause of the audience, must have been pleased over its splendid reading.

The concert concluded with an electrifying performance of the mighty "Eroica."

FRIDAY, OCT. 19, 1956 The Columbus Citizen 17

Bostonians In Fine Form But Hall Still Needs Work

By NORMAN NADEL

After hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra open the Symphony Club of Central Ohio's 33rd season, in Veterans Memorial last night, it's easy to imagine the impact this sterling ensemble had on the Soviet citizens during its Russian tour this past summer.

CONDUCTOR CHARLES Munch opened his program with the Bach Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings, with the Boston's talented young flutist, Doriot Dwyer, as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is a fastidious flutist. Her tone is clear, fingering facile and phrasing fluent. Her playing is at home in the classic structures of Bach, yet it speaks with enthusiasm and individual style.

Unfortunately for the circumstances last night, the Bach Suite was not written to be played in a 3900-seat hall. Strings are muted, and volume is modest throughout. As a result, the music didn't have quite the warmth it would have in a normal chamber music setting. Too much distance between players and audience.

It's hard to imagine a more exquisite reading of Debussy's "Iberia" than the orchestra presented. It takes a special genius — which Munch obviously has — to maintain organization and continuity in a work as free and episodic as this.

THE MUSIC MOVED easily. Transitions from one mood, one tempo, one orchestral color to another were invariably easy and seemingly spontaneous.

It takes a man like Munch, and a band like the Boston, to bring out the nuances, the refinement, of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. Only then can it be distinguished from florid and assertive orchestral writing, and assessed as the complex, delicate and genuinely emotional masterwork it is.

IN THE AUDIENCE, and among the musicians backstage at intermission, there was talk of the acoustical flaws that still have not been corrected in our otherwise attractive new hall. These, and what seem to be the best ways of treating them, are:

- 1—Loss of volume, due to sound that is trapped in the area directly above stage, at the sides, and absorbed in the heavy backdrop and side hangings. Needed, a removable shell—sides, back and ceiling—to direct this presently lost music out into the auditorium.
- 2—Echo from rear of the balcony. Absorbent wall material, properly placed, or hangings back there should fix it.
- 3—Noise from the lobby during the concert. Remedy: have someone there to ask employes and strays to keep quiet.
- 4—Squeaking sound from what probably is a ventilating fan; it was a nuisance during first movement of the Tchaikovsky. Remedy: petition the Franklin County Veterans Memorial commission to oil it.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
Circ. D. 92,760
OCT 20 1956

PRETTY Doriot Anthony has the important job as first flutist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday evening Oct. 18, at Veterans Memorial.

Boston Symphony's Concert Overwhelms

By ROSEMARY CURTIN HITE

If Columbus' musical fare for the rest of the season proves to be as rich as that offered at the opening concert of the Symphony Club, listeners may expect to be well fed indeed. The Boston Symphony under the direction of Charles Munch was heard Thursday night at the Veterans Memorial in a program almost overwhelming in its opulence.

Most stunning work of the evening was Debussy's Iberia. Proving himself to be a master of the great French composer, Mr. Munch revealed to the audience the very essence of impressionism. Timbre was laid upon timbre, textures lovingly delineated, and transitions effortlessly manipulated to result in a dazzling illusion of Iberian colors and odors.

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, solo flutist of the Symphony, was heard in Suite No. 2 in B minor by J. S. Bach. An admirable artist, Mrs. Dwyer played with a tone which, despite the unflattering effects of the Auditorium's acoustics, was velvety in quality and well-projected.

Particularly noteworthy were the crispness of her staccato, notably in the Badinerie, and the lovely lyric quality of the Polonaise and Double.

The final work of the program, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, rounded out the feast in luxurious style. Surely, strings have never been more silken, woodwinds more eloquent, or brass and percussion more overpowering than they were in this familiar work.

Under Mr. Munch's precise and compelling direction, no detail was lost nor effect overlooked. And yet, despite demanding the most extreme dynamic range, Mr. Munch maintained an emotional restraint which prevented the work from falling into the over-sentimentalism which so often characterizes performances of it.

The audience cannot be blamed for bursting into applause at the end of the third movement, for surely Mr. Munch brought this section to a climax so tremendous that it seemed to defy anything to succeed it.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL — Oct 19 '56

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
Circ. D. 444,193 - S. 469,816
OCT 14 1956

ON THE RIALTO
SAM WILSON
Dispatch Stage and Music Editor

Boston Orchestra Gives Memorably Fine Concert

The air conditioning system at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium was blowing up miniature gales all over the place and down many necks on Thursday evening.

The wide open spaces above the stage and the draperies around it affected section and full ensemble resonance and dimmed tonal luster.

But for all this the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, opened the Symphony Club's thirty-third season with so cogent and so beautiful a performance of a program of comfortably familiar music that major defects of the concert room were turned into almost minor annoyances for the occasion.

AT THE START of the evening subtley sensible and elegantly substantial account was given of the Bach Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings. Doriot Anthony Dwyer was the most admirable flutist of the performance. The Boston strings were the Boston strings!

Debussy's "Iberia" was played in a fashion fairly to ravish the ears and so to stir the imagination to fullest extent. The second section, Les parfums de la nuit, was especially affecting.

TREMENDOUS emotional impulse under excitingly absolute control made the performance of the Tchaikowsky "Pathetique," which ended the program, a profoundly stirring one. There was greatest eloquence but no bombast to the terminal movements while the central allegros were polished off with breath-taking virtuosity.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 408,705 - S. 521,[illegible]
OCT 14 1956

Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony in concert this Tuesday night at Masonic Auditorium.

Boston Symphony Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting, will present the following program Tuesday evening at 8:20 in Masonic Auditorium:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Symphony No. 6 ..... Piston
Fluendo espressivo
Leggerissimo vivace
Adagio sereno
Allegro energico

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 "Pathetique" ..... Tchaikovsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: Adagio lamentoso

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Re d (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Cir. 405,628

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973
OCT 20 1956

$6,360,000 Brandegee Estate Told

One of the last big estates of baronial acreage, the Brandegee estate, which sprawls across the Jamaica Plain-Brookline line, is headed for dissolution with the allowance of the will of Mrs. Mary B. Brandegee of Brookline, widow of industrialist and former Harvard College regent Edward D. Brandegee.

Probate Judge William J. Hickey, Jr., allowed the will which disposed of the $6,360,000 estate, which includes the big Faulkner Farm in Jamaica Plain and the Hyde Farm in Brookline.

The bulk of the estate, $5,700,000 and $660,000 in real estate, goes to four children, John L. Brandegee of Boston, Mrs. Martina L. Lawrence and Mrs. Marion S. Boit of Brookline and Mrs. Eleanor S. Talmadge of Hampton, N. J. Brandegee Charitable Foundation gets the Faulkner Farm and $150,000 in cash, and Mrs. Lawrence is left the Hyde Farm.

A $100,000 windfall for employes was ordered in the will to be distributed according to seniority and merit by John L. Brandegee and Attorney Adolph J. Koob. The latter received a $10,000 bequest. Each grandchild was left $5000, and there were specific charitable bequests of $10,000 each to South End House Association, and Central N. E. Sanitarium, and $5000 each to Boston Symphony Orchestra, Church of the Redeemer, Chestnut Hill, the Rev. John T. Golding and Dr. Dwight E. Siscoe.

000 mployes, es Share

Mrs. Mary B. Brandegee of industrialist and one-time d D. Brandegee, was allowed Judge William J. Hickey, Jr.

ach to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Church of the Reeemer, Chestnut Hill; Rev. John . Golding of Chestnut Hill and r. Dwight E. Siscoe of Beacon .. Brookline.

Employes who had already been eceiving pensions will continue get them, according to the will.

One daughter, Mrs. Lawrence, as left the Hyde Farm in rookline. To each grandchild rs. Brandegee left $5000 in cash.

BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
Circ. D. 6,544
OCT 19 1956

OTHER OPINION

—Not Always Ours

AID AND COMFORT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back home from a tour of Europe and Russia, is praised by President Eisenhower, who says the junket gives him great pleasure. Actually, of course, the tour deserves no such accolade. If he didn't want to criticize the tour behind the Iron Curtain, Mr. Eisenhower should have remained mum. No good purpose—but every bad purpose—is served by creating the impression of harmonious relations between dictatorship and democracy.

Also now comes news, this time from London, that the first appearance in the West of Moscow's Bolshoi Ballet brought high acclaim from British critics. Not only that, the British government itself went out of its way, and out of the path of good sense, to kow-tow to the troupe, personages no less than Prime Minister Eden and his wife having gone back stage to drop a curtsy.

Such displays of cordiality are truly sickening. Aid and comfort are given sworn enemies. No wonder small nations which so far have resisted the Soviet Sickle are bewildered; no wonder the oppressed people of satellite nations are heartsick. But still the mad race to toast and fete the Kremlin and its accessories to the fact continues.—St. Albans Messenger

Cleveland Press
Oct 20, 1956

Munch Gives Old Music New Life

By FRANK HRUBY, Music Critic

The Cleveland Opera Assn. presented the Boston Symphony last night at Public Music Hall in a program of Bach, Debussy and Tschaikowsky.

Under Charles Munch, the latest in a long line of celebrated conductors, the orchestra still ranks at the top as an instrument of color. This was particularly evident in its performance of the Debussy "Iberia" suite.

The shimmering iridescence of French impressionism came alive as the streets and byways, the fragrances of the night, and the morning of a festival day were depicted.

The audience last night was particularly cordial to the Bach Suite for Flute and Strings and to the soloist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, whose appointment to the first flute desk of the Boston Orchestra was heralded in national magazines a year or so ago.

Any qualms about the first woman to hold such a position in a major orchestra have long since been allayed. Miss Dwyer and the strings played with glowing charm and restraint through the seven dance movements, and the soloist was called back several times to acknowledge the heartfelt applause.

The closing number, the Tschaikowsky Pathetique Symphony, while at times catching fire, began to show the strain of almost incessant traveling to which these players have been subjected.

They are tired, and their faces show it. They have done music and America much good and they deserve to go home and rest. Perhaps when they return they will give us a sample of what they are most noted for, that is, some new music.

* * *

At Severance Hall, St. Mark's Presbyterian Church presented Charlotte Wesley Holloman in a song recital of concert and opera music.

This new coloratura soprano displayed a remarkably fine voice in a song recital of concert and opera music and sang with ease works of Handel, Mozart, Wolf, Strauss, Verdi, a spiritual group and some contemporary composers.

Miss Holloman unquestionably will be heard many times in the future. Lowell Farr assisted at the piano.

Cleveland News Oct 20 1956

Boston Symphony Delights Audience

By ETHEL BOROS

Our Town was host to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall for the first time in a decade and a fairish though by no means capacity crowd turned out for this rare event. They made up for any lack of numbers with their enthusiasm, however, and there was even a busload of music lovers from the Oberlin campus.

Under the relaxed but authoritative baton of Charles Munch, the competent, easy-going Boston crew gave Clevelanders divers examples of their supreme artistry with the playing of three works, the Bach "Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings," Debussy's "Iberia," taken from his "Images for Orchestra, No. 2," and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" or Sixth Symphony.

In the Bach suite Munch kept the orchestra moving lightly through the delightful dance measures, "rondo," "bouree," "badinerie," etc., through which the talented flute pipings of Doriot Anthony Dwyer sparkled now and then, ending with a beautifully executed, extended solo in the flirtatious, trifling "badinerie."

The full color, power and tonal beauty of the Boston Orchestra, sometimes dominated by the silken smoothness of the large string section came into full play on the Debussy "Iberia." Munch drew from his orchestra sharp, clear and brilliant sounds in this beautiful work which breathes the essence of Spain, with its passion for the dance, its love of festivity, its contrasting moods of somberness and flashing gayety.

It was the Tchaikowsky "Pathetique" however which really showed off the dynamics, the richness and the distinctive "sound" of the Boston outfit. It was this work, I am sure, which most people, with a few exceptions, especially desired to hear.

Unabashed by the ban which modernism places on romance, the Tschaikowsky work keeps rolling along, still a popular favorite because of, not in spite of, its excessive sweetness, sadness, sentimentality. It "sounds," it agonizes, it rejoices in some of the most exquisite music ever penned by a composer.

The peculiar accoustics of Music Hall were never more noticeable than last night. In some places in the hall, the Boston Orchestra, which is somewhat larger than the Cleveland Orchestra in numbers, sounded distant, not well balanced, diminished in volume. But the smoothness, the gorgeous richness and blend of the orchestra came through beautifully finally, triumphing over mere accoustical hazards such as the heavy draperies all around the stage. The audience left no doubt how they felt about the work of this great American musical organization, they applauded warmly and at length.

Munch, Boston Symphony, Still Mellow, Mature

By HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared under its music director, Charles Munch, in Public Music Hall last night, does not dazzle us quite so much as it used to in years past, for in the last decade ears in this town have become pretty much habituated to fine orchestral sound.

But we still take our hats off to the Boston for a special kind of mellowness and maturity that no other American orchestra gives us.

There is never a feeling that this orchestra is being driven. It is simply being led, sometimes coaxed, sometimes spurred on to emotional heights, but always conducted with supreme assurance that whatever is asked for will be given freely and fully. And there is about Munch a genial warmth that seems to bring forth from his musicians a human, as well as an expertly professsional, response.

He was recalled many times at the close of his stirring interpretation of Tschaikovky's "Pathetique," and it was evident that the large Cleveland audience still has a warm place in its heart for the Bostonians.

Munch's delineation of the second movement in five-four meter was somewhat lumbering and soggy, but there were other portions of great dramatic power, and strategic tightenings that pulled the whole symphony together in a way to minimize its tawdriness and give it an appearance of virility and dignity.

Most enjoyable was the sensuous sheen and virtuosic splendor exhibited in Debussy's "Iberia," where one of the chief virtues of execution was the subtle way in which the percussive sounds were integrated with other sections of the orchestra. Here French impressionism was served nobly and faithfully, not with cool analysis, but with feeling of native kinship and complete identification with its esthetic purposes.

Tho program opened with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings, and there is justification for this work having been chosen since it gave the orchestra an opportunity to display one of its most precious jewels in the exceptional artistry of its first flutist, Miss Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

The clarity of her rhythm and the incisiveness of her staccato notes were delightful

Cleveland Plain Dealer - Oct 20/56

TIGHT BINDING

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
Circ. D. 444,193 - S. 469,816
OCT 14 1956

Charles Munch

Boston Symphony To Play Here

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in Detroit and Ann Arbor this week.

At 8:20 p.m. Tuesday, the orchestra will be heard at Masonic Temple, Detroit, in a program consisting of the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber; Walter Piston's "Sixth Symphony" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

The same program will be played at 8:30 p.m. Monday in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, in the University of Michigan Choral Union Series.

The Wednesday program on the Extra Series will consist of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor; Debussy's "Iberia" and the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony.

em at the Veterans Memorial miniature gales all over the on Thursday evening.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
Circ. D. 408,705 - S. 521,878
OCT 14 1956

Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony in concert this Tuesday night at Masonic Auditorium

OCT 20 1956

LEAVES $6,360,000

Kin. Employes, Charities Share

The $6,360,000 will of Mrs. Mary B. Brandegee of Brookline, widow of wealthy industrialist and one-time Harvard College regent Edward D. Brandegee, was allowed yesterday by Norfolk Probate Judge William J. Hickey, Jr.

Bulk of the state—$5,700,000 in personal property and $660,000 in real estate—was left to her four children, John L. Brandegee of Boston; Mrs. Martina L. Lawrence and Mrs. Marion S. Boit, both of Brookline, and Mrs. Eleanor S. Talmadge of Hampton, N. J. The wealthy widow died Aug. 28 at the age of 85.

To the Brandegee Charitable Foundation she bequeathed Faulkner Farm, which lies in Brookline and Jamacia Plain, the contents of all the buildings on the property and $150,000 in cash.

The executors, her son and Atty. Adolph J. Koob, who was personally left $10,000 outright, were directed to divide any sum up to $100,000 among those who were at any time employed by her in any office she maintained at Faulkner Farm or any other place of residence. They were to be guided by length of service of such employes and their devotion to their work.

Up to 15 per cent of the estate, after deduction of specific bequests, is to be distributed annually to unspecified religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational institutions.

Specific bequests included $20,000 each to the South End House Ass'n and to the Central New England Sanitarium and $5000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Church of the Redeemer, Chestnut Hill; Rev. John T. Golding of Chestnut Hill and Dr. Dwight E. Siscoe of Beacon st., Brookline.

Employes who had already been receiving pensions will continue to get them, according to the will.

One daughter, Mrs. Lawrence, was left the Hyde Farm in Brookline. To each grandchild Mrs. Brandegee left $5000 in cash.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
Circ. D. 6,544
OCT 19 1956

OTHER OPINION

—Not Always Ours

AID AND COMFORT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back home from a tour of Europe and Russia, is praised by President Eisenhower, who says the junket gives him great pleasure. Actually, of course, the tour deserves no such accolade. If he didn't want to criticize the tour behind the Iron Curtain, Mr. Eisenhower should have remained mum. No good purpose—but every bad purpose—is served by creating the impression of harmonious relations between dictatorship and democracy.

Also now comes news, this time from London, that the first appearance in the West of Moscow's Bolshoi Ballet brought high acclaim from British critics. Not only that, the British government itself went out of its way, and out of the path of good sense, to kow-tow to the troupe, personages no less than Prime Minister Eden and his wife having gone back stage to drop a curtsy.

Such displays of cordiality are truly sickening. Aid and comfort are given sworn enemies. No wonder small nations which so far have resisted the Soviet Sickle are bewildered; no wonder the oppressed people of satellite nations are heartsick. But still the mad race to toast and fete the Kremlin and its accessories is the fact continues.—St. Albans Messenger

Cleveland Press
Oct 20, 1956

141

Munch Gives Old Music New Life

By FRANK HRUBY, Music Critic

The Cleveland Opera Assn. presented the Boston Symphony last night at Public Music Hall in a program of Bach, Debussy and Tschaikowsky.

Under Charles Munch, the latest in a long line of celebrated conductors, the orchestra still ranks at the top as an instrument of color. This was particularly evident in its performance of the Debussy "Iberia" suite.

The shimmering iridescence of French impressionism came alive as the streets and byways, the fragrances of the night, and the morning of a festival day were depicted.

The audience last night was particularly cordial to the Bach Suite for Flute and Strings and to the soloist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, whose appointment to the first flute desk of the Boston Orchestra was heralded in national magazines a year or so ago.

Any qualms about the first woman to hold such a position in a major orchestra have long since been allayed. Miss Dwyer and the strings played with glowing charm and restraint through the seven dance movements, and the soloist was called back several times to acknowledge the heartfelt applause.

The closing number, the Tschaikowsky Pathetique Symphony, while at times catching fire, began to show the strain of almost incessant traveling to which these players have been subjected.

They are tired, and their faces show it. They have done music and America much good and they deserve to go home and rest. Perhaps when they return they will give us a sample of what they are most noted for, that is, some new music.

* * *

At Severance Hall, St. Mark's Presbyterian Church presented Charlotte Wesley Holloman in a song recital of concert and opera music.

This new coloratura soprano displayed a remarkably fine voice in a song recital of concert and opera music and sang with ease works of Handel, Mozart, Wolf, Strauss, Verdi, a spiritual group and some contemporary composers.

Miss Holloman unquestionably will be heard many times in the future. Lowell Farr assisted at the piano.

5

Boston Symphony Delights Audience

By ETHEL BOROS

Our Town was host to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall for the first time in a decade and a fairish though by no means capacity crowd turned out for this rare event. They made up for any lack of numbers with their enthusiasm, however, and there was even a busload of music lovers from the Oberlin campus.

Under the relaxed but authoritative baton of Charles Munch, the competent, easy-going Boston crew gave Clevelanders divers examples of their supreme artistry with the playing of three works, the Bach "Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings," Debussy's "Iberia," taken from his "Images for Orchestra, No. 2," and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" or Sixth Symphony.

In the Bach suite Munch kept the orchestra moving lightly through the delightful dance measures, "rondo," "bouree," "badinerie," etc., through which the talented flute pipings of Doriot Anthony Dwyer sparkled now and then, ending with a beautifully executed, extended solo in the flirtatious, trifling "badinerie."

The full color, power and tonal beauty of the Boston Orchestra, sometimes dominated by the silken smoothness of the large string section came into full play on the Debussy "Iberia." Munch drew from his orchestra sharp, clear and brilliant sounds in this beautiful work which breathes the essence of Spain, with its passion for the dance, its love of festivity, its contrasting moods of somberness and flashing gayety.

It was the Tchaikowsky "Pathetique" however which really showed off the dynamics, the richness and the distinctive "sound" of the Boston outfit. It was this work, I am sure, which most people, with a few exceptions, especially desired to hear.

Unabashed by the ban which modernism places on romance, the Tschaikowsky work keeps rolling along, still a popular favorite because of, not in spite of, its excessive sweetness, sadness, sentimentality. It "sounds," it agonizes, it rejoices in some of the most exquisite music ever penned by a composer.

The peculiar accoustics of Music Hall were never more noticeable than last night. In some places in the hall, the Boston Orchestra, which is somewhat larger than the Cleveland Orchestra in numbers, sounded distant, not well balanced, diminished in volume. But the smoothness, the gorgeous richness and blend of the orchestra came through beautifully finally, triumphing over mere accoustical hazards such as the heavy draperies all around the stage. The audience left no doubt how they felt about the work of this great American musical organization, they applauded warmly and at length.

Munch, Boston Symphony, Still Mellow, Mature

By HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared under its music director, Charles Munch, in Public Music Hall last night, does not dazzle us quite so much as it used to in years past, for in the last decade ears in this town have become pretty much habituated to fine orchestral sound.

But we still take our hats off to the Boston for a special kind of mellowness and maturity that no other American orchestra gives us.

There is never a feeling that this orchestra is being driven. It is simply being led, sometimes coaxed, sometimes spurred on to emotional heights, but always conducted with supreme assurance that whatever is asked for will be given freely and fully. And there is about Munch a genial warmth that seems to bring forth from his musicians a human, as well as an expertly professsional, response.

He was recalled many times at the close of his stirring interpretation of Tschaikovky's "Pathetique," and it was evident that the large Cleveland audience still has a warm place in its heart for the Bostonians.

Munch's delineation of the second movement in five-four meter was somewhat lumbering and soggy, but there were other portions of great dramatic power, and strategic tightenings that pulled the whole symphony together in a way to minimize its tawdriness and give it an appearance of virility and dignity.

Most enjoyable was the sensuous sheen and virtuosic splendor exhibited in Debussy's "Iberia," where one of the chief virtues of execution was the subtle way in which the percussive sounds were integrated with other sections of the orchestra. Here French impressionism was served nobly and faithfully, not with cool analysis, but with feeling of native kinship and complete identification with its esthetic purposes.

Tho program opened with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings, and there is justification for this work having been chosen since it gave the orchestra an opportunity to display one of its most precious jewels in the exceptional artistry of its first flutist, Miss Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

The clarity of her rhythm and the incinsiveness of her staccato notes were delightful

Cleveland Plain Dealer - Oct 20, 1956

142

Recently back from touring Russia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the musicians in the quartet are regular members of the Symphony.

Ruth Posselt will replace her husband, Richard Burgin, as first violinist of the quartet during his illness. Alfred Kripps, concertmaster of the Boston Pops, is second violinist. Viola is played by John dePasquale, solo violist for the Boston Symphony. Cellist is Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The quartet, as a distinct group, has performed for many years. Although its members have changed from time to time, it retains the same level of top artists—all members of the Boston Symphony.

As members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these musicians were invited by the Russian government to tour the U.S.S.R. Their concerts in Leningrad, Moscow and elsewhere in Russia were given a warm reception by the Russian audiences. A concert that would receive a five-minute applause at Boston's Symphony Hall warranted an ovation in Leningrad that lasted for 35 minutes!

Musicians in Russia are among the highest paid people. Yet, commented James Stagliano, who is director of the quartet, orchestras in Russia are poor, partly because of the inferiority of instruments. The Russian government will not buy better instruments for the musicians who are using cheap, sometimes prefabricated instruments. It is felt by many, Mr. Stagliano added, that Russian composers have been arrested in their development by government demands.

Boston Symphony Plays Rich, Glowing Program

By WILLIAM FLEMING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, played last evening in Lincoln Auditorium before a packed house with more than 300 persons overflowing onto the stage. The occasion marked the opening of the regular subscription concerts of the Famous Artists Series.

Charles Munch as a conductor maintains a remarkable sense of identity with his men. His is the effortless light touch rather than the whip hand. Eschewing all podium calisthenics and histronic gyrations, he contents himself with a busy baton beat and clear cues, thereby letting the music shine through and speak for itself.

As for the orchestra, its reputation as one of the world's top symphonic organizations is well known. Suffice to say, its precision with unison chords, pizzicato string passages, crisp attacks and releases borders on the uncanny. Singling out the parts of such a complete whole is difficult indeed. The splendid woodwinds shone to best advantage in the Debussy, while the brass section came into its own in the Beethoven. Here the French horns performed sonorous miracles in negotiating the incredibly difficult Trio of the Sherzo movement without a blooper.

The program itself was a balanced blend of the baroque, classical and contemporary styles as represented by the Bach B Minor for Flute and Strings, the Beethoven Eroica Symphony, and Debussy'c orchestral Image, Iberia. With a conductor whose specialty is Berlioz and with the presence of such a virtuoso orchestra, it is to be regretted that none of that flamboyant romantic composer's works were represented. It seems like a wanton waste of natural resources.

Now to give a bow by bow account—the evening began with a dignified and restrained performance of the Bach Suite. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who seems to be the only feminine member of the orchestra, was heard to advantage in some fin flute playing. A purist might carp about using an entire 60-member string section for this aristocratic chamber music which was originally written for around 18 players. What i tloses in transparency, however, it gains in richness of sound. Much of the time only half the strings were used, thus preserving the slender and elegant proportions of this genial work.

After the austerities of Bach came the dazzling technicolor of Debussy's orchestral pallette. This is the sort of piece that should be tackled only by a crack orchestra, and Munch and his men made the most of it. The haunting fragrants of Spanish melodies captivating rhythms and elusive tone colors were presented now vigorously, now langorously, in a memorable performance.

The richest musical substance of the evening, however, came last with Beethoven's Eroica. Munch's is a sinuous rather than muscular and forceful. He marshalled his resources like a resourceful general on his orchestral battlefield, handling it in one long line from the explosively accented opening chords to the Prestissimo of the Finale. All was cast in the heroic mold with the closing variations assuming the proportions of a triumphal arch through which all humanity passes by in review.

Syracuse Post-Standard Oct 21/56

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604
OCT 21 1956

Boston Symphony Returns Home

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall this Tuesday evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M. I. T., pending the restoration of Sanders Theater.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23 will consist of Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will consist of Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston. The concert in Cambridge will consist of Barber's Adagio for string orchestra, Bach's Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 21 1956

Munch to Conduct Boston Premiere Of Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first local performances of the Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston at the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The program will begin with Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and will include the Fourth Symphony by Schumann. The Death Music of Siegfried, from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," will be played in memory of Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, who died in Stuttgart, Oct. 11.

The second concert in the Tuesday evening series at Symphony Hall, Oct. 28, will bring Bach's Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings; Debussy's "Iberia" and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Charles Munch will conduct.

The opening concert of the Cambridge series, Oct. 30, will be played in Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T., since the fire-damaged structure which houses Memorial Hall and Sanders Theatre has not been restored. Mr. Munch then will present Barber's Adagio, the Bach Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628
OCT 22 1956

Symphony Home Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23, will include Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will include Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston, Ravel's "Pavane" and the same composer's "La Valse."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
OCT 21 1956

Open Rehearsals

The series of six Open Rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director, in Symphony Hall, will begin Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 7:30. The remaining rehearsals will be given also on Thursdays—Nov. 29, Dec. 20, Feb. 14, March 7 and April 4.

These give a special opportunity at low cost to hear and observe a great orchestra at work. Tickets are now being distributed through school and college offices and at the Symphony Hall box office at $7.00 for the series. If any tickets remain after Oct. 31, they will be sold at $2.00 for each rehearsal.

Wed Oct 24
Herald

Symphony Program To Honor Librarian

In its Friday and Saturday concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay tribute to an invaluable member, widely famed in his field, but little known to the public—Leslie J. Rogers. Serving his 44th year as music librarian, he fell ill on the European tour and died recently in Suttgart, Germany. In his memory, Dr. Munch at the opening of the second half of the program will conduct the combined string choirs in the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quarter, Op. 135.

There will be further changes in the program as originally announced. It will open with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony and will introduce Walter Piston's 5th Symphony to Boston, which was commissioned by the Juilliard School. On the European tour, Piston's 6th Symphony, commissioned for the orchestra's 75th Anniversary.

ROGERS of 35 St. Paul St., Brookline, in Germany, suddenly, October 12, 1956. Leslie J., husband of Mrs. Phyllis (Bond), father of Mrs. Phyllis Mc-Cleary of Arlington, Virginia, and son of Mrs. Cora P. Howe of Winthrop, Mass. Services will be held at St. Paul's Church, Paul St., Aspinwall Ave. and St. Paul St., Brookline, Thursday, October 25 at 2 o'clock. Relatives and friends are invited. At request of family there will be no visiting hours. In lieu of flowers donations may be sent to the Massachusetts Heart Fund. Interment Friday at 3:30 P.M. in Fairview Cemetery, Jefferson, Maine. Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Maine, please copy.

Amusements Amusements

142

Recently back from touring Russia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the musicians in the quartet are regular members of the Symphony.

Ruth Posselt will replace her husband, Richard Burgin, as first violinist of the quartet during his illness. Alfred Kripps, concertmaster of the Boston Pops, is second violinist. Viola is played by John dePasquale, solo violist for the Boston Symphony. Cellist is Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The quartet, as a distinct group, has performed for many years. Although its members have changed from time to time, it retains the same level of top artists—all members of the Boston Symphony.

As members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these musicians were invited by the Russian government to tour the U.S.S.R. Their concerts in Leningrad, Moscow and elsewhere in Russia were given a warm reception by the Russian audiences. A concert that would receive a five-minute applause at Boston's Symphony Hall warranted an ovation in Leningrad that lasted for 35 minutes!

Musicians in Russia are among the highest paid people. Yet, commented James Stagliano, who is director of the quartet, orchestras in Russia are poor, partly because of the inferiority of instruments. The Russian government will not buy better instruments for the musicians who are using cheap, sometimes prefabricated instruments. It is felt by many, Mr. Stagliano added, that Russian composers have been arrested in their development by government demands.

Boston Symphony Plays Rich, Glowing Program

By WILLIAM FLEMING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, played last evening in Lincoln Auditorium before a packed house with more than 300 persons overflowing onto the stage. The occasion marked the opening of the regular subscription concerts of the Famous Artists Series.

Charles Munch as a conductor maintains a remarkable sense of identity with his men. His is the effortless light touch rather than the whip hand. Eschewing all podium calisthenics and histronic gyrations, he contents himself with a busy baton beat and clear cues, thereby letting the music shine through and speak for itself.

As for the orchestra, its reputation as one of the world's top symphonic organizations is well known. Suffice to say, its precision with unison chords, pizzicato string passages, crisp attacks and releases borders on the uncanny. Singling out the parts of such a complete whole is difficult indeed. The splendid woodwinds shone to best advantage in the Debussy, while the brass section came into its own in the Beethoven. Here the French horns performed sonorous miracles in negotiating the incredibly difficult Trio of the Sherzo movement without a blooper.

The program itself was a balanced blend of the baroque, classical and contemporary styles as represented by the Bach B Minor for Flute and Strings, the Beethoven Eroica Symphony, and Debussy'c orchestral Image, Iberia. With a conductor whose specialty is Berlioz and with the presence of such a virtuoso orchestra, it is to be regretted that none of that flamboyant romantic composer's works were represented. It seems like a wanton waste of natural resources.

Now to give a [illegible] account—the evening [illegible] dignified and [illegible] performance of the Bach Suite. Doris Anthony Dwyer, who seems to be the only feminine member of the orchestra, was [illegible] to advantage in some fin flute playing. A [illegible] might carp about using an entire 60-member string section for this aristocratic chamber music [illegible] was originally written for [illegible] 13 players. What it loses in transparency, however, it gains in [illegible]ness of sound. Much of the time only half the strings were used, thus preserving the slender and elegant proportions of this gem of a work.

After the austerities of Bach came the dazzling technicolor of Debussy's orchestral pallette. This is the sort of piece that should be tackled only by a crack orchestra, and Munch and his men made the most of it. The haunting fragrants of Spanish melodies, captivating rhythms and elusive tone colors were presented now vigorously, now langorously, in a memorable performance.

The richest musical substance of the evening, however, came last with Beethoven's Eroica. Munch's is a sinuous rather than muscular and forceful. He marshalled his resources like a resourceful general on his orchestral battlefield, handling it in one long line from the explosively accented opening chords to the Prestissimo of the Finale. All was cast in the heroic mold with the closing variations assuming the proportions of a triumphal arch through which all humanity passes by in review.

Sunday Post - Herald [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

OCT 21 1956

Boston Symphony Returns Home

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall this Tuesday evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M. I. T., pending the restoration of Sanders Theater.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23 will consist of Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will consist of Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston. The concert in Cambridge will consist of Barber's Adagio for string orchestra, Bach's Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 21 1956

Munch to Conduct Boston Premiere Of Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first local performances of the Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston at the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The program will begin with Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and will include the Fourth Symphony by Schumann. The Death Music of Siegfried, from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," will be played in memory of Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, who died in Stuttgart, Oct. 11.

The second concert in the Tuesday evening series at Symphony Hall, Oct. 28, will bring Bach's Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings; Debussy's "Iberia" and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Charles Munch will conduct.

The opening concert of the Cambridge series, Oct. 30, will be played in Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T., since the fire-damaged structure which houses Memorial Hall and Sanders Theatre has not been restored. Mr. Munch then will present Barber's Adagio, the Bach Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 21 1956

Open Rehearsals

The series of six Open Rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director, in Symphony Hall, will begin Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 7:30. The remaining rehearsals will be given also on Thursdays—Nov. 29, Dec. 20, Feb. 14, March 7 and April 4.

These give a special opportunity at low cost to hear and observe a great orchestra at work. Tickets are now being distributed through school and college offices and at the Symphony Hall box office at $7.00 for the series. If any tickets remain after Oct. 31, they will be sold at $2.00 for each rehearsal.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628

OCT 22 1956

Symphony Home Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23, will include Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will include Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston, Ravel's "Pavane" and the same composer's "La Valse."

Wed Oct 24 Herald

Symphony Program To Honor Librarian

In its Friday and Saturday concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay tribute to an invaluable member, widely famed in his field, but little known to the public—Leslie J. Rogers. Serving his 44th year as music librarian, he fell ill on the European tour and died recently in Suttgart, Germany. In his memory, Dr. Munch at the opening of the second half of the program will conduct the combined string choirs in the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quarter, Op. 135.

There will be further changes in the program as originally announced. It will open with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony and will introduce Walter Piston's 5th Symphony to Boston, which was commissioned by the Juilliard School. On the European tour, Piston's 6th Symphony, commissioned for the orchestra's 75th Anniversary.

ROGERS of 35 St. Paul St., Brookline, in Germany, suddenly, October 12, 1956. Leslie J., husband of Helen I. (Bond), father of Mrs. Phyllis McCleary of Arlington, Virginia, and son of Mrs. Cora P. Howe of Winthrop, Mass. Services will be held at St. Paul's Church, corner of Aspinwall Ave. and St. Paul St., Brookline, Thursday, October 25 at 2 o'clock. Relatives and friends are invited. At request of family there will be no visiting hours. In lieu of flowers donations may be sent to the Massachusetts Heart Fund. Interment Friday at 3:30 P.M. in Fairview Cemetery, Jefferson, Maine. Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Maine, please copy.

Amusements Amusements

142

Boston Symphony Plays Rich, Glowing Program

By WILLIAM FLEMING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, played last evening in Lincoln Auditorium before a packed house with more than 300 persons overflowing onto the stage. The occasion marked the opening of the regular subscription concerts of the Famous Artists Series.

Charles Munch as a conductor maintains a remarkable sense of identity with his men. His is the effortless light touch rather than the whip hand. Eschewing all podium calisthenics and histronic gyrations, he contents himself with a busy baton beat and clear cues, thereby letting the music shine through and speak for itself.

As for the orchestra, its reputation as one of the world's top symphonic organizations is well known. Suffice to say, its precision with unison chords, pizzicato string passages, crisp attacks and releases borders on the uncanny. Singling out the parts of such a complete whole is difficult indeed. The splendid woodwinds shone to best advantage in the Debussy, while the brass section came into its own in the Beethoven. Here the French horns performed sonorous miracles in negotiating the incredibly difficult Trio of the Sherzo movement without a blooper.

The program itself was a balanced blend of the baroque, classical and contemporary styles as represented by the Bach B Minor for Flute and Strings, the Beethoven Eroica Symphony, and Debussy'c orchestral Image, Iberia. With a conductor whose specialty is Berlioz and with the presence of such a virtuoso orchestra, it is to be regretted that none of that flamboyant romantic composer's works were represented. It seems like a wanton waste of natural resources.

Now to give a blow-by-blow account—the evening began with a dignified and restrained performance of the Bach Suite. Doris Anthony Dwyer, who seems to be the only feminine member of the orchestra, was [illegible] to advantage in some fin flute playing. Again one might carp about using an entire 60-member string section for this aristocratic chamber music which was originally written for around 18 players. What it loses in transparency, however, it gains in richness of sound. Many of the times only half the strings were used, thus preserving the slender and elegant proportions of this gem of a work.

After the austerities of Bach came the dazzling technicolors of Debussy's orchestral pallette. This is the sort of piece that should be tackled only by a crack orchestra, and Munch and his men made the most of it. The haunting fragrants of Spanish melodies, captivating rhythms and elusive tone colors were presented now vigorously, now langorously, in a memorable performance.

The richest musical substance of the evening, however, came last with Beethoven's Eroica. Munch's is a sinuous rather than muscular and forceful. He marshalled his resources like a resourceful general on his orchestral battlefield, handling it in one long line from the explosively accented opening chords to the Prestissimo of the Finale. All was cast in the heroic mold with the closing variations assuming the proportions of a triumphal arch through which all humanity passes by in review.

Syracuse Post-Standard [illegible]

Recently back from touring Russia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the musicians in the quartet are regular members of the Symphony.

Ruth Posselt will replace her husband, Richard Burgin, as first violinist of the quartet during his illness. Alfred Kripps, concertmaster of the Boston Pops, is second violinist. Viola is played by John dePasquale, solo violist for the Boston Symphony. Cellist is Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The quartet, as a distinct group, has performed for many years. Although its members have changed from time to time, it retains the same level of top artists—all members of the Boston Symphony.

As members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these musicians were invited by the Russian government to tour the U.S.S.R. Their concerts in Leningrad, Moscow and elsewhere in Russia were given a warm reception by the Russian audiences. A concert that would receive a five-minute applause at Boston's Symphony Hall warranted an ovation in Leningrad that lasted for 35 minutes!

Musicians in Russia are among the highest paid people. Yet, commented James Stagliano, who is director of the quartet, orchestras in Russia are poor, partly because of the inferiority of instruments. The Russian government will not buy better instruments for the musicians who are using cheap, sometimes prefabricated instruments. It is felt by many, Mr. Stagliano added, that Russian composers have been arrested in their development by government demands.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628

OCT 22 1956

Symphony Home Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23, will include Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will include Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston, Ravel's "Pavane" and the same composer's "La Valse."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

OCT 21 1956

Boston Symphony Returns Home

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give the second concert of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall this Tuesday evening, the third pair of concerts in the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the opening concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. This concert will be given in the Kresge Auditorium of M. I. T., pending the restoration of Sanders Theater.

The program for Tuesday, Oct. 23 will consist of Bach's Second Suite for Flute and Strings, Debussy's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique." The Friday and Saturday program will consist of Barber's Adagio for String Orchestra, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Piston's Fifth Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston. The concert in Cambridge will consist of Barber's Adagio for string orchestra, Bach's Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 21 1956

Munch to Conduct Bos[ton] Of Fifth Symphony by

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first local performances of the Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston at the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The program will begin with Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and will include the Fourth Symphony by Schumann. The Death Music of Siegfried, from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," will be played in memory of Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, who died in Stuttgart, Oct. 11.

The second concert in the Tuesday evening series at Symphony Hall, Oct. 28, will bring Bach's Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings; Debussy's "Iberia" and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Charles Munch will conduct.

The opening concert of the Cambridge series, Oct. 30, will be played in Kresge Auditorium of M.I.T., since the fire-damaged Sanders Theater has been restored. The program will include Barber's Adagio for Strings, Bach's Second Suite and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Garden Bug — I am still using your "Meat Cake Unique" casserole and while preparing it recently wondered about how long ago you had sent it in. I'll soon be married 20 years and think perhaps I was just a "bride" when I clipped it out. Am I right?

Tiny Tune.

Dolly Dimples—Many thanks for your Chinese fried rice recipe

UCT 21 1956

Open Rehearsal Seats Now on Sale

The series of six Open Rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, Music Director, in Symphony Hall, will begin on Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 7:30. Tickets are now being distributed by school and college offices and at the Symphony Hall box office at $7.00 for the series. If any tickets remain after Oct. 31, they will be sold at $2.00 for each rehearsal.

The next rehearsals will be given on Nov. 29, Dec. 20, Feb. 14, March 7 and April 4. These rehearsals give special opportunity at low cost to hear and observe a great orchestra at work. Occasional repeated passages afford a closer acquaintance with the music.

Wed Oct 24
Herald

Symphony Program To Honor Librarian

In its Friday and Saturday concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay tribute to an invaluable member, widely famed in his field, but little known to the public—Leslie J. Rogers. Serving his 44th year as music librarian, he fell ill on the European tour and died recently in Suttgart, Germany. In his memory, Dr. Munch at the opening of the second half of the program will conduct the combined string choirs in the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quarter, Op. 135.

There will be further changes in the program as originally announced. It will open with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony and will introduce Walter Piston's 5th Symphony to Boston, which was commissioned by the Juilliard School. On the European tour, Piston's 6th Symphony, commissioned for the orchestra's 75th Anniversary.

ROGERS of 35 St. Paul St., Brookline, in Germany, suddenly, October 12, 1956. Leslie J., husband of Helen J. (Bond), father of Mrs. Phyllis Mc-Cleary of Arlington, Virginia, and son of Mrs. Cora P. Howe of Winthrop, Mass. Services will be held at St. Paul's Church, corner of Aspinwall Ave. and St. Paul St., Brookline, Thursday, October 25 at 2 o'clock. Relatives and friends are invited. At request of family there will be no visiting hours. In lieu of flowers donations may be sent to the Massachusetts Heart Fund. Interment Friday at 3:30 P.M. in Fairview Cemetery, Jefferson, Maine. Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Maine, please copy.

Amusements

Amusements

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

THE SIMMONS NEWS

Music Listening Hour

Monday, October 29.

Thursday, October 25, 1956

SIMMONS COLLEGE

Assembly Presents Quartet From Symphony Orchestra

by Patricia Cocozella and Emily Post

The Boston Symphony String Quartet, brought to Simmons through the Assembly Series program, will present a concert of Mozart and Beethoven string selections Friday, October 26, fifth hour, in the Auditorium.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
OCT 24 1956

Boston Symphony To Honor Memory Of Leslie Rogers

In concerts on Friday and Saturday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay posthumous tribute to a member—widely famed in his field but little known to the public—Leslie J. Rogers. Serving his 44th year as music librarian, he fell ill on the European tour, and died in Stuttgart, Germany. In his memory, Dr. Munch at the opening of the second half of the program will conduct the combined string choirs in the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quartet, Op. 135.

There will be further changes in the program as originally announced. It will open with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, in D major, K. 297. Next, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony will be introduced to Boston. It was commissioned by the Juilliard School, which gave the first performance in its Festival of American Music last Spring.

The program will close with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, in D minor, Op. 120.

Piston was reckoned as an important addition to European knowledge of contemporary American composers.

The program will close with Schuman's Fourth Symphony, in D minor, Op. 120.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
OCT 27 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the third program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony in D (K. 297) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 5 ..... Piston
Lento assai, from String Quartet in F, Op. 135 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"In the death of Leslie J. Rogers on Oct. 19, the orchestra has suffered the loss of an invaluable member. His association with the orchestra began in 1912 under Dr. Karl Muck. A man of extraordinary knowledge and skill in his profession and complete dedication to the Orchestra, Mr. Rogers served, as only he could, a whole generation of conductors and composers whose works were performed at these concerts. His contribution to the musicians and the musical life of this country was truly unique."

So, with characteristic reserve, the Boston Symphony announced the passing of its librarian in the program book of yesterday's concert. It did not, and it could not, suggest the enormous contribution the man made in his 44 years not merely as librarian but as musicologist, counselor, program advisor and, in fact, musical authority of unchallengeable integrity. His knowledge of the musical scores of the entire literature was phenomenal: the incorrect spelling of a note, a mistake in copying, an error in notation or phrasing, the least printed distortion of a composer's original intentions; none of these missed his eye. He retained, too, the exact tempos taken by every conductor he ever had contact with and could tell, to the second, the duration of any given piece as played by any given conductor. And with all this, he was a repository of stories and anecdotes about the conductors he had known, all remarkable for being wholly untainted with malice; his humor never failed him, nor his good spirits.

SUPREME TRIBUTE

Yesterday afternoon the organization to which he had given his whole life gave him the supreme tribute as the string orchestra played the slow movement from Beethoven's last quartet. It was performed in an awesome hush after the entire quartet in his memory. It was performed in an awesome hush after the entire orchestra had stood silently for a minute or more, and the combined tones the full string sound lent to this gentle cavatina, so richly and solely harmonized, was moving in the extreme. In retrospect, it was also a requiem for two other men of the orchestra: Leon Marjollet, who died suddenly in Paris on Sept 20, and Carlos Surield, retired but still working for the orchestra's benefit, who died on October 13.

This occasion saw the first Boston performance of Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony. Composed for the Julliard School of Music, and first performed there earlier in the year, the three movement symphony is considerably more difficult than the Sixth, which won such great favor in Europe. Its first two movements are austere to the point of severity though the first rises at time to great proclamations in the brass following an opening moment of a magical promise. The slow movement does not reveal itself easily, conveying a brooding, mysterious quality whose outlines are always in the shadow; the tonal mass moves forward after the initial statement of a fleeting, indistinct melodic motto in the low strings, but the sense of variation is lost in the movement.

SURPRISING OUTBURST

It is effective—for Mr. Piston is altogether too much the master to present his materials save on the highest instrumental level, but somehow it doesn't move the heart; there is nothing the casual ear can cling to in the permutations of the principal melodic statement. The finale, however, offers a surprising contrast. Here, in one of his jolliest moods, the composer gives us a rondo of such a bright cast and distinct outlines it almost suggests that he might originally have had it in mind as an orchestral scherzo rather than a finale. In any case, it somehow does not quite suit what has gone on before, though this is not to say it isn't a very effective conclusion. Mr. Piston was in the audience and was very heartily applauded by the audience.

The concert began with a fine performance of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, a work whose andantino is a gem shedding the soft rays of an opal, and ended with Schumann's Fourth Symphony. This is a work that, once beyond its tiresome first movement, gains constantly to end in a sunburst of tonal vitality. Mr. Munch gave the work a performance at once informed with attention to detail yet at the same time as richly expressive as the symphony, in its ardent romanticism, can be.

The program next week presents Clara Haskil as soloist for the first time in the city. She will do Beethoven's Third, other works on the program being Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Death of Vengeance" and Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana."

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL
Circ. D. 133,704
OCT 22 1956

— THE CONCERT —

The Boston Gives Depth, Meaning To the 'Eroica'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently returned from a concert tour of European countries including five concerts in Russia, played a program Saturday night in Central High School hall. There was a capacity audience with 300 seated on the stage. The event was the opening of the regular series of Famous Artists, Murray Bernthal, executive.

The symphony was the Beethoven Third in E Flat Major — the "Eroica" — the work once dedicated by the master of Bonn to Napoleon Bonaparte, the dedication on the title page later erased. In the many performances by The Boston, through the years, the "Eroica" is regarded as symbolic of order, of power and of spirit.

This is was unfolded here under the astute musical guidance of Dr. Charles Munch. Delicate violin figurations and broken accents of sorrow with staccati; then chords, mighty chords, rich and bold, and lengthy respectively mark the first and second movements. The Scherzo, than which there is no more beautiful in instrumental literature, has phrasing rich and joyous, indeed. The fourth movement further delights, with plucked strings, the oboes dolce on crescendo, every bar stamped with vitality, It was both lyrical and dazzling music. The audience was most enthusiastic.

The opening selection was the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist of the orchestra as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is the first woman to have the principal chair of the flute section in a major U. S. orchestra. The Bach music under Dr. Munch and with Mrs. Dwyer's gifts quickly came into favor with the audience. It was a form of beauty which set the audience in a receptive mood.

Debussy's "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra No. 2) provided an excursion into the subleties of the composer whose visionary pageant of the streets and byways, the fragrance of the night and the morning of a festival day were iridescent to whatever extent the listener responded. Famous Artists has scheduled a concert by Byron Janis, pianist, in the school hall Nov. 13.

E. V. W.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
OCT 27 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Piston Fifth Introduced Here

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the third program in the Friday-Saturday series, at Symphony Hall: Mozart: "Paris" Symphony (K. 297); Walter Piston: Symphony No. 5 (first times in Boston); Beethoven: Lento assai, from the String Quartet in F major, Op. 135, played by the massed strings in memory of Leslie J. Rogers; Schumann: Fouth Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced here yesterday another very fine Symphony, the Fifth, by Walter Piston. The reason that we are hearing the Fifth for the first time a season later than the Sixth, is that No. 5 had been commissioned by the Juilliard School for a Festival which was postponed until last February.

In certain respects the Fifth Symphony is the most personal of all Piston's half-dozen, though it is a risky statement to make upon early acquaintance with a score which is going to take some time to know well. Harmonically, it is bold, astringent and of the day. In the orchestration, which is most original in many pages and a little Debussyan in others, the Symphony is distinguished. The first two movements contain several interludes of solo effects against subdued background, a device as old as concerted music, but in this generation exploited in the same way, to my knowledge, only by Shostakovitch. The finale suggests a fast march with syncopation, rondo manner.

The foregoing observations deal with the form and outward aspect. It is harder to describe the "interior" of the music, which is where the personal element resides. But indeed you do perceive it, in the serious but not heavy or emotionally disturbed pages of the first two movements. Though the music speaks out boldly, as often as it is bitter, there is an inescapable sense of meditative feeling here. Piston has never been a man to wring your withers —or his, either—in public. Yet emotional communication is plain enough. This is no music of intellectual abstraction, thank Heaven!

The Fifth Symphony, will be played again, as indeed it must. But the Boston Symphony and RCA-Victor will do many of us a service if they will record it, along with Mr. Piston's Sixth. That would be a good way to get thoroughly acquainted with it. Yesterday's performance sounded very eloquent, indeed, and brought the composer, who was present, a gratifying reception from the Friday subscribers.

Leslie J. Rogers, who had been the Orchestra's senior member and its extremely able librarian, did not return from the European tour, having died in Stuttgart Oct. 11. It was most fiting that the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quartet, a nobly meditative music, be played in his memory. Just before it began, in the second half of the program, Mr. Munch bade the ochestra, though not the audience, rise and stand in silence. It was a beautiful performance, and luckily went un-marred by ill-timed applause.

In Schumann's ageless D minor Symphony, Mr. Munch and the orchestra were at their best, if you overlook just a few chordal attacks not precisely on the nose—or rather, the note. The performance was correct in style, it "sang," was rhythmically buoyant and poetically eloquent. Mozart's bubbling "Paris" Symphony had been done as well.

Next week Mr. Munch will present Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture; the C minor Piano Concerto of Beethoven, with Clara Haskil making her Boston debut as soloist; "Medea's Meditation and Death of Vengeance," new to Boston, by Samuel Barber, and Turina's Sinfonia sevillana, likewise new here.

TIGHT BINDING

THE SIMMONS NEWS

Thursday, October 25, 1956

SIMMONS COLLEGE

Music Listening Hour

Monday, October 29.

Assembly Presents Quartet From Symphony Orchestra

by Patricia Cocozella and Emily Post

The Boston Symphony String Quartet, brought to Simmons through the Assembly Series program, will present a concert of Mozart and Beethoven string selections Friday, October 26, fifth hour, in the Auditorium.

OCT 24 1956

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL
Circ. D. 133,704
OCT 22 1956

Librarian Rogers Memorial Concert

In its first Friday and Saturday concerts since returning from its Western tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay tribute to an invaluable member, widely famed in his field, but little known to the public—Leslie J. Rogers.

Serving his 44th year as music librarian, he fell ill on the European tour, and died recently in Stuttgart, Germany. In his memory, Dr. Munch at the opening of the second half of the program will conduct the combined string choirs in the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quartet, Op. 135.

There will be further changes in the program as originally announced. It will open with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, in D major, K. 297. Next, Walter Piston's Fifth Sympohny will be introduced to Boston. This was commissioned by the Juilliard School, which gave the first performance in its Festival of American Music last Spring.

On the European tour, Mr. Piston's Sixth Symphony, commissioned for the orchestra's 75th anniversary, was played seven times. Critical comment was generally enthusiastic, and on the basis of this work, Mr. Piston was reckoned as an important addition to European knowledge of contemporary American composers.

The program will close with Schuman's Fourth Symphony, in D minor, Op. 120.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

OCT 27 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the third program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony in D (K. 297) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 5 ..... Piston
Lento assai, from String Quartet in F, Op. 135 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"In the death of Leslie J. Rogers on Oct. 19, the orchestra has suffered the loss of an invaluable member. His association with the orchestra began in 1912 under Dr. Karl Muck. A man of extraordinary knowledge and skill in his profession and complete dedication to the Orchestra, Mr. Rogers served, as only he could, a whole generation of conductors and composers whose works were performed at these concerts. His contribution to the musicians and the musical life of this country was truly unique."

So, with characteristic reserve, the Boston Symphony announced the passing of its librarian in the program book of yesterday's concert. It did not, and it could not, suggest the enormous contribution the man made in his 44 years not merely as librarian but as musicologist, counselor, program advisor and, in fact, musical authority of unchallengeable integrity. His knowledge of the musical scores of the entire literature was phenomenal: the incorrect spelling of a note, a mistake in copying, an error in notation or phrasing, the least printed distortion of a composer's original intentions; none of these missed his eye. He retained, too, the exact tempos taken by every conductor he ever had contact with and could tell, to the second, the duration of any given piece as played by any given conductor. And with all this, he was a repository of stories and anecdotes about the conductors he had known, all remarkable for being wholly untainted with malice; his humor never failed him, nor his good spirits.

SUPREME TRIBUTE

Yesterday afternoon the organization to which he had given his whole life gave him the supreme tribute as the string orchestra played the slow movement from Beethoven's last quartet. It was performed in an awesome hush after the entire quartet in his memory. It was performed in an awesome hush after the entire orchestra had stood silently for a minute or more, and the additional lustre the full string band lent to this gentle cavatina, so richly and softly harmonized, was moving in the extreme. In extension, it was also a requiem for two other men of the orchestra, Leon Marjollet, who died suddenly in Paris on Sept. 20, and Carlos Infield, retired but still working for the orchestra's benefit, who died on October 13.

This occasion saw the first Boston performance of Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony. Composed for the Julliard School of Music, and first performed there earlier in the year, the three movement symphony is considerably more difficult than the Sixth, which won such great favor in Europe. Its first two movements are austere to the point of severity though the first rises at time to great proclamations in the brass following an opening moment of a magical promise. The slow movement does not reveal itself easily, conveying a brooding, mysterious quality whose outlines are always in the shadow; the tonal mass moves forward after the initial statement of a fleeting, indistinct melodic motto in the low strings, but the sense of variation is lost in the movement.

SURPRISING OUTBURST

It is effective—for Mr. Piston is altogether too much the master to present his materials save on the highest instrumental level, but somehow it doesn't move the heart: there is nothing the casual ear can cling to in the permutations of the principal melodic statement. The finale, however, offers a surprising contrast. Here, in one of his jolliest moods, the composer gives us a rondo of such a bright cast and distinct outlines it almost suggests that he might originally have had it in mind as an orchestral scherzo rather than a finale. In any case, it somehow does not quite suit what has gone on before, though this is not to say it isn't a very effective conclusion. Mr. Piston was in the audience and was very heartily applauded by the audience.

The concert began with a fine performance of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, a work whose andantino is a gem shedding the soft rays of an opal, and ended with Schumann's Fourth Symphony. This is a work that, once beyond its tiresome first movement, gains constantly to end in a sunburst of tonal vitality. Mr. Munch gave the work a performance at once informed with attention to detail yet at the same time as richly expressive as the symphony, in its ardent romanticism, can be.

The program next week presents Clara Haskil as soloist for the first time in the city. She will do Beethoven's Third, other works on the program being Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Death of Vengeance" and Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana."

— THE CONCERT —

The Boston Gives Depth, Meaning To the 'Eroica'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently returned from a concert tour of European countries including five concerts in Russia, played a program Saturday night in Central High School hall. There was a capacity audience with 300 seated on the stage. The event was the opening of the regular series of Famous Artists, Murray Bernthal, executive.

The symphony was the Beethoven Third in E Flat Major — the "Eroica" — the work once dedicated by the master of Bonn to Napoleon Bonaparte, the dedication on the title page later erased. In the many performances by The Boston, through the years, the "Eroica" is regarded as symbolic of order, of power and of spirit.

Thus is was unfolded here under the astute musical guidance of Dr. Charles Munch. Delicate violin figurations and broken accents of sorrow with staccati, then chords, mighty chords, rich and bold, and lengthy respectively mark the first and second movements. The Scherzo, than which there is no more beautiful in instrumental literature, has phrasing rich and joyous, indeed. The fourth movement further delights, with plucked strings, the oboes dolce on crescendo, every bar stamped with vitality. It was both lyrical and dazzling music. The audience was most enthusiastic.

The opening selection was the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, with Dorothy Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist of the orchestra as soloist. Mrs. Dwyer is the first woman to have the principal chair of the flute section in a major U. S. orchestra. The Bach music under Dr. Munch and with Mrs. Dwyer's gifts quickly came into favor with the audience. It was a form of beauty which set the audience in a receptive mood.

Debussy's "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra No. 2) provided an excursion into the subleties of the composer whose visionary pageant of the streets and byways, the fragrance of the night and the morning of a festival day were iridescent to whatever extent the listener responded. Famous Artists has scheduled a concert by Byron Janis, pianist, in the school hall Nov. 13.

E. V. W.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

OCT 27 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Piston Fifth Introduced Here

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the third program in the Friday-Saturday series, at Symphony Hall: Mozart: "Paris" Symphony (K. 297); Walter Piston: Symphony No. 5 (first times in Boston); Beethoven: Lento assai, from the String Quartet in F major, Op. 135, played by the massed strings in memory of Leslie J. Rogers; Schumann: Fouth Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced here yesterday another very fine Symphony, the Fifth, by Walter Piston. The reason that we are hearing the Fifth for the first time a season later than the Sixth, is that No. 5 had been commissioned by the Juilliard School for a Festival which was postponed until last February.

In certain respects the Fifth Symphony is the most personal of all Piston's half-dozen, though it is a risky statement to make upon early acquaintance with a score which is going to take some time to know well. Harmonically, it is bold, astringent and of the day. In the orchestration, which is most original in many pages and a little Debussyan in others, the Symphony is distinguished. The first two movements contain several interludes of solo effects against subdued background, a device as old as concerted music, but in this generation exploited in the same way, to my knowledge, only by Shostakovitch. The finale suggests a fast march with syncopation, rondo manner.

The foregoing observations deal with the form and outward aspect. It is harder to describe the "interior" of the music, which is where the personal element resides. But indeed you do perceive it, in the serious but not heavy or emotionally disturbed pages of the first two movements. Though the music speaks out boldly, as often as it is hushed, there is an inescapable sense of meditative feeling here. Piston has never been a man to wring your withers —or his, either—in public. Yet emotional communication is plain enough. This is no music of intellectual abstraction, thank Heaven!

The Fifth Symphony will be played again, as indeed it must. But the Boston Symphony and RCA-Victor will do many of us a service if they will record it, along with Mr. Piston's Sixth. That would be a good way to get thoroughly acquainted with it. Yesterday's performance sounded very eloquent, indeed, and brought the composer, who was present, a gratifying reception from the Friday subscribers.

Leslie J. Rogers, who had been the Orchestra's senior member and its extremely able librarian, did not return from the European tour, having died in Stuttgart Oct. 11. It was most fiting that the slow movement of Beethoven's last string quartet, a nobly meditative music, be played in his memory. Just before it began, in the second half of the program, Mr. Munch bade the ochestra, though not the audience, rise and stand in silence. It was a beautiful performance, and luckily went un-marred by ill-timed applause.

In Schumann's ageless D minor Symphony, Mr. Munch and the orchestra were at their best, if you overlook just a few chordal attacks not precisely on the nose—or rather, the note. The performance was correct in style, it "sang," was rhythmically buoyant and poetically eloquent. Mozart's bubbling "Paris" Symphony had been done as well.

Next week Mr. Munch will present Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture; the C minor Piano Concerto of Beethoven, with Clara Haskil making her Boston debut as soloist; "Medea's Meditation and Death of Vengeance," new to Boston, by Samuel Barber, and Turina's Sinfonia sevillana, likewise new here.

144

Monitor

Piston Symphony in Boston Première

Composer's Fifth Conducted by Munch

By Harold Rogers

Walter Piston has consistently proved, by the high standard of excellence he has maintained during the composition of six symphonies, that he is America's leading symphonist. Reticent and almost retiring, this New Englander apparently conserves his energies for the vigorous and glorious sunbursts of sound one hears in his music.

Those glorious sunbursts heightened many of the climaxes yesterday afternoon when Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony had its first Boston performance. Charles Munch saw to it that not one ounce of glory was wasted.

This symphony has come to Boston out of numerical order. Mr. Piston composed it on commission for the Juilliard School of Music, and it had its première last February when Jean Morel conducted the Juilliard Orchestra. Mr. Piston's Sixth, listeners will recall, was composed for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given its première here last November, and was played during the orchestra's recent European tour.

★ ★ ★

The Lento opening of the first movement in the Fifth Symphony is something of a nocturne, cast in a hardy style of American impressionism, a songful, yearning flute carrying the major melody. A mounting tension lifts this mood into a vivid climax, from which a horn fanfare, Allegro con spirito, introduces an agitated interplay of themal elements.

The interplay subsides into a portentous passage, after which the instruments engage once more in a fugato-like play. This part is marked by some effective splashes of brass. The movement then returns to the Lento nocturne of its beginning, with the flute and its lonely yearning.

The entire symphony is characterized by Mr. Piston's superb craftsmanship, his masterful handling of form. There is a fine sense of structure in the prevailingly somber Adagio — a theme with three "transformations," as Mr. Piston calls them, each variation growing out of the one preceding. The listener may tend to lose his way somewhat during these transformations, but there is much to excite the ear, especially the gorgeously dissonant climax.

★ ★ ★

The final Allegro lieto is marked by an abundance of hearty American joy. Here Mr. Piston employs a thematic bit, vigorously syncopated, that swings along its dancing way. Though it is generally bright and brassy, it is sometimes softened by a jovial use of the harps. The whole winds up in a good affirmative statement with a few exclamation points.

The listeners then did some exclaiming on their own—sedately, of course, this being the Friday afternoon audience—and their applause was especially hearty when Mr. Piston congratulated Mr. Munch, the orchestra, and took a few bows himself.

Mr. Munch conducted the string choir in the Lento assai, cantante e tranquillo, from Beethoven's String Quartet in F major, Op. 135, as an expression of deep appreciation for the late Leslie Judson Rogers, who for 44 years was the orchestra's faithful librarian.

Yesterday's concert opened with a pleasant traversal of Mozart's guileless little "Paris" Symphony and closed with the Schumann Fourth to which Mr. Munch gave one of his dramatically brilliant readings, the kind that leads a listener into believing that it is a more interesting symphony than it really is.

Grace Hunter's Recital

Grace Hunter, lirico-spinto soprano and vocal teacher at the Boston Conservatory of Music, will give a song recital on Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the Conservatory Auditorium, 31 Hemenway Street. Her program will include songs by Brahms, Debussy, a group by modern Italian composers, selections from a song cycle by Herbert Fromm, and songs by Samuel Barber.

This concert is open to the public without charge.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 874,544

OCT 28 1956

Like 'Bunny Hug' and 'Charleston'

Rock 'n' Roll O.K.! Just a Phase—Fiedler

By HY HURWITZ

Go ahead with your rock 'n' roll music.

There's nothing wrong with it, claims Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, and one of the foremost musical authorities in the world.

Fiedler endorsed the current craze of the Elvis Presley flock at a recent P. T. A. meeting in Brookline's Runkle School, where his two daughters are students.

★ ★ ★

Just back from a European vacation, Mr. Fiedler made a rare appearance as a speaker. He conducted a question and answer period and a male parent raised the query of rock 'n' roll.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Rock 'n' Roll just a phase.

Had Mr. Fiedler heard the latest popular teen age music

"Heard it?" Mr. Fiedler repeated the query, "why I can't get away from it. But I don't see anything wrong with it. It's a phase we're going through, just like we have in the past. It's like the 'Bunny Hug' and the 'Charleston.'

"A few years after World War I we had the "Yes We Have No Bananas' phase. That was highly criticized at the time. These phases have come and gone for a long time."

It is Mr. Fiedler's feeling that musical snobs are the ones who raise the most objections. "Music belongs to everyone," he said. "I detest snobishness in music as in all other things."

★ ★ ★

On his recent European holiday with his wife, Mr. Fiedler made some interesting observations.

"I found a lot of American jazz being played over there," he reported. "Not the new rock 'n' roll stuff but a lot of jazz that's been popular in our country for years.

"Opera is still a big hit in European countries like Italy, Austria and Germany. In some cities, they have operas every night in the week not only in one opera house but in two. And they play before packed audiences."

In this country, Mr. Fiedler pointed out, there is a diminishing number of good string musicians. There are many more youngsters going in for music than in the past but string music seems to be dying out.

"School musical programs have been very valuable and educational," he said, "but a lot of youngsters go in for brass and drums to make their school or college bands so they can get seats on the 50-yard line for football. A good string musician is getting rare.

"I believe in encouraging youngsters who show an interest in music. But like anything else, parents shouldn't force a youngster in taking up a musical instrument. If a child shows an interest in music, by all means, encourage it. The only suggestion I'd make would be to permit them to develop variety in music and not go all out on either classical or popular."

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD
Circ. D. 89,399 - S. 101,254
OCT 14 1956

Boston Symphony Plays In Syracuse Saturday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just returned from a tour of Europe going eastward as far as Moscow, will present a concert at 8:30 p.m. Saturday in Lincoln auditorium, sponsored by Famous Artists Series.

With Charles Munch as music director, the orchestra will play Suite No. 2 in B Minor, by Bach; Iberia, by Debussy; and Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," by Beethoven.

Munch, a native of Strasbourg, came with this orchestra in the autumn of 1949. He was known as one of the foremost musicians of France, and had been the conductor of four orchestras in Paris.

Charles Munch

Boston Symphony is one of the busiest orchestras in the world. The winter season of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home, ends with April, and then begins, under Arthur Fiedler, the Pops season of some 60 concerts. There follow two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, and the six-week (July and early August) Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. In 1952 the orchestra toured Europe, and in 1954 went westward as far as San Francisco. This fall the orchestra was the first American orchestra ever to play in the U.S.S.R.

AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON (CONCERTS

TV NOTEBOOK

How to Televise Music

By MARY CREMMEN

The gratifying telecast of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Kresge Auditorium can be traced directly to producer Jordan Whitelaw, music manager of station WGBH.

★ ★ ★

It was clear that he had no intention of allowing video to distract from the music.

"Picture or no Picture," stated Whitelaw in an interview before the telecast. "It's essentially a concert."

He spoke against having frequent shots of the whole orchestra. "Once or twice is enough—but trying to fit 102 people into a 21-inch screen looks like an animated cartoon."

The program included Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; Debussy, Iberia No. 2 and Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor.

It was interesting to note how Whitelaw held to his plan of using a television camera "as a discreet guide to whatever part of the orchestra is most important at a given time."

He quickly added, "This does not mean keeping the camera on the move, which would be too distracting from the music. But when an instrument or a whole section of instruments has an extended passage, I have the camera trained in that direction. I don't hesitate to let the lenses rest for a long time in the same position."

This was clearly proved during Bach Suite No. 2, as he kept the camera on flute soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

★ ★ ★

In contrast to the way commercial television continually tries for trick shots when covering an orchestra, Whitelaw declared:

"In a close-up of the soloist, I insist that the picture show the whole figure." He went on sternly, "I refuse to have a disembodied player—that is, a close-up of hands and no body or a face as if it had been cut off at the neck. A screen filled with only fingers trilling over a flute is nauseating."

★ ★ ★

The telecast was all the more remarkable since there had been no time for rehearsal.

Whitelaw had to plan his camera moves in advance by listening to recordings of the selections in the program and following the scores.

"I tried to plan logical shots in terms of what was happening in the music." He added. "After that I just hoped it would make sense."

★ ★ ★

Agnes Moorehead's expert handling of the role of an illiterate backwoods woman probably gave "The Teacher" more importance than it deserved.

It was a familiar story of a mother who desperately wanted to learn to read so that she could find out for herself what was in her son's letter.

The intriguing part of the show was Miss Moorehead's delivery of such lines as: "I'm a pure play-sake and that's what I am . . . and "Stay out of what ain't none of your never mind."

Gl ke
OCT 31, 1956

Piston Symphony in Boston Première

Composer's Fifth Conducted by Munch

By Harold Rogers

Walter Piston has consistently proved, by the high standard of excellence he has maintained during the composition of six symphonies, that he is America's leading symphonist. Reticent and almost retiring, this New Englander apparently conserves his energies for the vigorous and glorious sunbursts of sound one hears in his music.

Those glorious sunbursts heightened many of the climaxes yesterday afternoon when Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony had its first Boston performance. Charles Munch saw to it that not one ounce of glory was wasted.

This symphony has come to Boston out of numerical order. Mr. Piston composed it on commission for the Juilliard School of Music, and it had its première last February when Jean Morel conducted the Juilliard Orchestra. Mr. Piston's Sixth, listeners will recall, was composed for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given its première here last November, and was played during the orchestra's recent European tour.

★ ★ ★

The Lento opening of the first movement in the Fifth Symphony is something of a nocturne, cast in a hardy style of American impressionism, a songful, yearning flute carrying the major melody. A mounting tension lifts this mood into a vivid climax, from which a horn fanfare, Allegro con spirito, introduces an agitated interplay of themal elements.

The interplay subsides into a portentous passage, after which the instruments engage once more in a fugato-like play. This part is marked by some effective splashes of brass. The movement then returns to the Lento nocturne of its beginning, with the flute and its lonely yearning.

The entire symphony is characterized by Mr. Piston's superb craftsmanship, his masterful handling of form. There is a fine sense of structure in the prevailingly somber Adagio — a theme with three "transformations," as Mr. Piston calls them, each variation growing out of the one preceding. The listener may tend to lose his way somewhat during these transformations, but there is much to excite the ear, especially the gorgeously dissonant climax.

★ ★ ★

The final Allegro lieto is marked by an abundance of hearty American joy. Here Mr. Piston employs a thematic bit, vigorously syncopated, that swings along its dancing way. Though it is generally bright and brassy, it is sometimes softened by a jovial use of the harps. The whole winds up in a good affirmative statement with a few exclamation points.

The listeners then did some exclaiming on their own—sedately, of course, this being the Friday afternoon audience—and their applause was especially hearty when Mr. Piston congratulated Mr. Munch, the orchestra, and took a few bows himself.

Mr. Munch conducted the string choir in the Lento assai, cantante e tranquillo, from Beethoven's String Quartet in F major, Op. 135, as an expression of deep appreciation for the late Leslie Judson Rogers, who for 44 years was the orchestra's faithful librarian.

Yesterday's concert opened with a pleasant traversal of Mozart's guileless little "Paris" Symphony and closed with the Schumann Fourth to which Mr. Munch gave one of his dramatically brilliant readings, the kind that leads a listener into believing that it is a more interesting symphony than it really is.

Grace Hunter's Recital

Grace Hunter, lirico-spinto soprano and vocal teacher at the Boston Conservatory of Music, will give a song recital on Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the Conservatory Auditorium, 31 Hemenway Street. Her program will include songs by Brahms, Debussy, a group by modern Italian composers, selections from a song cycle by Herbert Fromm, and songs by Samuel Barber.

This concert is open to the public without charge.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2072, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

OCT 28 1956

Like 'Bunny Hug' and 'Charleston'

Rock 'n' Roll O.K.! Just a Phase—Fiedler

By HY HURWITZ

Go ahead with your rock 'n' roll music.

There's nothing wrong with it, claims Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, and one of the foremost musical authorities in the world.

Fiedler endorsed the current craze of the Elvis Presley flock at a recent P. T. A. meeting in Brookline's Runkle School, where his two daughters are students.

★ ★ ★

Just back from a European vacation, Mr. Fiedler made a rare appearance as a speaker. He conducted a question and answer period and a male parent raised the query of rock 'n' roll.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Rock 'n' Roll just a phase.

Had Mr. Fiedler heard the latest popular teen age music

"Heard it?" Mr. Fiedler repeated the query, "why I can't get away from it. But I don't see anything wrong with it. It's a phase we're going through, just like we have in the past. It's like the 'Bunny Hug' and the 'Charleston.'

"A few years after World War I we had the "Yes We Have No Bananas' phase. That was highly criticized at the time. These phases have come and gone for a long time."

It is Mr. Fiedler's feeling that musical snobs are the ones who raise the most objections. "Music belongs to everyone," he said. "I detest snobishness in music as in all other things."

★ ★ ★

On his recent European holiday with his wife, Mr. Fiedler made some interesting observations.

"I found a lot of American jazz being played over there," he reported. "Not the new rock 'n' roll stuff but a lot of jazz that's been popular in our country for years.

"Opera is still a big hit in European countries like Italy, Austria and Germany. In some cities, they have operas every night in the week not only in one opera house but in two. And they play before packed audiences."

In this country, Mr. Fiedler pointed out, there is a diminishing number of good string musicians. There are many more youngsters going in for music than in the past but string music seems to be dying out.

"School musical programs have been very valuable and educational," he said, "but a lot of youngsters go in for brass and drums to make their school or college bands so they can get seats on the 50-yard line for football. A good string musician is getting rare.

"I believe in encouraging youngsters who show an interest in music. But like anything else, parents shouldn't force a youngster in taking up a musical instrument. If a child shows an interest in music, by all means, encourage it. The only suggestion I'd make would be to permit them to develop variety in music and not go all out on either classical or popular."

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD
Circ. D. 89,399 - S. 101,254

OCT 14 1956

Boston Symphony Plays In Syracuse Saturday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just returned from a tour of Europe going eastward as far as Moscow, will present a concert at 8:30 p.m. Saturday in Lincoln auditorium, sponsored by Famous Artists Series.

With Charles Munch as music director, the orchestra will play Suite No. 2 in B Minor, by Bach; Iberia, by Debussy; and Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," by Beethoven.

Munch, a native of Strasbourg, came with this orchestra in the autumn of 1949. He was known as one of the foremost musicians of France, and had been the conductor of four orchestras in Paris.

Boston Symphony is one of the busiest orchestras in the world. The winter season of 30 weeks in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's Boston home, ends with April, and then begins, under Arthur Fiedler, the Pops season of some 60 concerts. There follow two weeks of free open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, and the six-week (July and early August) Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. In 1952 the orchestra toured Europe, and in 1953 went westward as far as San Francisco. This fall the orchestra was the first American orchestra ever to play in the U.S.S.R.

Charles Munch

AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON (CONCERT

TV NOTEBOOK

How to Televise Music

By MARY CREMMEN

The gratifying telecast of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Kresge Auditorium can be traced directly to producer Jordan Whitelaw, music manager of station WGBH.

★ ★ ★

It was clear that he had no intention of allowing video to distract from the music.

"Picture or no Picture," stated Whitelaw in an interview before the telecast. "It's essentially a concert."

He spoke against having frequent shots of the whole orchestra. "Once or twice is enough—but trying to fit 102 people into a 21-inch screen looks like an animated cartoon."

The program included Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; Debussy, Iberia No. 2 and Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor.

It was interesting to note how Whitelaw held to his plan of using a television camera "as a discreet guide to whatever part of the orchestra is most important at a given time."

He quickly added, "This does not mean keeping the camera on the move, which would be too distracting from the music. But when an instrument or a whole section of instruments has an extended passage, I have the camera trained in that direction. I don't hesitate to let the lenses rest for a long time in the same position."

This was clearly proved during Bach Suite No. 2, as he kept the camera on flute soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

★ ★ ★

In contrast to the way commercial television continually tries for trick shots when covering an orchestra, Whitelaw declared:

"In a close-up of the soloist, I insist that the picture show the whole figure." He went on sternly, "I refuse to have a disembodied player — that is, a [illegible] of hands and no body or a [illegible] it had been cut off at the neck. A screen filled with only fingers trilling over a flute is nauseating."

★ ★ ★

The telecast was all the more remarkable since there had been no time for rehearsal

Whitelaw had to plan his camera moves in advance by [illegible] recordings of the selections [illegible] program and follow [illegible]

"I tried to plan [illegible] terms of what was happening in the music." He added [illegible] I just hoped it would [illegible]

★ ★ ★

Agnes Moorehead's [illegible] handling of the role of an [illegible] backwoods woman [illegible] "The Teacher" [illegible] than it deserved

It was a family [illegible] of a mother who desper[illegible] learn to read so [illegible] find out for herself [illegible] her son's letter

The intriguing part [illegible] was Miss Moorehead [illegible] such lines as: "I'm a [illegible] and that's what I [illegible] out of what ain't [illegible] never mind."

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BO

Boston Symphony in Video

Charles Munch on Podium For Telecast in Cambridge

By Harold Rogers

It will be a long time—if ever—before a televised symphony concert will be the aesthetic equal of symphonic music heard in the hall. Visually, however, there are certain gains.

These gains, which consist mainly of close-up views of the conductor and the instrumentalists, were noted last night when a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was simulcast over WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM. It was the opening concert of the season in the Cambridge series, usually held in Sanders Theater. This one took place in the MIT Kresge Auditorium. The availability of Sanders Theater had been uncertain, owing to the recent fire. It was ready in time for last night's concert, but the plans to use Kresge Auditorium had crystallized.

This had its fortunate aspects, since WGBH-TV is a next-door neighbor to Kresge. The telecasting was done by two cameras, one located in the loft to the left of the audience, the other in the projection booth at the rear of the hall. As Parker Wheatley explained in his suave announcements, the telecast was handled on an impromptu basis — without a prearranged plan for the cameras. The producer, Jordan Whitelaw, followed the orchestral scores and directed the cameras accordingly.

It is to his credit that the viewer was generally looking at the strings, the brasses, or the woodwinds when these choirs were in action, and there was one deft shot that caught the double-basses in a tricky passage. There were some excellent views of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the orchestra's first flutist, as she handled the solos in the opening item — Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings.

The most compelling views were those of Charles Munch, and here television can offer much that can be observed in the hall only by those who sit close to the stage or in the front balconies. The closeups of Dr. Munch's face, serene or intense as the music dictated, were an aesthetic experience in themselves. His remarkable baton technique, too, provided fascinating sequences. His technique has greatly matured since he came to Boston seven years ago.

Dr. Munch continued the program with an exciting reading of Debussy's "Ibéria." The sound systems in the general run of television receivers will have to be greatly improved before music on television will amount to much. Manufacturers have been skimping with the sound, a matter of no great importance at present since most video programs deal with the spoken word.

Last night, however, viewers who also had an FM receiver and a high-fidelity system could bring in the sound through FM and use their TV sets only for sight. This was my solution, and the results were excellent.

Dr. Munch concluded with an impassioned reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique." The most unsuccessful views were those of the full orchestra. There are too many men on stage to be crowded into a 21-inch screen; their actions were accordingly indistinct and somewhat meaningless.

This is the Boston Symphony's second simulcast of a complete concert, the first having been held a year ago in the same auditorium. It is to be hoped that experimentation along these lines will continue more often. There may have been thousands of observers last night who had never seen the Boston Symphony in action. Music on television, even at this imperfect level, is an effective way of extending the Boston Symphony's cultural influence in the community.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COMMERCE, TEX.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 2,860 - S. 2,860
OCT 11 1956

Outstanding Musicians On Community Concerts

Artists who will appear on the programs for the Area Community concerts series at Greenville Municipal Auditorium have been announced, according to Arthur West, local chairman.

Three outstanding programs have been arranged. On Oct. 23, at 8 p. m., Yi-Kwei Sze, Chinese baritone will be presented.

On January 10, 1957, Robert Rudie, sensational entertaining violinist has been scheduled. Mr. Rudie is an artist with the violin, contrasts sounds of Stradivarius, Guadagnini and modern violins in encores. He was twice soloist at Casals Festival of Spain.

The third and climax of the year will be the appearance on Feb. 9, 1957 of Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra, with Ruth Slenczynska, piano soloist.

Reciprocity dates of concerts ticket holders may attend in neighboring towns are the following:

October 16, Edwin Steffe, baritone, Denison.

October 29, Rey & Gomez, dancers, Durant, Okla.

October 30, Rey & Gomez, dancers, Paris.

November 15, Oklahoma City Concert orchestra, Sherman.

November 29, Vera Franceschi, pianist, Paris.

December 2, Van Cleburn, pianist, Durant, 3:00 p. m.

January 14, Ray Dudley, pianist, Denison.

February 1, Mildred Dilling, harpist, Paris.

February 4, Frances Bible, soprano, Durant.

February 5, Svetlova, dancer, Sherman.

March 12, Vienna Academy Chorus, Paris.

March 13, Vienna Academy Chorus, Durant.

April 11, Richard Cass, pianist, Sherman.

May 4, St. Louis Sinfonietta, Denison.

Mr. West states that more than 200 tickets have been sold in Commerce, and for the entire association the membership is the best in its 13-year history.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4204
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 31 1956

Boston Symphony in Video

Charles Munch on Podium For Telecast in Cambridge

By Harold Rogers

It will be a long time—if ever—before a televised symphony concert will be the aesthetic equal of symphonic music heard in the hall. Visually, however, there are certain gains.

These gains, which consist mainly of close-up views of the conductor and the instrumentalists, were noted last night when a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was simulcast over WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM. It was the opening concert of the season in the Cambridge series, usually held in Sanders Theater. This one took place in the MIT Kresge Auditorium. The availability of Sanders Theater had been uncertain, owing to the recent fire. It was ready in time for last night's concert, but the plans to use Kresge Auditorium had crystallized.

This had its fortunate aspects, since WGBH-TV is a next-door neighbor to Kresge. The telecasting was done by two cameras, one located in the loft to the left of the audience, the other in the projection booth at the rear of the hall. As Parker Wheatley explained in his suave announcements, the telecast was handled on an impromptu basis — without a prearranged plan for the cameras. The producer, Jordan Whitelaw, followed the orchestral scores and directed the cameras accordingly.

It is to his credit that the viewer was generally looking at the strings, the brasses, or the woodwinds when these choirs were in action, and there was one deft shot that caught the double-basses in a tricky passage. There were some excellent views of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the orchestra's first flutist, as she handled the solos in the opening item — Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings.

The most compelling views were those of Charles Munch, and here television can offer much that can be observed in the hall only by those who sit close to the stage or in the front balconies. The closeups of Dr. Munch's face, serene or intense as the music dictated, were an aesthetic experience in themselves. His remarkable baton technique, too, provided fascinating sequences. His technique has greatly matured since he came to Boston seven years ago.

Dr. Munch continued the program with an exciting reading of Debussy's "Ibéria." The sound systems in the general run of television receivers will have to be greatly improved before music on television will amount to much. Manufacturers have been skimping with the sound, a matter of no great importance at present since most video programs deal with the spoken word.

Last night, however, viewers who also had an FM receiver and a high-fidelity system could bring in the sound through FM and use their TV sets only for sight. This was my solution, and the results were excellent.

Dr. Munch concluded with an impassioned reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique." The most unsuccessful views were those of the full orchestra. There are too many men on stage to be crowded into a 21-inch screen; their actions were accordingly indistinct and somewhat meaningless.

This is the Boston Symphony's second simulcast of a complete concert, the first having been held a year ago in the same auditorium. It is to be hoped that experimentation along these lines will continue more often. There may have been thousands of observers last night who had never seen the Boston Symphony in action. Music on television, even at this imperfect level, is an effective way of extending the Boston Symphony's cultural influence in the community.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 31 1956

the devil's advocate

By Mason Sargent

Voices: Victor is responsible for two unusually eloquent opera recordings, of which one, La Traviata, is also opulently [illegible] edition of [illegible] came the story. [illegible] Italian-English [illegible] sung by Rosanna [illegible]ti, and Leonard Monteux conducting [illegible] orchestra

The extraordinary Monteux, who first participated [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] and, in some re[illegible] the last recorded performances of that [illegible] opera in another Victor set with Victoria de los Angeles, [illegible] Danco and the Chorus and [illegible] Theater National de l'Opéra-Comique. Complete French-English libretto (Victor LM-[illegible]). [illegible] the title of a brilliant series of [illegible] made in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's acoustically [illegible] new buildings, Kresge Auditorium and the chapel. [illegible] engineer in charge [illegible] Bartolf, who also mastered the recordings. And most important, the performances and the compositions are of equal quality.

[illegible] LPs, [illegible] the Unicorn label, are [illegible] brass ensemble from the Boston Symphony in The Modern Age of Brass—works by Dahl, Hindemith, Berezowski, and Sanders (1091); four [illegible] for organ and orchestra with organist Lawrence Moe and MIT Prof. Klaus Liepmann conducting the orchestra (1092), and the [illegible]-born pianist-composer and conductor Ernst [illegible], in a probing interpretation of Beethoven's deeply challenging and revealing late piano sonatas [illegible] and Op. 110 (1033). If you [illegible] have the label, Unicorn [illegible] St., Boston.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BO

Boston Symphony in Video

Charles Munch on Podium For Telecast in Cambridge

By Harold Rogers

It will be a long time—if ever—before a televised symphony concert will be the aesthetic equal of symphonic music heard in the hall. Visually, however, there are certain gains.

These gains, which consist mainly of close-up views of the conductor and the instrumentalists, were noted last night when a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was simulcast over WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM. It was the opening concert of the season in the Cambridge series, usually held in Sanders Theater. This one took place in the MIT Kresge Auditorium. The availability of Sanders Theater had been uncertain, owing to the recent fire. It was ready in time for last night's concert, but the plans to use Kresge Auditorium had crystallized.

This had its fortunate aspects, since WGBH-TV is a next-door neighbor to Kresge. The telecasting was done by two cameras, one located in the loft to the left of the audience, the other in the projection booth at the rear of the hall. As Parker Wheatley explained in his suave announcements, the telecast was handled on an impromptu basis — without a prearranged plan for the cameras. The producer, Jordan Whitelaw, followed the orchestral scores and directed the cameras accordingly.

* * *

It is to his credit that the viewer was generally looking at the strings, the brasses, or the woodwinds when these choirs were in action, and there was one deft shot that caught the double-basses in a tricky passage. There were some excellent views of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the orchestra's first flutist, as she handled the solos in the opening item — Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings.

The most compelling views were those of Charles Munch, and here television can offer much that can be observed in the hall only by those who sit close to the stage or in the front balconies. The closeups of Dr. Munch's face, serene or intense as the music dictated, were an aesthetic experience in themselves. His remarkable baton technique, too, provided fascinating sequences. His technique has greatly matured since he came to Boston seven years ago.

Dr. Munch continued the program with an exciting reading of Debussy's "Ibéria." The sound systems in the general run of television receivers will have to be greatly improved before music on television will amount to much. Manufacturers have been skimping with the sound, a matter of no great importance at present since most video programs deal with the spoken word.

* * *

Last night, however, viewers who also had an FM receiver and a high-fidelity system could bring in the sound through FM and use their TV sets only for sight. This was my solution, and the results were excellent.

Dr. Munch concluded with an impassioned reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique." The most unsuccessful views were those of the full orchestra. There are too many men on stage to be crowded into a 21-inch screen; their actions were accordingly indistinct and somewhat meaningless.

This is the Boston Symphony's second simulcast of a complete concert, the first having been held a year ago in the same auditorium. It is to be hoped that experimentation along these lines will continue more often. There may have been thousands of observers last night who had never seen the Boston Symphony in action. Music on television, even at this imperfect level, is an effective way of extending the Boston Symphony's cultural influence in the community.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COMMERCE, TEX.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 2,860 - S. 2,860
OCT 11 1956

Outstanding Musicians On Community Concerts

Artists who will appear on the programs for the Area Community concerts series at Greenville Municipal Auditorium have been announced, according to Arthur [illegible], local chairman.

[illegible] outstanding programs have been arranged. On Oct. 23, [illegible] Yi-Kwei Sze, Chinese [illegible] will be presented.

[illegible] January 10, 1957, Robert [illegible] occasional entertaining [illegible] been scheduled. Mr. [illegible] artist with the violin, [illegible] sounds of Stradivarius, Paganini and modern violin in encores. He was twice [illegible] Cassals Festival of [illegible].

The third and climax of the [illegible] will be the appearance on Feb. 9, 1957, of Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Tour [illegible] Ruth Slenczynska, pianist.

[illegible] dates of concerts [illegible] may attend in [illegible] are the following:

October 16, Erwin Steffe, baritone, Denison.

October 29, Rey & Gomez, dancers, Durant, Okla.

October 30, Rey & Gomez, dancers, Paris.

November 15, Oklahoma City Concert orchestra, Sherman.

November 29, Vera Franceschi, pianist, Paris.

December 2, Van Cleburn, pianist, Durant, 3:00 p. m.

January 14, Ray Dudley, pianist, Denison.

February 1, Mildred Dilling, harpist, Paris.

February 4, Frances Bible, soprano, Durant.

February 5, Svetlova, dancer, Sherman.

March 12, Vienna Academy Chorus, Paris.

March 13, Vienna Academy Chorus, Durant.

April 11, Richard Cass, pianist, Sherman.

May 4, St. Louis Sinfonietta, Denison.

Mr. West states that more than 200 tickets have been sold in Commerce, and for the entire association the membership is the best in its 13-year history.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4206
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
OCT 31 1956

Boston Symphony in Video

Charles Munch on Podium For Telecast in Cambridge

By Harold Rogers

It will be a long time—if ever—before a televised symphony concert will be the aesthetic equal of symphonic music heard in the hall. Visually, however, there are certain gains.

These gains, which consist mainly of close-up views of the conductor and the instrumentalists, were noted last night when a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was simulcast over WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM. It was the opening concert of the season in the Cambridge series, usually held in Sanders Theater. This one took place in the MIT Kresge Auditorium. The availability of Sanders Theater had been uncertain, owing to the recent fire. It was ready in time for last night's concert, but the plans to use Kresge Auditorium had crystallized.

This had its fortunate aspects, since WGBH-TV is a next-door neighbor to Kresge. The telecasting was done by two cameras, one located in the loft to the left of the audience, the other in the projection booth at the rear of the hall. As Parker Wheatley explained in his suave announcements, the telecast was handled on an impromptu basis — without a prearranged plan for the cameras. The producer, Jordan Whitelaw, followed the orchestral scores and directed the cameras accordingly.

* * *

It is to his credit that the viewer was generally looking at the strings, the brasses, or the woodwinds when these choirs were in action, and there was one deft shot that caught the double-basses in a tricky passage. There were some excellent views of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the orchestra's first flutist, as she handled the solos in the opening item — Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings.

The most compelling views were those of Charles Munch, and here television can offer much that can be observed in the hall only by those who sit close to the stage or in the front balconies. The closeups of Dr. Munch's face, serene or intense as the music dictated, were an aesthetic experience in themselves. His remarkable baton technique, too, provided fascinating sequences. His technique has greatly matured since he came to Boston seven years ago.

Dr. Munch continued the program with an exciting reading of Debussy's "Ibéria." The sound systems in the general run of television receivers will have to be greatly improved before music on television will amount to much. Manufacturers have been skimping with the sound, a matter of no great importance at present since most video programs deal with the spoken word.

* * *

Last night, however, viewers who also had an FM receiver and a high-fidelity system could bring in the sound through FM and use their TV sets only for sight. This was my solution, and the results were excellent.

Dr. Munch concluded with an impassioned reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique." The most unsuccessful views were those of the full orchestra. There are too many men on stage to be crowded into a 21-inch screen; their actions were accordingly indistinct and somewhat meaningless.

This is the Boston Symphony's second simulcast of a complete concert, the first having been held a year ago in the same auditorium. It is to be hoped that experimentation along these lines will continue more often. There may have been thousands of observers last night who had never seen the Boston Symphony in action. Music on television, even at this imperfect level, is an effective way of extending the Boston Symphony's cultural influence in the community.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 31 1956

the devil's advocate

By Mason Sargent

Voices: Victor is responsible for two unusually eloquent opera recordings, of which one, La Traviata, is also opulently [illegible] dsome edition of [illegible] came the story. [illegible] e Italian-English [illegible] sung by Rosanna [illegible] etti, and Leonard [illegible] Monteux conducting [illegible] House orchestra [illegible]

The extraordinary Monteux, who first participated in a [illegible] of [illegible] and, in some respects, the best recorded performances of the [illegible] opera in another Victor set with Victoria de los Angeles, Henri Legay, Michel Dens, and the chorus and orchestra of the Theater National de l'Opéra-Comique. Complete French-English libretto (Victor LM-[illegible]).

Music at MIT is the title of a brilliant series of recordings made in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's acoustically [illegible] new buildings, Kresge auditorium and the chapel. [illegible] engineer in charge [illegible] Bartol, who also mastered the recordings. And most [illegible] the performance and the compositions are of equal quality.

The LPs, on the Unicorn label, are [illegible] brass ensemble from the Boston Symphony in The Modern Age of Brass—works by Dahl, Hindemith, Berezowski, and Sanders (1031); four Han[illegible]os for organ and orchestra with organist Lawrence Moe and MIT Prof. Klaus Liepmmann conducting the orchestra (1032), and the Swiss-born pianist, composer and conductor Ernst Levy, in a probing interpretation of Beethoven's deeply challenging and revealing late piano sonatas [illegible] and Op. 110 (1033). If you [illegible] doesn't have the label, Unicorn [illegible] St., Boston.

TIGHT BINDING

146

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
Circ. D. 23,130
OCT 16 1956

Boston Symphony Soundly Applauded In USSR Visit

"The Russians applauded until the last musician had left the stage," says G. W. Rector concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Leningrad and Moscow last month.

Rector, former assistant to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society, is now assistant manager of the Boston musicians. He was graduated from the U-M School of Music.

"It was more than we had dared to expect," says Rector, who adds that there was some uncertainty as to just what reaction the Russians would give to the orchestra's performance.

It was the first American symphony orchestra to play in the Soviet Union.

Plays Encores

In response to the applause, the Boston Symphony did an unusual thing. It played encores in both cities.

Ann Arbor persons know that it is a rare event when the Boston Symphony Orchestra adds an encore to its evening performance.

The orchestra played in Ann Arbor last night, and following an appearance in Detroit tonight, will return to Ann Arbor for another concert here at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow in Hill Auditorium.

Two concerts were played in Leningrad and three in Moscow with Conductor Charles Munch sharing the podium with Pierre Monteux. It was part of a month-long European tour.

The concerts in Russia included Beethoven's "Eroica," Piston's Symphony No. 6, Ravel's "Daphnis," Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Creston's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony 102, Copland's "Ode," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Dukas' "L 'Apprenti."

The "Eroica" will be played in Ann Arbor tomorrow and Piston's Symphony No. 6 was played here last night.

Used 'Shuttle' System

Rector says that the group traveled to and from Russia by plane in a sort of "shuttle" system. Three Russian planes carried half the musicians from Helsinki to Leningrad and then returned to Helsinki for the other half. The same system was used from Moscow to Prague.

In Leningrad, the group was housed at the Hotel Europa and in Moscow at the Kremlin Hotel, one of Russia's newest hotels.

Rector said he found Russian hospitality "gratifying" and the Russian people "friendly."

Guided tours were planned for the musicians including a visit to the Kremlin and other famous Leningrad and Moscow landmarks.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366
OCT 17 1956

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SOLOIST

Doriot Anthony [illegible] will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of the B[illegible] Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings on the program the famous ensemble will give Thursday night in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium under the auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347
OCT 18 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Boston Symphony Orchestra Proves Again Its Right to the Claim of Greatness

Those of you who have experienced the thrill of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra under its present musical director, Charles Munch, know how valid is its claim to musical greatness. The orchestra proved again Monday night in Ann Arbor that it is, indeed, a great orchestra. And Mr. Munch displayed all his ability and charm that have earned him his reputation. The orchestra appeared on the Choral union series at Hill auditorium.

Mr. Munch proved, too, that he is a master of programming. His coupling of Von Weber, Piston and Tschaikowsky on a single program, raised some misgivings with us prior to the concert. But after hearing the performance we are convinced that the program had just the right touch of the modern and traditional.

Inclusion of the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" after a performance of Walter Piston's "Sixth Symphony" was a master stroke. For in much of the Tschaikowsky can be found the basis for portions of the Piston material. Perhaps "basis" is the wrong word. "Justification" might more accurately fill the bill.

For who can deny that Piston might eventually become a popular favorite when one realizes that, at one time, Tschaikowsky, himself, was looked upon as a musical radical and even today is criticized by the learned for his banality and lack of overall pattern? Yet the many beautiful melodies to be found in numerous Tschaikowsky works appeal to the common man and, in the end, the most candid musicians, not to be swayed by theories alone, will string along with the common man.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
Circ. D. 92,760
OCT 20 1956

Pretty Girl Got Bid for Famed Staid Orchestra

The 75-year-old Boston Symphony which opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at Veterans Memorial Thursday, 8:30 p. m., Oct. 18, has the reputation for being ultra-conservative, but four seasons ago an old precedent was broken in a big way. A pretty girl was appointed to the important job as first flutist.

Doriot Anthony (now Mrs. Thomas F. Dwyer) was one of dozens of applicants for the place. Charles Munch, the Orchestra's conductor, simply said she was the best of the lot, regardless of age or sex, and that was that. His opinion was concurred in by Georges Laurent, who had just retired after 30 years as the Boston Symphony's first flutist.

Miss Anthony was born in Streator, Ill. Her mother, an excellent player herself, was the first of her many teachers. After graduation from the Eastm[illegible]ol of Music, Rochester, N. Y., Miss Anthony played with the National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C., and the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

At Thursday evening's concert in the Veterans Memorial, Miss Anthony and her flute will be featured in Johann Sebastian Bach's B-minor Suite for Flute and Strings.

The Boston Symphony is fresh from a four-week European tour which included a long weekend in the USSR.

Highlights of Thursday's program in Columbus will be the Tchaikovwsky Pathetique Symphony. Tickets are at Heaton's.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Circ. D. 27,535 - S. 34,405
OCT 21 1956

Boston Symphony

[illegible]hestra Pictures Story Of Martyrdom Of Saint Sebastian

By BERENICE PARKER

Current in the diamond anniversary [illegible] recorded releases of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, is a moving interpretation of [illegible]bussy's "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," [illegible] album number LM-2030 on the RCA Victor Red [illegible] label.

Vocal portions of the new orthophonic high fidelity record are handled by Munch, as narrator; Florence Kopleff and Catherine Akos, contraltos; Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, of which Lorna Cooke de Varon is director.

In addition to profound feeling evident in the overall direction, Munch is impressive in the role of narrator also, even though the text is in French. He takes this part for the first time because of his special affection for the score, and this is the first time Victor has recorded this work. The recording took place in January at Boston's Symphony Hall.

Debussy's score was written as incidental music to the mystery play, "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien" by Gabriele D'Annunzio, and was first produced in Paris in 1911. It was necessary for both the composer and playwrite to defend their work against ecclesiastical criticism at first, but time has convinced the world at large of the [illegible] of the work and the [illegible] purpose of its authors.

CHARLES MUNCH
. . . symphony conductor

PAGAN TO CHRIST

The theme deals with the story of Sebastian's rejection of pagan gods for Christ, his execution and his [illegible] into heaven.

The work is in five parts. In the first, in the "Court of the Lilies" in a Roman palace, Sebastian, captain of the emperor's searchers, reveals his Christian faith and powers to two Christian brothers, Marc and Marcellian, chained there, and urges them to maintain their faith.

In the second, [illegible] breaks the seal of a [illegible] infidel images and the [illegible] the new faith enters and [illegible] the old. During the third [illegible] in the court of Caesar Augustus Sebastian renounces the [illegible]ity of the emperor and the [illegible] and is sentenced by Diocletian to be bound to a tree and [illegible] by the arrows of his men.

The execution occurs in the fourth scene, which takes place in a laurel grove. As the mourning archers bear away the body of their helpless companion, the arrows [illegible] from it and the drama progresses to the fifth scene, which is a transfiguring illumination of the whole forest in which the heavenly hosts [illegible] the martyr is received into heaven.

Throughout the first four scenes excerpts from the text are given by the narrator. In the fifth scene the action unfolds without spoken word. The album cover is illustrated with a reproduction of the painting of St. Sebastian by the 15th century Italian painter, Matteo di Giovanni. Album notes are by John N. Burk.

TIGHT BINDING

146

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
Circ. D. 23,130
OCT 16 1956

Boston Symphony Soundly Applauded In USSR Visit

"The Russians applauded until the last musician had left the stage," says G. W. Rector concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Leningrad and Moscow last month.

Rector, former assistant to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society, is now assistant manager of the Boston musicians. He was graduated from the U-M School of Music.

"It was more than we had dared to expect," says Rector, who adds that there was some uncertainty as to just what reaction the Russians would give to the orchestra's performance.

It was the first American symphony orchestra to play in the Soviet Union.

Plays Encores

In response to the applause, the Boston Symphony did an unusual thing. It played encores in both cities.

Ann Arbor persons know that it is a rare event when the Boston Symphony Orchestra adds an encore to its evening performance.

The orchestra played in Ann Arbor last night, and following an appearance in Detroit tonight, will return to Ann Arbor for another concert Sunday at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow in Hill Auditorium.

Two concerts were played in Leningrad and three in Moscow with Conductor Charles Munch sharing the podium with Pierre Monteux. It was part of a month-long European tour.

The concerts in Russia included Beethoven's "Eroica," Piston's Symphony No. 6, Ravel's "Daphnis," Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Creston's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony 102, Copland's "Ode," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Dukas' "L 'Apprenti."

The "Eroica" will be played in Ann Arbor tomorrow and Piston's Symphony No. 6 was played here last night.

Used "Shuttle" System

Rector says that the group traveled to and from Russia by plane in a sort of "shuttle" system. Three Russian planes carried half the musicians from Helsinki to Leningrad and then returned to Helsinki for the other half. The same system was used from Moscow to Prague.

In Leningrad the group was housed at the Hotel Europa and in Moscow at the Peking Hotel, one of Russia's newest hotels.

Rector said he found Russian hospitality "gratifying" and the Russian people "friendly."

Guided tours were planned for the musicians including a visit to the Kremlin and other famous Leningrad and Moscow landmarks.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366
OCT 17 1956

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SOLOIST

Doriot Anthony will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of the Bach Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings on the program the famous ensemble will give Thursday night in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium under the auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347
OCT 18 1956

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Boston Symphony Orchestra Proves Again Its Right to the Claim of Greatness

Those of you who have experienced the thrill of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra under its present musical director, Charles Munch, know how valid is its claim to musical greatness. The orchestra proved again Monday night in Ann Arbor that it is, indeed, a great orchestra. And Mr. Munch displayed all his ability and charm that have earned him his reputation. The orchestra appeared on the Choral union series at Hill auditorium.

Mr. Munch proved, too, that he is a master of programming. His coupling of Von Weber, Piston and Tschaikowsky on a single program, raised some misgivings with us prior to the concert. But after hearing the performance we are convinced that the program had just the right touch of the modern and traditional.

Inclusion of the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" after a performance of Walter Piston's "Sixth Symphony" was a master stroke. For in much of the Tschaikowsky can be found the basis for portions of the Piston material. Perhaps "basis" is the wrong word. "Justification" might more accurately fill the bill.

For who can deny that Piston might eventually become a popular favorite when one realizes that, at one time, Tschaikowsky, himself, was looked upon as a musical radical and even today is criticized by the learned for his banality and lack of overall pattern? Yet the many beautiful melodies to be found in numerous Tschaikowsky works appeal to the common man and, in the end, the most candid musicians, not to be swayed by theories alone, will string along with the common man.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
Circ. D. 92,760
OCT 20 1956

Pretty Girl Got Bid for Famed Staid Orchestra

The 75-year-old Boston Symphony which opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at Veterans Memorial Thursday, 8:30 p. m., Oct. 18, has the reputation for being ultra-conservative, but four seasons ago an old precedent was broken in a big way. A pretty girl was appointed to the important job as first flutist.

Doriot Anthony (now Mrs. Thomas F. Dwyer) was one of dozens of applicants for the place. Charles Munch, the Orchestra's conductor, simply said she was the best of the lot, regardless of age or sex, and that was that. His opinion was concurred in by Georges Laurent, who had just retired after 30 years as the Boston Symphony's first flutist.

Miss Anthony was born in Streator, Ill. Her mother, an excellent player herself, was the first of her many teachers. After graduation from the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., Miss Anthony played with the National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C., and the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

At Thursday evening's concert in the Veterans Memorial, Miss Anthony and her flute will be featured in Johann Sebastian Bach's B-minor Suite for Flute and Strings.

The Boston Symphony is fresh from a four-week European tour which included a long weekend in the USSR.

Highlights of Thursday's program in Columbus will be the Tchaikovwsky Pathetique Symphony. Tickets are at Heaton's.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Circ. D. 27,535 - S. 24,495
OCT 21 1956

Boston Symphony

hestra Picture Story Of Martyrdom Of Saint Sebastian

By BERENICE PARKER

Current in the diamond anniversary series of recorded releases of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Charles Munch, is a moving interpretation of Debussy's "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," album number LM-2030 on the RCA Victor Red Seal label.

Vocal portions of the new orthophonic high fidelity record are handled by Munch, as narrator; Florence Kopleff and Catherine Akos, contraltos; Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, of which Lorna Cooke de Varon is director.

In addition to profound feeling evident in the overall direction, Munch is impressive in the role of narrator also, even though the text is in French. He takes this part for the first time because of his special affection for the score, and this is the first time Victor has recorded this work. The recording took place in January at Boston's Symphony Hall.

Debussy's score was written as incidental music to the mystery play, "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien" by Gabriele D'Annunzio, and was first produced in Paris in 1911. It was necessary for both the composer and playwrite to defend their work against ecclesiastical criticism at first, but time has convinced the world at large of the merits of the work and the sincerity of purpose of its authors.

CHARLES MUNCH
... symphony conductor

PAGAN TO CHRISTIAN

The theme deals with the story of Sebastian's renouncing of pagan gods for Christ, his execution and his ascension into heaven.

The work is in five parts. In the first, in the "Court of the Lilies" in a Roman palace, Sebastian, captain of the emperor's searchers, reveals his Christian faith and powers to his Christian brothers, Marcellian, chained there, urges them to maintain their faith.

In the second, Sebastian breaks the seal of a temple of infidel images and the light of the new faith enters and dims the old. During the third, in the Court of Caesar, Sebastian renounces the divinity of the emperor and the gods and is sentenced by Diocletian to be bound to a tree and pierced by the arrows of his men.

The execution occurs in the fourth scene, which takes place in a laurel grove. The mourning archers bear the body of their beloved companion, the arrows have gone from it and the drama progresses to the fifth and last, a transfiguring illumination of the whole forest in which the heavenly hosts take the martyr is received into heaven.

Throughout the first four parts excerpts from the text are given by the narrator. In the fifth action unfolds without spoken word. The album cover is illustrated with a reproduction of the painting of St. Sebastian by the 15th century Italian painter, Matteo di Giovanni. Album notes are by John N. Burk.

TIGHT BINDING

146

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
Circ. D. 23,130
OCT 16 1956

Boston Symphony Soundly Applauded In USSR Visit

"The Russians applauded until the last musician had left the stage," says G. W. Rector concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Leningrad and Moscow last month.

Rector, former assistant to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society, is now assistant manager of the Boston musicians. He was graduated from the U-M School of Music.

"It was more than we had dared to expect," says Rector, who adds that there was some uncertainty as to just what reaction the Russians would give to the orchestra's performance.

It was the first American symphony orchestra to play in the Soviet Union.

Plays Encores

In response to the applause, the Boston Symphony did an unusual thing. It played encores in both cities.

Ann Arbor persons know that it is a rare event when the Boston Symphony Orchestra adds an encore to its evening performance.

The orchestra played in Ann Arbor last night, and following an appearance in Detroit tonight, will return to Ann Arbor for another concert here at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow in Hill Auditorium.

Two concerts were played in Leningrad and three in Moscow with Conductor Charles Munch sharing the podium with Pierre Monteux. It was part of a month-long European tour.

The concerts in Russia included Beethoven's "Eroica," Piston's Symphony No. 6, Ravel's "Daphnis," Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Creston's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 7, Haydn's Symphony 102, Copland's "Ode," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Dukas' "L 'Apprenti."

The "Eroica" will be played in Ann Arbor tomorrow and Piston's Symphony No. 6 was played here last night.

Used 'Shuttle' System

Rector says that the group traveled to and from Russia by plane in a sort of "shuttle" system. Three Russian planes carried half the musicians from Helsinki to Leningrad and then returned to Helsinki for the other half. The same system was used from Moscow to Prague.

In Leningrad the group was housed at the Hotel Europa and in Moscow at the Kremlin Hotel, one of Russia's newest hotels.

Rector said he found Russian hospitality "gratifying" and the Russian people "friendly."

Guided tours were planned for the musicians including a visit to the Kremlin and other famous Leningrad and Moscow landmarks.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
Circ. D. 34,835 - S. 35,347
OCT 18 1956

TOUT—CONVEN

AY IT

Bos
Its P

Those of you who have experienced the thrill of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra under its present musical director, Charles Munch, know how valid is its claim to musical greatness. The orchestra proved again Monday night in Ann Arbor that it is, indeed, a great orchestra. And Mr. Munch displayed all his ability and charm that have earned him his reputation. The orchestra appeared on the Choral union series at Hill auditorium.

Mr. Munch proved, too, that he is a master of programming. His coupling of Von Weber, Piston and Tschaikowsky on a single program, raised some misgivings with us prior to the concert. But after hearing the performance we are convinced that the program had just the right touch of the modern and traditional.

Inclusion of the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" after a performance of Walter Piston's "Sixth Symphony" was a master stroke. For in much of the Tschaikowsky can be found the basis for portions of the Piston material. Perhaps "basis" is the wrong word. "Justification" might more accurately fill the bill.

For who can deny that Piston might eventually become a popular favorite when one realizes that, at one time, Tschaikowsky, himself, was looked upon as a musical radical and even today is criticized by the learned for his banality and lack of overall pattern? Yet the many beautiful melodies to be found in numerous Tschaikowsky works appeal to the common man and, in the end, the most candid musicians, not to be swayed by theories alone, will string along with the common man.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Circ. D. 27,535 - S. 24,406
OCT 21 1956

Munch, Boston Symphony

Orchestra Picture Story Of Martyrdo Of Saint Sebastian

By BERENICE PARKER

Current in the diamond anniversary recorded releases of the Boston Symphony led by Charles Munch, is a moving interpretation bussy's "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" album number LM-2030 on the RCA Victor label.

Vocal portions of the new orthophonic record are handled by Munch, as narrator; Florence Kopleff and Catherine Akos, contraltos; Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, of which Lorna Cooke de Varon is director.

In addition to profound feeling evident in the overall direction, Munch is impressive in the role of narrator also, even though the text is in French. He takes this part for the first time because of his special affection for the score, and this is the first time Victor has recorded this work. The recording took place in January at Boston's Symphony Hall.

Debussy's score was written as incidental music to the mystery play, "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien" by Gabriele D'Annunzio, and was first produced in Paris in 1911. It was necessary for both the composer and playwrite to defend their work against ecclesiastical criticism at first, but time has convinced the world at large of the of the work and the noble purpose of its author.

PAGAN TO CHRISTIAN

The theme deals with the history of Sebastian's rescue of pagan souls for Christ, his execution and his ascent into heaven.

The work is in five parts, the first, in the "Court of the Lilies" in a Roman palace. Sebastian, captain of the emperor's searchers, reveals his Christian faith and power to the Christian brothers, Marcus and Marcellian, chained there and urges them to maintain their faith.

In the second, Sebastian breaks the seal of a temple of infidel images and the light of the new faith enters and overcomes the old. During the third, in the court of Caesar Augustus, Sebastian renounces the divinity of the emperor and the gods and is sentenced by Diocletian to be bound to a tree and killed by the arrows of his men.

The execution occurs in the fourth scene, which takes place in a laurel grove. The mourning archers bear the body of their beloved companion, the arrows still from it and the drama progresses to the fifth scene, a transfiguring illumination of the whole forest in which the heavenly lights shine as the martyr is received into heaven.

Throughout the first four scenes, excerpts from the text are read by the narrator. In the fifth scene the action unfolds without a word. The album cover is illustrated with a reproduction of the painting of St. Sebastian by the 15th century Italian painter, Matteo di Giovanni. Album notes are by John N. Burk.

CHARLES MUNCH
. . . symphony conductor

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
Circ. D. 165,979 - S. 230,366
OCT 17 1956

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SOLOIST

Doriot Anthony will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of the Bach Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings on the program the famous ensemble will give Thursday night in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium under the auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
Circ. D. 92,760
OCT 20 1956

Pretty Girl Got Bid for Famed Staid Orchestra

The 75-year-old Boston Symphony which opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at Veterans Memorial Thursday, 8:30 p. m., Oct. 18, has the reputation for being ultra-conservative, but four seasons ago an old precedent was broken in a big way. A pretty girl was appointed to the important job as first flutist.

Doriot Anthony (now Mrs. Thomas F. Dwyer) was one of dozens of applicants for the place. Charles Munch, the Orchestra's conductor, simply said she was the best of the lot, regardless of age or sex, and that was that. His opinion was concurred in by Georges Laurent, who had just retired after 30 years as the Boston Symphony's first flutist.

Miss Anthony was born in Streator, Ill. Her mother, an excellent player herself, was the first of her many teachers. After graduation from the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., Miss Anthony played with the National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C., and the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

At Thursday evening's concert in the Veterans Memorial, Miss Anthony and her flute will be featured in Johann Sebastian Bach's B-minor Suite for Flute and Strings.

The Boston Symphony, fresh from a four-week European tour which included a long weekend in the USSR.

Highlights of Thursday's program in Columbus will be the Tchaikovwsky Pathetique Symphony. Tickets are at Heaton's.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 12,439
OCT 22 1956

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

The first of this season's Bailey Hall Concerts sponsored by Cornell University was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard Sunday afternoon at 4:15. The orchestra was under the direction of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch.

It was a beautiful concert.

Certain areas of musical criticism might well be ruled out, should one be in attendance for reasons besides hearing fine music superbly played. These would be intonation and ensemble, to name only the most obvious, for both of these very essential qualities were near-flawless. It is amusing to note that these same virtues were the ones most usually mentioned in the orchestra's recent European tour—and that grudgingly, as if it were a questionable thing to be so near perfection.

This leaves tone quality and balance on the technical and interpretation on the aesthetic side. There could be very, very few Sunday who could hunger for a richer, more eloquent string tone, more balanced and mellow horns, more dramatic percussion, or for brass and woodwind choirs more technically brilliant. Much has been said about the acoustical difficulties in listening in Bailey Hall, yet from where I sat, where one is apt to get a preponderance of lower string sound, the balance of the orchestra was incredibly fine. I will yield that the seating of the orchestra — with the cellos and basses in — would help the balance, but most of the credit must go to the group under discussion, and in particular to Mr. Munch's excellent handling of it.

The best time to hear the Beethoven "Eroica" (Symphony No. 3 in E flat Major, Opus 55) is the first time—a parallel being attempted to the case of the man who wished he might read "Tom Sawyer" for the first time but once again. Perhaps the next best time is when the Boston Symphony plays it as they did Sunday afternoon—with joy and spirit, with awe and reverence, with clarity and definition, with nostalgic poignancy, in the order called for. It was magnificently portrayed.

In contrast to the Beethoven and to Weber's "Overture to 'Euryanthe'," the orchestra's opening work, Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 6," commissioned by the orchestra for its 75th Anniversary, was played, and that most brilliantly. Mr. Piston did indeed construct it for the light orchestra. The work is surprisingly redundant with "tunes" and mellifluous harmonies, albeit the complex changing rhythmic figures and no little preoccupation with virtuosity. It is a work one can comprehend and admire at first hearing—at least as interpreted by Mr. Munch—whether one warms up to it or not.

One wonders if some listener of a future generation might ever wish that he might hear Piston's 6th—could we entitle it the "Percussion?"—for the first time, but once again.

Which brings us to choice of program—a delicate subject at best. Sunday's program was a change of pace from the Boston's last appearance here under Monteux, when they presented works having notably more "audience appeal"—albeit exquisitely done.

It was a most beautiful concert, in every way.

FORREST SANDERS

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
NEWS Chr
Circ. D. 3,84
OCT 28

The internationally famous Boston Pops Orchestra will be featured on one of the programs this year to be sponsored by the Winter Haven Community Concert Association. The superb group of musicians will be under direction of the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Appearing with the orchestra as a soloist will be Ruth Slencynska, pianist, a child prodigy who gave her first concert at the age of four.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
CLEARWATER, FLA.
SUN
Circ. D. 8,514 - S. 9,192
OCT 21 1956

Off the Record

By Reginald Rogers Jr.

Many a fine pianist has flubbed the dub, so to speak, when he tackled the piano music of Robert Schumann. The composer had a mind like a many-sided brilliant, and the combinations of imagination, adventure, fantasy and romance which color his music aren't easily interpreted.

I've been delighted, therefore, in finding that young Friedrich Gulda brings just the right sensitiveness to Schumann. Gulda plays the 20 charming "Fantasiestucke" opus 12 and the lovely "Waldszenen" opus 82 on a Decca "London LP", and does a fine job. The recording is numbered LL-1370.

In a companion LP numbered LL-1370 the same artist teams with the New Symphony Orchestra of London in two Mozart concertos, and thus proves that his is no one-sided sensitiveness. Gulda's piano performances are notable in Mozart's music. The two concertos are "No. 25 in C Major, (K. 503), a little modest and cruelly demanding on the pianist, and "No. 26 in D Major" (K. 537), a neat piece of entertainment."

Final Voice

The last thing Mozart composed was his great "Requiem Mass in D Minor," (K.626). The fact that he died before completing the work makes it all the more interesting because of its nature. As Alfred Einstein has pointed out in his book ("Mozart", Oxford University Press) the music of the "Requiem" emphasizes that "death is not a terrible vision but a friend."

A Mozart disciple, Franz Xaver Sussmayer, completed the composition.

Columbia has just released an inspired performance, with Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra of New York, Jennie Tourel, alto; Irmgard Seefried, soprano; Leopold Simoneau, tenor; and [illegible] Fields, bass, sing with the Westminster Choir under Director John Finley Williamson.

The Mozart work, 12-inch LP is numbered ML-4013, and is another recording issued to mark Conductor Walter's 80th birthday which came Sept. 15.

Les Belles Americaines

Write this on the wall in striped paint: one of the most popular recordings of 1956 will be RCA Victor's "Offenbach in America," an attractive album containing eight selections played to perfection by the Boston Pops Orchestra with its famed Arthur Fiedler conducting.

This is not only Offenbach, but the Offenbach of 1876, when the composer came to this country from his adopted France (he was born in Germany, you know, and his name was originally Levy). It was a triumphant tour.

Conductor Fiedler has dug up some of the programs from that visit to reproduce some of the most popular compositions which Offenbach used to delight his American audiences.

One is "Les Belles Americaines," of course. Others are the marvelous overture to "La Belle Helene;" the intermezzo from "The Tales of Hoffman;" the overture to "Orpheus in Hades."

The album is in book form, with pink pages embellished by the drawings of Alajalov and interesting notes on the composer's trip, written by RCA Victor official George Marek.

For Pianists

A Capitol album of two 12-inch LPs offers a rare treat to students of the piano and to lovers of serious music everywhere. Here are "The Six Clavier Partitas" of Johann Sebastian Bach, played thoughtfully and brilliantly by Aldi Jambor.

Born in Budapest, she was famous as a concert pianist in Europe prior to World War II. With her scientist husband she came to the United States after the war. He worked at Oak Ridge before his death. She is now a member of the faculty at Peabody Conservatory of music in Baltimore.

A pamphlet of four large-sized pages comes in the handsome box with records, furnishing detailed notes by Dr. Karl Getringer of Boston University's music faculty, an authority on Bach. The album is numbered PBR-3044.

The Play's The Thing

Last week I promised a rare surprise. This is it.

Angel Records have just released a complete recording of that grand comedy of manners, Richard Sheridan's "The School for Scandal." Three 12-inch LPs come with a large pamphlet containing a synopsis of the play by acts and scenes, along with photographs and other notes, in a box numbered Angel 3542.

Dame Edith Evans plays the role of Lady Snearwell; Claire Bloom is Lady Teazle; George Howe takes the part of Crabtree; and Harry Andrews and Alec Clunes play Joseph and Charles Surface, respectively.

William Squire is not only a fine Sir Benjamin Backbite but an excellent Sir Harry Bumper and a typical Careless. Baliol Holloway is a perfect Sir Oliver Surface, and the others in the large cast round out a top-quality production.

The incidental music, not at all incidentally, consists of portions from the symphonies of William Boyce, an English musician famous in Sheridan's day. It is played by the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, Walter Jellinek, conductor.

Top Entertainment

This album is perfect home entertainment. Pick a cool evening and invite some of your most discerning friends in to listen. The voices are well balanced, easily identified with the characters, an the sound is crystal clear.

Here are the foibles of high society in the England of George III; the time of David Garrick and Sir Richard Steele, of Handel and his "Water Music."

It will come alive in your living room, and you'll forget entirely that the play was written in 1777.

Remember? . . .

Mrs. Candour: O fie! Oh but I'll swear her colour is natural; I have seen it come and go.

Lady Teazle: I dare swear you have, ma'am; it goes off at night, and comes again in the morning.

This album is one for the permanent treasury of recordings.

From The Movies

If you've seen the motion picture "The Vagabond King," the Paramount job in Vista-Vision, that is, you'll undoubtedly want to listen to an RCA Victor 12-inch LP just out.

Numbered LM-2004, it contains the overture and 11 selections from Rudolf Friml's music for the show, sung by the latest tenor find, Oreste. He sings here with Jean Fenn, instead of Kathryn Grayson, who is starred in the picture.

The first time I heard a recording by Oreste I commented that he might make Mario Lanza take a back seat. I haven't seen the movie, but I've been listening to this recording, and I still believe that.

Oreste, as you probably know by this time, was born on the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, and has been cutting a wide swath in England in recent years.

Well, that's it . . . see you next Sunday . . .

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 12,439
OCT 22 1956

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

The first of this season's Bailey Hall Concerts sponsored by Cornell University was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard Sunday afternoon at 4:15. The orchestra was under the direction of its permanent conductor, Charles Munch.

It was a beautiful concert.

Certain areas of musical criticism might well be ruled out, should one be in attendance for reasons besides hearing fine music superbly played. These would be intonation and ensemble, to name only the most obvious, for both of these very essential qualities were near-flawless. It is amusing to note that these same virtues were the ones most usually mentioned in the orchestra's recent European tour—and that grudgingly, as if it were a questionable thing to be so near perfection.

This leaves tone quality and balance on the technical and interpretation on the aesthetic side. There could be very, very few Sunday who could hunger for a richer, more eloquent string tone, more balanced and mellow horns, more dramatic percussion, or for brass and woodwind choirs more technically brilliant. Much has been said about the accoustical difficulties in listening in Bailey Hall, yet from where I sat, where one is apt to get a preponderance of lower string sound, the balance of the orchestra was incredibly fine. I will yield that the seating of the orchestra — with the cellos and basses in — would help the balance, but most of the credit must go to the group under discussion, and in particular to Mr. Munch's excellent handling of it.

The best time to hear the Beethoven "Eroica" (Symphony No. 3 in E flat Major, Opus 55) is the first time—a parallel being attempted to the case of the man who wished he might read "Tom Sawyer" for the first time but once again. Perhaps the next best time is when the Boston Symphony plays it as they did Sunday afternoon—with joy and spirit, with awe and reverence, with clarity and definition, with nostalgic - poignancy, in the order called for. It was magnificently portrayed.

In contrast to the Beethoven and to Weber's "Overture to 'Euryanthe'," the orchestra's opening work, Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 6," commissioned by the orchestra for its 75th Anniversary, was played, and that most brilliantly. Mr. Piston did indeed construct it for the right orchestra. The work is surprisingly redundant with "tunes" and mellifluous harmonies, albeit the complex changing rhythmic figures and no little preoccupation with virtuosity. It is a work one can comprehend and admire at first hearing—at least as interpreted by Mr. Munch—whether one warms up to it or not.

One wonders if some listener of a future generation might ever wish that he might hear Piston's 6th—could we entitle it the "Percussion?"—for the first time, but once again.

Which brings us to choice of program—a delicate subject at best. Sunday's program was a change of pace from the Boston's last appearance here under Monteaux, when they presented works having notably more "audience appeal"—albeit exquisitely done.

It was a most beautiful concert, in every way.

FORREST SANDERS

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
NEWS CHIEF
Circ. D. 3,84[illegible] - S. 4,0[illegible]
OCT 28 1956

The internationally famous Boston Pops Orchestra will be featured on one of the programs this year to be sponsored by the Winter Haven Community Concert Association. The superb group of musicians will be under direction of the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Appearing with the orchestra as a soloist will be Ruth Slencynska, pianist, a child prodigy who gave her first concert at the age of four.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
CLEARWATER, FLA.
SUN
Circ. D. 8,614 - S. 9,192
OCT 21 1956

Off the Record

By Reinhold Rogers Jr.

Many a fine pianist has flubbed the dub, so to speak, when he tackled the piano music of Robert Schumann. The composer had a mind like a many-sided brilliant, and the combinations of imagination, adventure, fantasy and romance which color his music aren't easily interpreted.

I've been delighted, therefore, in finding that young Friedrich Gulda brings just the right sensitiveness to Schumann. Gulda plays the 19 charming "Fantasiestucke" opus 12 and the 9 lovely "Waldscenen" opus 82 on a new 12-inch London LP, and does a grand job. The recording is numbered LL-1371.

In a companion disk numbered LL-1370 the same pianist teams with the New Symphony Orchestra of London in two Mozart concertos, and thus proves that his is no one-sided sensitiveness. Gulda's piano performances are as flexible as Mozart's music. The two concertos are "No. 25 in C Major," (K. 503), a little known and cruelly demanding on the pianist, and "No. 26 in D Major" (k. 537), a neat piece of entertainment.

Final Voice

The last thing Mozart composed was his great "Requiem Mass in D Minor," (k.626). The fact that he died before completing the work makes it all the more interesting because of its nature. As Alfred Einstein has pointed out in his book ("Mozart", Oxford University Press) the music of the "Requiem" emphasizes that "death is not a terrible vision but a friend."

A Mozart pupil, Franz Xavier Sussmayer, completed the composition.

Columbia has just released an inspired performance, with Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra of New York. Jennie Tourel, alto; Irmgard Seefried, soprano; Leopold Simoneau, tenor; and William Warfield, bass, sing with the Westminster Choir under Director John Finley Williamson.

The Masterworks 12-inch LP is numbered ML-5012, and is another recording issued to mark Conductor Walter's 80th birthday, which came Sept. 15.

Les Belles Americaines

Write this on the wall in striped paint: one of the most popular recordings of 1956 will be RCA Victor's "Offenbach in America," an attractive album containing eight selections played to perfection by the Boston Pops Orchestra with its famed Arthur Fiedler conducting.

This is not only Offenbach, but the Offenbach of 1876, when the composer came to this country from his adopted France (he was born in Germany, you know, and his name was originally Levy). It was a triumphant tour.

Conductor Fiedler has dug up some of the programs from that visit to reproduce some of the most popular compositions which Offenbach used to delight his American audiences.

One is "Les Belles Americaines," of course. Others are the marvelous overture to "La Belle Helene;" the intermezzo from "The Tales of Hoffman;" and the overture to "Orpheus in Hades."

The album is in book form, with eight pink pages embellished by the drawings of Alajalov and interesting notes on the composer's trip, written by RCA Victor official George Marek.

For Pianists

A Capitol album of two 12-inch LPs offers a rare treat to students of the piano and to lovers of serious music everywhere. Here are "The Six Clavier Partitas" of Johann Sebastian Bach, played thoughtfully and brilliantly by Agi Jambor.

Born in Budapest, she was famous as a concert pianist in Europe prior to World War II. With her scientist husband she came to the United States after the war. He worked at Oak Ridge before his death. She is now a member of the faculty at Peabody Conservatory of music in Baltimore.

A pamphlet of four large-sized pages comes in the handsome box with records, furnishing detailed notes by Dr. Karl Geiringer of Boston University's music faculty, an authority on Bach. The album is numbered PBR-5344.

The Play's The Thing

Last week I promised a rare surprise. This is it.

Angel Records have just released a complete recording of that grand comedy of manners, Richard Sheridan's "The School for Scandal." Three 12-inch LPs come with a large pamphlet containing a synopsis of the play by acts and scenes, along with photographs and other notes, in a box numbered Angel 3542.

Dame Edith Evans plays the role of Lady Sneerwell; Claire Bloom is Lady Teazle; George Howe takes the part of Crabtree; and Harry Andrews and Alec Clunes play Joseph and Charles Surface, respectively.

William Squire is not only a fine Sir Benjamin Backbite but an excellent Sir Harry Bumper and a typical Careless. Baliol Holloway is a perfect Sir Oliver Surface, and the others in the large cast round out a top-quality production.

The incidental music, not at all incidentally, consists of portions from the symphonies of William Boyce, an English musician famous in Sheridan's day. It is played by the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, Walter Jellinek, conductor.

Top Entertainment

This album is perfect home entertainment. Pick a cool evening and invite some of your most discerning friends in to listen. The voices are well balanced, easily identified with the characters, an the sound is crystal clear.

Here are the foibles of high society in the England of George III; the time of David Garrick and Sir Richard Steele, of Handel and his "Water Music."

It will come alive in your living room, and you'll forget entirely that the play was written in 1777.

Remember? . . .

Mrs. Candour: O fie! Oh but I'll swear her colour is natural; I have seen it come and go.

Lady Teazle: I dare swear you have, ma'am; it goes off at night, and comes again in the morning.

This album is one for the permanent treasury of recordings.

From The Movies

If you've seen the motion picture "The Vagabond King," the Paramount job in Vista-Vision, that is, you'll undoubtedly want to listen to an RCA Victor 12-inch LP just out.

Numbered LM-2004, it contains the overture and 11 selections from Rudolf Friml's music for the show, sung by the latest tenor find, Oreste. He sings here with Jean Fenn, instead of Kathryn Grayson, who is starred in the picture.

The first time I heard a recording by Oreste I commented that he might make Mario Lanza take a back seat. I haven't seen the movie, but I've been listening to this recording, and I still believe that.

Oreste, as you probably know by this time, was born on the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, and has been cutting a wide swath in England in recent years.

Well, that's it . . . see you next Sunday . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

NOV 1 - 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

PERIPATETIC REVIEWER

The season has come into full tilt and the past ten days have been a prelude to a burst of musical activities on both the right and left banks of the Charles. Herewith is a report on a significant sampling.

As my local impresario will ruefully attest, around here for some years now some of the best things in musical life have been free for the asking. This is due to the generosity of the Mason Music Foundation, which last week at Jordan Hall was host at the Boston debut of the eminent young German baritone, Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau. As one might have anticipated both from his reputation and his debut program, consisting of six lieder from Schubert's rarely sung "Schwanengesang" cycle and Schumann's great "Dichterliebe" cycle, Mr. Fisher-Dieskau is no trifler. In sooth he proved to be an artist of towering stature. He combines a voice with the range and smoothness of a cello and the power of a pipe organ with hair-line control and the deep musical insights necessary to encompass the vast and subtle range of moods traversed in both cycles. My chief criticism would be directed toward a stage presence distinctly on the stuffy side, though this is not necessarily a permanent condition for an artist of his tender years. In both cycles, of course, there is found in overpowering abundance the most personal reflection of the composers' thoughts, infinitely appealing melodic grace, uncanny psychological projection and the most trenchant sort of piano commentary. At the conclusion of the recital I would have gladly sat through it again and so probably would most everyone else present.

• • •

The Boston Symphony returned from its first trip of the season to render the first Boston performance of Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony composed in 1954. Also on the program was Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 135 Quartet, in memory of the librarian, Leslie J. Rogers, who died on October 11, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor. Mr. Piston's three-movement work seemed on first hearing to be typically cleanly proportioned, rather bitingly dissonant, an effectively but not spectacularly orchestrated piece that concealed a great deal of latent power beneath its exterior restraint. One could descry a number of lovely moments in the first movement, feel the spaciousness of the adagio and enjoy the brassy gaiety of the short concluding allegro. May Mr. Piston's new work be heard more often than the "Paris" Symphony which preceded it on the program, and which, incredibly enough, has been played here only three times in the last fifty-eight years. Mr. Munch's reading of this beautiful work was rather heavy and straightforward, his preference for employing the orchestra's full string complement exacting its usual considerable toll in clarity and delicacy. Similarly, employment of the full strings rendered a disservice to the Beethoven slow movement, whose loveliness is almost not of this world when played as originally written for quartet. In the Schumann Mr. Munch at times foresworе a literal reading and reverted to an old and disconcerting tendency to change tempi in mid-stream, though otherwise he gave the fading old classic a brilliantly hued performance.

• • •

On Sunday afternoon at Kresge auditorium the Quintetto Boccherini appeared in the first of MIT's distinguished 1956-57 Humanities series concerts. If there is another Italian Renaissance in the making, history, for all I know, may well mark its commencement as coextensive with the rise of one astonishing chamber music ensemble after another from that sunny land. The Quintetto, which contains two 'celli and was first heard here two years ago in the Mason Foundation series, proved itself a fitting guardian of the tradition in rendering one of Boccherini's 113 'cello quintets, Malipiero's Symphony for Five Strings and the great Schubert C major quintet. This ensemble's smoothness, purity of intonation and refinement of phrasing more than met even the fearfully exacting standard of Kresge Hall's acoustics. That a group can play so spiritedly when its concert fare, in the almost total absence of a 'cello quintet literature, for the past 7 years of necessity can have been little other than Boccherini, is fairly remarkable. This circumstance in part may be due to their unique practice of alternating the first and second violinists and 'cellists. It is not amiss to comment that engineers and scientists as a segment of society have not been known in the past to display a notable solicitude for the humanitarian values. The rise of the humanities programs at MIT then, of which the instant series is a prime example, may presage a very special Renaissance of our own.

• • •

On Monday evening the Cambridge Society for Early Music devoted the first of its three concerts entirely to the compositions of Georg Philipp Telemann. Heretofore the Society had limited its one-composer evenings to Bach and there is indeed much to be said for reverting to that policy. For however dextrously the ensembles are varied, however faithfully the works performed, two hours (six compositions embracing twenty-eight separate movements in all) is an awful lot of Telemann in one sitting. His fertility and inventiveness is undoubted—Handel is reported to have said that Telemann could compose a motet in eight parts as easily as an ordinary person could write a letter—and there is no lack of courtly charm and grace in the music. But in the end, the almost complete absence of depth and originality emerge as the most salient aspects. Still, it was something in the nature of a triumph for both Telemann and the Society that enough listeners, most Cantabrigians, resisted the competing blandishments of Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois across the Charles, to fill Sanders Theatre.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 1 1956

Munch Leads Eroica In First Boston P

Boston.—The Boston Symphony has returned from Europe and the USSR with a halo of glory about it. Its adventures across the seas from Aug. 24 to Sept. [illegible] were a series of triumphs with the publics of each city visited. Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux and the players were acclaimed with an intensity for sound and an abundance of flowers, everywhere they played, that was truly amazing.

Thus the opening of the 70th season at Symphony Hall on Oct. [illegible] had a heightened quality of expectation. The applause was somewhat warmer than customary (though always very cordial), and when the audience rose in greeting as Mr. Munch first appeared on stage, they remained standing a little longer than usual.

Only One Rehearsal

The initial program contained no new music, for there had been time for but one rehearsal. (The final group had arrived back from Europe late Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, and required one day of rest.) Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was followed by the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony as the final work.

Since the orchestra had played the "Eroica" eight times on tour, it might well have been worn thin for them, temporarily, but you would not have guessed so from the brisk and muscular performance. To be sure, the detail of the funeral march was not so delicate in projection, balance or articulation as I would have liked. But that, I think, was a matter of the conductor's temperament; he plays the movement with direct progress and long line, as if impatient of its sculptured ornamentation.

Soloist in the Beethoven Concerto was Wolfgang Schneiderhan, who was making his American debut on this occasion. A resourceful technician and obviously a good musician, he did not once indulge in personal display. The intimacy, extreme clarity of note, phrase, and nuance, and the tenderness, also, of his playing made me think somewhat of Fritz Kreisler. This was not an incandescent or a "big" [illegible] beautiful [illegible] begun [illegible] Carmen with a local [illegible] Baltic [illegible]

The [illegible] two con[illegible] and [illegible] son of [illegible] pices of [illegible] tion. T[illegible] warm[illegible] ner, pres[illegible]

TV NOTEBOOK

How to Televise Music

By MARY CREMMEN

The gratifying telecast of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Kresge Auditorium can be traced directly to producer Jordan Whitelaw, music manager of station WGBH.

★ ★ ★

It was clear that he had no intention of allowing video to distract from the music.

"Picture or no Picture," stated Whitelaw in an interview before the telecast. "It's essentially a concert."

He spoke against having frequent shots of the whole orchestra. "Once or twice is enough—but trying to fit 102 people into a 21-inch screen looks like an animated cartoon."

The program included Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; Debussy, Iberia No. 2 and Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor.

It was interesting to note how Whitelaw held to his plan of using a television camera "as a discreet guide to whatever part of the orchestra is most important at a given time."

He quickly added, "This does not mean keeping the camera on the move, which would be too distracting from the music. But when an instrument or a whole section of instruments has an extended passage, I have the camera trained in that direction. I don't hesitate to let the lenses rest for a long time in the same position."

This was clearly proved during Bach Suite No. 2, as he kept the camera on flute soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

★ ★ ★

In contrast to the way commercial television continually tries for trick shots when covering an orchestra, Whitelaw declared:

"In a close-up of the soloist, I insist that the picture show the whole figure." He went on sternly, "I refuse to have a disembodied player—that is, a close-up of hands and no body or a face as if it had been cut off at the neck. A screen filled with only fingers trilling over a flute is nauseating."

★ ★ ★

The telecast was all the more remarkable since there had been no time for rehearsal.

Whitelaw had to plan his camera moves in advance by listening to recordings of the selections in the program and following the scores.

"I tried to plan logical shots in terms of what was happening in the music." He added, "After that I just hoped it would make sense."

★ ★ ★

Agnes Moorehead's expert handling of the role of an illiterate backwoods woman probably gave "The Teacher" more importance than it deserved.

It was a familiar story of a mother who desperately wanted to learn to read so that she could find out for herself what was in her son's letter.

The intriguing part of the show was Miss Moorehead's delivery of such lines as: "I'm a pure pity sake and that's what I am" and "Stay out of what ain't none of your never mind."

One even exciting [illegible] had sung their parts last [illegible] Eleanor Davis, mezzo-soprano; Carl Nelson, tenor, and John [illegible] nor, bass. Again they exhibited [illegible] ability. Irene Jordan, soprano, [illegible] her large voice well, though the [illegible] often had a curious "covered" [illegible] lity.

—Cyrus Durgin

Annie Oakleys

John Cashmore (left) and Mrs. [illegible] tickets to white-bloused music students. Girls [illegible] ive concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] y of Music, the first to start Nov. [illegible] Levine of 2137 79th St., Brooklyn, [illegible] High School orchestra, and Jeanette Noell of [illegible] lip Manor, and Eleanor Kistner of 543 E. [illegible] Beach, both honor music students at Bishop McDonell Memorial HS.

NOV 0 - 1956

Lesson from Tanglewood

To the Editors: This summer I attended a concert in Tanglewood, given by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra with solos by Ruth Posselt, the well known and loved violinist. In that natural, perfectly beautiful spot 7,000 persons listened in awe to the beautiful music—7,000 people, all ages, all creeds, and from all walks of life, and so in tune with each other that a pin dropped could be heard during the rendition of the music.

Without any artificial glamor, all these people with a purpose listened. Those who may not have been musicians, nor knowing anything about the theories of composition, still received the message of this beautiful, awe-inspiring music in quiet, natural beauty.

If it were possible that serious future conventions could be held by truly interested parties, without alcohol and all the other artificial stimulants that have gone with past conventions, maybe 7,000 people would listen in harmony and purpose and have a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment, too.

GRACE TUXBURY.

Manchester.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

NOV 1 - 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

PERIPATETIC REVIEWER

The season has come into full tilt and the past ten days have been witness to a burst of musical activities on both the right and left banks of the Charles. Herewith is a report on a significant sampling.

As any local impresario will ruefully attest, around here for some years now some of the best things in musical life have been free for the asking. This is due to the generosity of the Mason Music Foundation which last week at Jordan Hall was host at the Boston debut of the eminent young German baritone, Deitrich Fisher-Dieskau. As one might have anticipated both from his reputation and his debut program consisting of six lieder from Schubert's rarely sung "Schwanengesang" cycle and Schumann's great "Dichterliebe" cycle, Mr. Fisher-Dieskau is no trifler. In sooth he proved to be an artist of towering stature. He combines a voice with the range and smoothness of a cello and the power of a pipe organ with hair-line control and the deep musical insights necessary to encompass the vast and subtle range of moods traversed in both cycles. My chief criticism would be directed toward a stage presence distinctly on the stuffy side, though this is not necessarily a permanent condition for an artist of his tender years. In both cycles, of course, there is found in overpowering abundance the most personal reflection of the composers' thoughts, infinitely appealing melodic grace, uncanny psychological projection and the most trenchant sort of piano commentary. At the conclusion of the recital I would have gladly sat through it again and so probably would most everyone else present.

* * *

The Boston Symphony returned from its first trip of the season to render the first Boston performance of Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony composed in 1954. Also on the program was Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 135 Quartet, in memory of the librarian, Leslie J. Rogers, who died on October 11, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor. Mr. Piston's three-movement work seemed on first hearing to be typically cleanly proportioned, rather bitingly dissonant, an effectively but not spectacularly orchestrated piece that concealed a great deal of latent power beneath its exterior restraint. One could descry a number of lovely moments in the first movement, feel the spaciousness of the adagio and enjoy the brassy gaiety of the short concluding allegro. May Mr. Piston's new work be heard more often than the "Paris" Symphony which preceded it on the program, and which, incredibly enough, has been played here only three times in the last fifty-eight years. Mr. Munch's reading of this beautiful work was rather heavy and straightforward, his preference for employing the orchestra's full string complement exacting its usual considerable toll in clarity and delicacy. Similarly, employment of the full strings rendered a disservice to the Beethoven slow movement, whose loveliness is almost not of this world when played as originally written for quartet. In the Schumann Mr. Munch at times foresWore a literal reading and reverted to an old and disconcerting tendency to change tempi in mid-stream, though otherwise he gave the fading old classic a brilliantly hued performance.

* * *

On Sunday afternoon at Kresge auditorium the Quintetto Boccherini appeared in the first of MIT's distinguished 1956-57 Humanities series concerts. If there is another Italian Renaissance in the making, history, for all I know, may well mark its commencement as coextensive with the rise of one astonishing chamber music ensemble after another from that sunny land. The Quintetto, which contains two 'celli and was first heard here two years ago in the Mason Foundation series, proved itself a fitting guardian of the tradition in rendering one of Boccherini's 113 'cello quintets, Malipiero's Symphony for Five Strings and the great Schubert C major quintet. This ensemble's smootheness, purity of intonation and refinement of phrasing more than met even the fearfully exacting standard of Kresge Hall's acoustics. That a group can play so spiritedly when its concert fare, in the almost total absence of a 'cello quintet literature, for the past 7 years of necessity can have been little other than Boccherini, is fairly remarkable. This circumstance in part may be due to their unique practice of alternating the first and second violinists and 'cellists. It is not amiss to comment that engineers and scientists as a segment of society have not been known in the past to display a notable solicitude for the humanitarian values. The rise of the humanities programs at MIT then, of which the instant series is a prime example, may presage a very special Renaissance of our own.

* * *

On Monday evening the Cambridge Society for Early Music devoted the first of its three concerts entirely to the compositions of Georg Philipp Telemann. Heretofore the Society had limited its one-composer evenings to Bach and there is indeed much to be said for reverting to that policy. For however dextrously the ensembles are varied, however faithfully the works performed, two hours (six compositions embracing twenty-eight separate movements in all) is an awful lot of Telemann in one sitting. His fertility and inventiveness is undoubted—Handel is reported to have said that Telemann could compose a motet in eight parts as easily as an ordinary person could write a letter—and there is no lack of courtly charm and grace in the music. But in the end, the almost complete absence of depth and originality emerge as the most salient aspects. Still, it was something in the nature of a triumph for both Telemann and the Society that enough listeners, most Cantabrigians, resisted the competing blandishments of Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois across the Charles, to fill Sanders Theatre.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street New York
MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 1 - 1956

Munch Leads Eroica Symphony In First Boston Program

Boston.—The Boston Symphony has returned from Europe and the USSR with a halo of glory about it. Its adventures across the seas from Aug. 24 to Sept. 23 were a series of triumphs with the publics of each city visited. Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux and the players were acclaimed with an intensity of sound and an abundance of flowers, everywhere they played, that was truly amazing.

Thus the opening of the 76th season, at Symphony Hall on Oct. 5, had a heightened quality of expectation. The applause was somewhat warmer than customary (though always very cordial), and when the audience rose in greeting as Mr. Munch first appeared on stage, they remained standing a little longer than usual.

Only One Rehearsal

The initial program contained no new music, for there had been time for but one rehearsal. (The final group had arrived back from Europe late Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, and required one day of rest). Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was followed by the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Beethoren's "Eroica" Symphony as the final work.

Since the orchestra had played the "Eroica" eight times on tour, it might well have been worn thin for them, temporarily, but you would not have guessed so from the brisk and muscular performance. To be sure, the detail of the funeral march was not so delicate in section balance or articulation as I would have liked. But that, I think, was a matter of the conductor's temperament; he plays the movement with direct progress and long line, as if impatient of its sculptured ornamentation.

Soloist in the Beethoven Concerto was Wolfgang Schneiderhan, who was making his American debut on this occasion. A resourceful technician and obviously a good musician, he did not once indulge in personal display. The intimacy, extreme clarity of note, phrase, and nuance, and the tenderness, also, of his playing made me think somewhat of Fritz Kreisler. This was not an incandescent or a "big" reading; but it was not [illegible] beautiful.

The music section otherwise begun slowly, as invariably it d[illegible] Carmen Prii, an Estonian violi[illegible] with a big tone and style, made [illegible] local debut as the first event in [illegible] Baltic Concert Series at Jordan [illegible] on Sept. 28. Her playing was w[illegible] and intelligent, with nothing [illegible] cately feminine [illegible] it. An exact[illegible] program included [illegible] Bach Chacon[illegible] for unaccompanied instrument; [illegible] D minor Sonata, [illegible] 108, of Brahms and Ravel's "Tzigane". Juta Va[illegible] was the accompanist.

The Societa Co[illegible] from Italy g[illegible] two concerts in Jordan Hall, Oc[illegible] and 5, thereby opening another s[illegible] son of free programs given under a[illegible] pices of the Mason Music Foundation. This excellent ensemble, of [illegible] warm, Mediterranean tone and m[illegible] ner, presented two programs of 18[illegible] early 19th-century music from [illegible] hands, most notably, Vivaldi [illegible] Corelli. Large and cordial [illegible] attended.

[illegible]ly Frey has been [illegible] vis[illegible] of the early season, appearing at [illegible]n Hall Oct. 7. This [illegible]ka-but able violinist offered the [illegible] (1939) by Walter Piston; [illegible]'s G major Sonata, Op. 78; [illegible] major Fantasy, Op. 159, by [illegible]ert; and Saint-Saëns's B minor [illegible]tto, all with the competent key-[illegible] partnership of Martin Boykan. [illegible] music-making, indeed.

[illegible]ozart's Mass in C minor (K. [illegible]), which the Handel and Haydn [illegible]ety had presented last spring, was [illegible] again, at Symphony Hall Oct. [illegible] aid the Robert A. Taft Memor[illegible] Foundation. As before, Thomp[illegible] Stone conducted a vital perform[illegible] one even exciting. Three of the [illegible]ists had sung their parts last [illegible]arch: Eleanor Davis, mezzo-so[illegible]prano; Carl Nelson, tenor; and John Hornor, bass. Again they exhibited [illegible] sound ability. Irene Jordan, soprano, [illegible]sed her large voice well, though the [illegible] tone often had a curiously "covered" quality.

—Cyrus Durgin

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
Circ. D. 2,092,455 - S. 3,652,302
NOV 3 1956

Music Lovers Win Annie Oakleys

John Cashmore (left) and Mrs. Carroll L. [illegible] tickets to white-bloused music students. Girls [illegible]ive concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] of Music, the first to start Nov. 16. [illegible] Levine of 2137 79th St., Brooklyn, concert[illegible] High School orchestra, and Jeanette Noell of [illegible]slip Manor, and Eleanor Kistner of 563 E. [illegible] Beach, both honor music students at Bishop McDonell Memorial HS.

NOV 6 - 1956

Lesson from Tanglewood

To the Editors: This summer I attended a concert in Tanglewood, given by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra with solos by Ruth Posselt, the well known and loved violinist. In that natural, perfectly beautiful spot 7,000 persons listened in awe to the beautiful music—7,000 people, all race, all creeds, and from all walks of life, and so in tune with each other that a pin dropped could be heard during the rendition of the music.

Without any artificial glamor, all these people with a purpose listened. Those who may not have been musicians, nor knowing anything about the theories of composition, still received the message of this beautiful, awe-inspiring music in quiet, natural beauty.

If it were possible that serious future conventions could be held by truly interested parties, without liquor and all the other artificial stimulants that have gone with past conventions, maybe 7,000 people would listen in harmony and purpose and have a feeling of satisfaction and acocmplishment, too.

GRACE TUXBURY.

Manchester.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

NOV 1 - 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

PERIPATETIC REVIEWER

The season has come into full tilt and the past ten days have been witness to a burst of musical activities on both the right and left banks of the Charles. Herewith is a report on a significant sampling.

As any local impresario will ruefully attest, around here for some years now some of the best things in musical life have been free for the asking. This is due to the generosity of the Mason Music Foundation which last week at Jordan Hall was host at the Boston debut of the eminent young German baritone, Deitrich Fisher-Dieskau. As one might have anticipated both from his reputation and his debut program consisting of six lieder from Schubert's rarely sung "Schwanengesang" cycle and Schumann's great "Dichterliebe" cycle, Mr. Fisher-Dieskau is no trifler. In sooth he proved to be an artist of towering stature. He combines a voice with the range and smoothness of a cello and the power of a pipe organ with hair-line control and the deep musical insights necessary to encompass the vast and subtle range of moods traversed in both cycles. My chief criticism would be directed toward a stage presence distinctly on the stuffy side, though this is not necessarily a permanent condition for an artist of his tender years. In both cycles, of course, there is found in overpowering abundance the most personal reflection of the composers' thoughts, infinitely appealing melodic grace, uncanny psychological projection and the most trenchant sort of piano commentary. At the conclusion of the recital I would have gladly sat through it again and so probably would most everyone else present.

* * *

The Boston Symphony returned from its first trip of the season to render the first Boston performance of Walter Pison's Fifth Symphony composed in 1954. Also on the program was Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 135 Quartet, in memory of the librarian, Leslie J. Rogers, who died on October 11, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor. Mr. Piston's three-movement work seemed on first hearing to be typically cleanly proportioned, rather bitingly dissonant, an effectively but not spectacularly orchestrated piece that concealed a great deal of latent power beneath its exterior restraint. One could descry a number of lovely moments in the first movement, feel the spaciousness of the adagio and enjoy the brassy gaiety of the short concluding allegro. May Mr. Piston's new work be heard more often than the "Paris" Symphony which preceded it on the program, and which, incredibly enough, has been played here only three times in the last fifty-eight years. Mr. Munch's reading of this beautiful work was rather heavy and straightforward, his preference for employing the orchestra's full string complement exacting its usual considerable toll in clarity and delicacy. Similarly, employment of the full strings rendered a disservice to the Beethoven slow movement, whose loveliness is almost not of this world when played as originally written for quartet. In the Schumann Mr. Munch at times foreswore a literal reading and reverted to an old and disconcerting tendency to change tempi in mid-stream, though otherwise he gave the fading old classic a brilliantly hued performance.

* * *

On Sunday afternoon at Kresge auditorium the Quintetto Boccherini appeared in the first of MIT's distinguished 1956-57 Humanities series concerts. If there is another Italian Renaissance in the making, history, for all I know, may well mark its commencement as coextensive with the rise of one astonishing chamber music ensemble after another from that sunny land. The Quintetto, which contains two 'celli and was first heard here two years ago in the Mason Foundation series, proved itself a fitting guardian of the tradition in rendering one of Boccherini's 113 'cello quintets, Malipiero's Symphony for Five Strings and the great Schubert C major quintet. This ensemble's smoothness, purity of intonation and refinement of phrasing more than met even the fearfully exacting standard of Kresge Hall's acoustics. That a group can play so spiritedly when its concert fare, in the almost total absence of a 'cello quintet literature, for the past 7 years of necessity can have been little other than Boccherini. in ...

...Newton Annual Luncheon — at ...

April 28—Jewish Memorial Hospital Celebrities' Night — Boston Garden.
April 25—Women's Division CJA Annual Meeting — Hotel Somerset.
April 29-30—New England Sinai Hospital Annual Luncheon — Hotel Bradford.
May 1—Rho Pi Phi Ladies' Auxiliary Annual Luncheon — Commonwealth Country Club.
May 1-2—Sisterhood Temple Bnai Moshe Annual Luncheon — Rabbi Joseph Shubow Auditorium.
May 3—Boston Aid to Blind, Inc., Annual Meeting — Temple Ohabei Shalom Center.
May 6—Women's Division, Israel Histadruth Annual Luncheon — Hotel Somerset.
May 6—Ladies' Auxiliary of Maimonides Institute Life Membership Luncheon — Dorothy Quincy Suite.
May 7—Beth Israel Hospital Women's Auxiliary Annual Luncheon — Commonwealth Armory.
May 14—Sisterhood Temple Beth Hillel Annual Luncheon—Hotel Bradford.
May 13—Jewish Women's Convalescent Home Annual Luncheon — Rabbi Louis M. Epstein Auditorium.

Sidney Hill Coun...

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 1 - 1956

Munch Leads Eroica Symphony In First Boston Program

Boston.—The Boston Symphony has returned from Europe and the USSR with a halo of glory about it. Its adventures across the seas from Aug. 24 to Sept. 25 were a series of triumphs with the publics of each city visited. Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux and the players were acclaimed with an intensity of sound and an abundance of flowers, everywhere they played, that was truly amazing.

Thus the opening of the 76th season, at Symphony Hall on Oct. 5, had a heightened quality of expectation. The applause was somewhat warmer than customary (though always very cordial), and when the audience rose in greeting as Mr. Munch first appeared on stage, they remained standing a little longer than usual.

Only One Rehearsal

The initial program contained no new music, for there had been time for but one rehearsal. (The final group had arrived back from Europe late Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, and required one day of rest). Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was followed by the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Beethoren's "Eroica" Symphony as the final work.

Since the orchestra had played the "Eroica" eight times on tour, it might well have been worn thin for them, temporarily, but you would not have guessed so from the brisk and muscular performance. To be sure, the detail of the funeral march was not so delicate in section balance or articulation as I would have liked. But that, I think, was a matter of the conductor's temperament; he plays the movement with direct progress and long line, as if impatient of its sculptured ornamentation.

Soloist in the Beethoven Concerto was Wolfgang Schneiderhan, who was making his American debut on this occasion. A resourceful technician and obviously a good musician, he did not once indulge in personal display. The intimacy, extreme clarity of note, phrase, and nuance, and the tenderness, also, of his playing made me think somewhat of Fritz Kreisler. This was not an incandescent or a "big" reading; but it was not ... beautiful.

The music season otherwise ... begun slowly, as invariably it do... Carmen Prii, an Estonian violi... with a big tone and style, made ... local debut as the first event in ... Baltic Concert Series at Jordan H... on Sept. 28. Her playing was wa... and intelligent, with nothing d... cately feminine ... An exact... program include... Bach-Chacon... for unaccompanied instrument; ... D minor Sonata, Op. 108, of Brahms ... and Ravel's "Tzigane." Juta Va... was the accompanist.

The Societa Co... from Italy g... two concerts in Jordan Hall, Oc... and 5, thereby opening another s... son of free programs given under a... pices of the Mason Music Foun... tion. This excellent ensemble, of ... warm, Mediterranean tone and m... ner, presented two programs of 1... early 19th-century music from ... hands, most notably, Vivaldi ... Corelli. Large and cordial au... attended.

...ly Frey has been ... vis... of the early season, appearing at ... n Hall Oct. 7. This accomplished ... but able violinist offered the ... (1939) by Walter Piston; ...ss's G major Sonata, Op. 78; ... major Fantasy, Op. 159, by ...ert; and Saint-Saëns's B minor ...rto, all with the competent key... partnership of Martin Boykan. ... music-making, indeed.

...ozart's Mass in C minor (K. ... which the Handel and Haydn ...ty had presented last spring, was ...n again, at Symphony Hall Oct. ... aid the Robert A. Taft Memor... foundation. As before, Thomp... Stone conducted a vital perform... ...one even exciting. Three of the ...oloists had sung their parts last ...March: Eleanor Davis, mezzo-so... ...prano; Carl Nelson, tenor; and John ...Hornor, bass. Again they exhibited ...sound ability. Irene Jordan, soprano, ...sed her large voice well, though the ...tone often had a curiously "covered" ...quality. —Cyrus Durgin

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union Leader (m) & (e)
MANCHESTER, N. H.
Independent
Circ. 45,622

NOV 6 - 1956

Lesson from Tanglewood

To the Editors: This summer I attended a concert in Tanglewood, given by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra with solos by Ruth Posselt, the well known and loved violinist. In that natural, perfectly beautiful spot 7,000 persons listened in awe to the beautiful music—7,000 people, all race, all creeds, and from all walks of life, and so in attune with each other that a pin dropped could be heard during the rendition of the music.

Without any artificial glamor, all these people with a purpose listened. Those who may not have been musicians, nor knowing anything about the theories of composition, still received the message of this beautiful, awe-inspiring music in quiet, natural beauty.

If it were possible that serious future conventions could be held by truly interested parties, without liquor and all the other artificial stimulants that have gone with past conventions, maybe 7,000 people would listen in harmony and purpose and have a feeling of satisfaction and acocmplishment, too.

GRACE TUXBURY.

Manchester.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
Circ. D. 2,092,455 - S. 3,652,302
NOV 3 1956

Music Lovers Win Annie Oakleys

Bourough President John Cashmore (left) and Mrs. Carroll L. Dickson award free tickets to white-bloused music students. Girls will be able to see five concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Brooklyn Academy of Music, the first to start Nov. 10. Winners are (l. to r.) Ruth Levine of 2137 79th St., Brooklyn; concert master of All-City High School orchestra, and Jeanette Noell of 179 Wilson Blvd., Islip Manor, and Eleanor Kistner of 563 E. Harrison St., Long Beach, both honor music students at Bishop McDonell Memorial HS.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record (m)
MERIDEN, Conn.
Independent Republican
Circ. 16,196
NOV 3 - 1956

Boston Audience Wildly Acclaims Swiss Pianist

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's piano concerto number three, 36 minutes later the normally reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
NOV 3 - 1956

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Democratic
Circ. 98,908
NOV 3 - 1956

Haskil Triumphs In Hub Concert

Boston, Nov. 2 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the symphony hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 101,564
NOV 3 - 1956

WOMAN PIANIST RENDS FAMED BOSTON CALM

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anyone else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 22,452
NOV 3 - 1956

Pianist Scores Hit In Boston

Boston, Nov. 2—(AP)—Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

Clara Haskil's American Debut at Symphony

9-56

New Englatd Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
NOV 7 - 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Clara Haskil, Artist of Rank

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Charles Munch conducting in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening. Piano soloist, Clara Haskil.

The program: Mozart, "Paris" Symphony, K.297; Mozart, Piano Concerto in D Minor, K.466; Barber, Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance, Op. 23-A; Schumann, Fourth Symphony.

BY JOHN WM. RILEY

Symphony Hall rang with cheers and thunderous applause last night at the conclusion of Clara Haskil's performance of the Mozart D minor Piano Concerto. Long after this fine and clearly impressive recital had been recalled by the audience and the orchestra, which supported with more than its usual precision. The last time, many members of the audience stood to cheer a woman who had just given them a transcendently beautiful evening of a many-times-familiar masterpiece.

And well they might. In five days Miss Haskil performed the formidable task of playing a concerto four times with the Boston Symphony: the Beethoven Third on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, the Mozart last night. This was a change in program, for the Beethoven was originally scheduled. A program interleaf noted that Dr. Munch had "asked Miss Haskil to play in a Concerto of Mozart," a composer whose work she has recorded in profusion, and with the same delicate sensibilities and strong-bred musicianship that characterized her playing last night.

For here is an artist of rank. As Miss Haskil sat at the piano, listening to the orchestral opening of the concerto, she moped her brow, and her eyes. There were whispers that she was crying. Mayhap. For those opening measures are among Mozart's greatest tragic utterances, and Mr. Munch played them with a quiet intensity that drove into the very hearts.

But then Miss Haskil put hands on keyboard and there emerged notes of pearly clarity, of round beauty. The subtleties of her playing are almost beyond description. One seems to feel, rather than to actually hear them. But such technical things as time accents, slight hesitancies, a touch of rubato, make her work individual and wonderously expressive. Mere is a personality. Yet never once does she intrude upon the composer.

It is very plain that Boston has had a major musical experience in the appearance of Clara Haskil. It would be good to have her record these with the Boston Symphony with the orchestra and conductor.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 1957

Musical Notes

by Walter F. Loeb

Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" in re-orchestrated form was first heard in Boston on Nov. 2 under Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now we hear that Barber's "Essay for Orchestra" will be on the program when Richard Korn, young American conductor, will make his debut in Japan on Jan. 15 with the Asahi Orchestra.

Excerpts From Barber's 'Medea' on Program

By Harold Rogers

There are at least two outstanding reasons why Charles Munch's program yesterday afternoon commanded hearty approbation. The first was the American debut of Clara Haskil, a pianist of superb musicality from Switzerland. The second was the first Boston performance of "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" by Samuel Barber, one of the most imaginative American composers at work today.

Mme Haskil does not employ the grandstand technique. On the contrary, she abhors every device of theatricality. She makes no attempt to dazzle; she does not pound nor bang. No sooner had she played her first notes in the Beethoven Third than one was interested by her velvet singing tone, the sincerity of her musicianship, her artistic self-immolation—as if she were playing alone in her own drawing room.

There is power in Mme Haskil's playing, but not the power of decibels. It is the power that only true musical emotion can engender—a force that flows from the heart. Yet even so, she is not without a fortissimo when she needs one. She gains it, however, not with muscularity, but through a welling up of the spirit.

Dr. Munch carried the Boston Symphony forces along on a par with Mme Haskil's interpretation. When the piece was over, the spontaneity of the ovation was something to marvel at. There were cheers. Many listeners rose in tribute. Mme Haskil was recalled again and again to the stage. Symphony subscribers are fortunate that she will be the soloist in this work tonight, Sunday afternoon and Tuesday night.

Last year Mr. Barber selected a portion of his ballet "Medea" and rescored it for full orchestra. Yesterday, he was present in Symphony Hall to hear Dr. Munch's vital reading. It is no discredit to "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" that it was not accorded an ovation equal to that given Mme Haskil. Most first-rate contemporary works are received with a degree of reserve, even in the most sophisticated music centers.

There are two dominant emotions in this piece—jealousy and revenge. And Mr. Barber's imaginative powers are such that he was able to find harmonic, rhythmic, and tonal combinations that elucidated these emotions on a vivid tonal canvas.

He has employed passages of restless waiting, foreboding, brassy bursts of hatred, seething undercurrents of scaling envy. How easy it is to picture Medea as she plans a horrible retribution for Jason, who has deserted her for another! Mr. Barber combines elements of impressionism, jazz syncopation, and colorism both subtle and bold, building Medea's dance into a spleenful fury.

The burden of the program, however, ran counter to Mr. Barber's drama. Dr. Munch opened with Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," adroitly classical and performed with charm. He closed with the first performance at these concerts of Joaquin Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana," which is not so much a symphony as a tone poem in the manner of Debussy's "Ibéria" and "La Mer."

Composed in 1920, the work follows in the tradition set by Granados and Albeniz. It is redolent of the perfumes of Andalusian nights, with liquid and sparkling dance patterns, with mercurial moods of sadness and joy. Alfred Krips gave us some evocative and plaintive violin solos in the second movement—"Por el rio Guadalquivir."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Republican
Circ. 56,950
NOV 3 - 1956

Audience Cheers Pianist

BOSTON (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance yesterday, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 13,468
NOV 3 - 1956

CLARA HASKIL HAILED BY BOSTON BRAHMINS

BOSTON, Nov. 2—(AP) Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill symphony hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record (m)
MERIDEN, Conn.
Independent Republican
Circ. 16,156

NOV 3 - 1956

Boston Audience Wildly Acclaims Swiss Pianist

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's piano concerto number three, 36 minutes later the normally - reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power — and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Democratic
Circ. 93,908

NOV 3 - 1956

Haskil Triumphs In Hub Concert

Boston, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the symphony hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 101,564

NOV 3 - 1956

WOMAN PIANIST RENDS FAMED BOSTON CALM

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-miute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anyone else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 22,452

NOV 3 - 1956

Pianist Scores Hit In Boston

Boston, Nov. 2—(AP)—Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today,, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

Clara Haskil's American Debut at Symphony

9-56

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Clara Haskil, Artist of Rank

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting, in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening. Piano soloist, Clara Haskil.

For program: Mozart, "Paris" Symphony, K. 297; Mozart, Piano Concerto in D minor, K. 466; Barber, Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance, Op. 23-A; Schumann, Fourth Symphony.

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Symphony Hall rang with cheers and thunderous applause last night at the conclusion of Clara Haskil's performance of the Mozart D minor Piano Concerto. Five times this frail and elderly lady was recalled by the audience and the orchestra, which applauded with more than its usual appreciation. The last time, many members of the audience stood to honor a woman who had just given them a transcendental reading of a many-times familiar work.

And well they might. In five days, Miss Haskil performed the formidable task of playing a concerto four times with the Boston Symphony: the Beethoven Third on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, the Mozart last night. This was a change in program [illegible] Beethoven was originally [illegible] listed. A program interlude noted that Dr. Munch had award M[illegible] [illegible] Fourth Symphony.

She has recorded in profusion, and with the same delicate sensibilities and strong-fibred musicianship that characterized her playing last night.

For here is an artist of rank. As Miss Haskil sat at the piano, listening to the orchestral opening of the concerto, she mopped her brow, and her eyes. There were whispers that she was crying. Maybhap. For those opening measures are among Mozart's greatest tragic utterances, and Mr. Munch played them with a quiet intensity that drove into the very heart.

But then Miss Haskil put hands on keyboard and there emerged notes of pearly clarity, of round beauty. The subtleties of her playing are almost beyond description. One seems to feel, rather than to actually hear them. But such technical things as time accents, slight hesitencies, a touch of rubato, make her work individual and wonderously expressive. Hers is a personal art. Yet never once does she intrude upon the composer.

It is very plain that Boston has had a major musical experience in the appearance of Clara Haskil. It would be good to have her record the e with the Boston Symphony, with the orchestra and conductor that give her such fine-tuned support.

Excerpts From Barber's 'Medea' on Program

By Harold Rogers

There are at least two outstanding reasons why Charles Munch's program yesterday afternoon commanded hearty approbation. The first was the American debut of Clara Haskil, a pianist of superb musicality from Switzerland. The second was the first Boston performance of "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" by Samuel Barber, one of the most imaginative American composers at work today.

Mme Haskil does not employ the grandstand technique. On the contrary, she abhors every device of theatricality. She makes no attempt to dazzle; she does not pound nor bang. No sooner had she played her first notes in the Beethoven Third than one was impressed by her velvet singing tone, the sincerity of her musicianship, her artistic self-immolation—as if she were playing alone in her own drawing room.

There is power in Mme Haskil's playing, but not the power of decibels. It is the power that only true musical emotion can engender—a force that flows from the heart. Yet even so, she is not without a fortissimo when she needs one. She gains it, however, not with muscularity, but through a welling up of the spirit.

* * *

Dr. Munch carried the Boston Symphony's forces along on a par with Mme Haskil's interpretation. When the piece was over, the spontaneity of the ovation was something to marvel at. There were cheers. Many listeners rose in tribute. Mme Haskil was recalled again and again to the stage. Symphony subscribers are fortunate that she will be the soloist in this work tonight, Sunday afternoon, and Tuesday night.

Last year Mr. Barber selected a portion of his ballet "Medea" and rescored it for full orchestra. Yesterday he was present in Symphony Hall to hear Dr. Munch's vital reading. It is no discredit to "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" that it was not accorded an ovation equal to that given Mme Haskil. Most first-rate contemporary works are received with a degree of reserve, even in the most sophisticated music centers.

There are two dominant emotions in this piece—jealousy and revenge. And Mr. Barber's imaginative powers are such that he was able to find harmonic, rhythmic, and tonal combinations that elucidated these emotions on a vivid musical canvas.

* * *

He has employed passages of restless waiting, foreboding, brassy bursts of hatred, seething undercurrents of aching envy. How easy it is to picture Medea as she plans a horrible retribution for Jason, who has deserted her for another! Mr. Barber combines elements of impressionism, jazz syncopation, and a colorism both subtle and bold, building Medea's dance into a spleenful fury.

The burden of the program, however, ran counter to Mr. Barber's drama. Dr. Munch opened with Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," adroitly classical and performed with charm. He closed with the first performance at these concerts of Joaquin Turina's "Sinfonia Sevillana," which is not so much a symphony as a tone poem in the manner of Debussy's "Ibéria" and "La Mer."

Composed in 1920, the work follows in the tradition set by Granados and Albéniz. It is redolent of the perfumes of Andalusian nights, with liquid and sparkling dance patterns, with mercurial moods of sadness and joy. Alfred Krips gave us some, evocative and plaintive violin solos in the second movement—"Por el rio Guadalquivir."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Republican
Circ. 56,950

NOV 3 - 1956

Audience Cheers Pianist

BOSTON (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later, the normally reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance yesterday, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 13,468

NOV 3 - 1956

CLARA HASKIL HAILED BY BOSTON BRAHMINS

BOSTON, Nov. 2—(AP) Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill symphony hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

150

148

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 61,300

NOV 3 - 1956

Bostonians Acclaim Pianist Haskil

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3, the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, resident of Switzerland since 1936, she won critics' acclaim for her power and tonal beauty.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 3 - 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Clara Haskil, pianist. The program:

Overture to "Anacreon"—Cherubini
Concerto N. 3 in C minor, Op. 37 ——Beethoven
Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance ——Barber
Sinfonia sevillana ——Turina

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Had the widowed Schumann in her late '60's appeared yesterday as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, it could hardly have been more astounding than the actual appearance of another Clara, also possibly in her '60's, at this concert. She was Clara Haskil in her American debut with orchestra, and to say she took the audience by storm is a pallid observation indeed: no one in recent years has achieved such an ovation as this tiny, gray-haired, frail-looking woman did yesterday, nor have any deserved it more.

The stage was set from the moment of her entrance: a more improbable apparition could not be imagined. Miss Haskil, Hungarian born but now of Swiss nationality, appeared in a midnight blue taffeta dress with white lapels that might have been handed down by Clara Schumann herself. She wore black flat-heeled shoes but barely to be observed as her dress swept the floor. Her hair, off-white, was loosely drawn into a shapeless bun at the back, as if she had done it without benefit of mirror; her arms seemed thin and bony, her face a vaguely uneven mask. She made her way almost feebly to the instrument, sat down without acknowledging the audience at first, nead bowed, through the preliminary symphony. What in Heaven's name, would happen?

EXQUISITE PHRASING

What did happen when this extraordinary old woman at last addressed herself to the keyboard, her gray head bowed not more than a foot from the keyboard, was one of those magical revelations that occurs in music once in a generation. Accompanied, with superb mastery by Mr. Munch and the orchestra, Miss Haskil gave the most beautiful performance of Beethoven's Third Concerto I ever heard or expect to hear again. Her tone was something ravishing, her phrasing was exquisite; she articulated every note and felt every light and shadow in the interplay of the voices.

She had power, too, but it was the power of perfect control: there was never a suggestion of the percussive, and it seemed to restore the piano to its proper place as a musical instrument of nobility and poetry rather than a thing to be pounded upon. But beyond all this there was a quality of burning inspiration, of utter artistic concentration oblivious to everything but the music itself, that suggested another Wanda Landowska and produced a breathless atmosphere throughout that verged on the uncanny. She took five calls, threading her way through the orchestra (which applauded with uncommon enthusiasm, too) as if she might at any moment trip over a riser on the stage or bump into a music stand (as in fact she did), but her expression never changed.

The expressions that had changed, however, were those of the audience. From the unlatched jaws produced by her appearance, which remained agape throughout her performance, there now issued bravos which together with stamping on the floor and applause made a scene so untypical of a Friday afternoon as to be as improbable as Miss Haskil herself.

VERY GREAT ARTIST

I find I have referred to the pianist as an "old" woman. I do so out of confusion, as one source, one of those generally referred to as "unimpeachable" stated Miss Haskill to be a woman in her 80's. Another equally unimpeachable source stated that she had made her debut in Jordan Hall 30 years ago and was at that time about 30. Whatever the case may be, her appearance suggests the Grandma Moses of music but, unlike that dauntless spirit, she is no primitive. On the contrary, she must be reckoned one of the very great musical artists of the time.

This leaves little room to discourse on Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work I found to be both beautiful and exciting. Its opening moments are exceptionally lovely in a brooding way, and as it works up into Medea's final fury, it presents a panorama of the most ingenious and effective rhythmic devices culminating in a passage of ferocity all but unique in American music. The composer was in the audience and was warmly received. From my view he should have been even more warmly received, for the work clearly reveals the hand of a master.

The concert began with Cherubini's entertaining "Overture to Anacreon" and ended with Turina's "Sinfonia sevillana," also entertaining but tending to be tiresome. Next week's program offers Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and Brahms' First Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 3 - 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Superb New Music and Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Charles Munch music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the fourth program in the Friday-Saturday series: Cherubini: "Anacreon" Overture; Beethoven: Piano Concerto in C minor, No. 3 (Clara Haskil, soloist, first appearances with this Orchestra); Samuel Barber: "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" (first performances in Boston); Turina: Sinfonia sevillana (first performances at these concerts).

By CYRUS DURGIN

Superb new music and a soloist making her first appearance with the Orchestra gave added distinction and excitement to the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The new music was Samuel Barber's ballet excerpt "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," last year re-scored for full orchestra. The soloist is pianist Clara Haskil, Romanian-born and for 20 years a Swiss resident, who gave a marvelously clean and subtle performance of a work far too seldom heard, the C minor Concerto of Beethoven.

The great virtue of "Medea" is its genuinely dramatic nature. Mr. Barber is no assiduous arranger of abstractions, but a composer with the gift for conveying the stormy depths of human emotion in music. Perhaps "Medea" might make an even greater impression if heard as foundation for the dance of Medea as she ponders the treachery of Jason and the murder of their children, among the most grisly episodes in mythology. Yet purely as concert music, this interlude takes hold of you powerfully, and that is a test of its worth.

From the eerie, ominous beginnings to the brutish din of vengeance, a climax which depicts dark passion with a technical cunning worthy of Richard Strauss and "Salome" (which it recalls), "Medea" is an emotional and a musical crescendo of enormous force. The writing here is absoltuely expert, especially the parts for percussion, in which every beat on wood or metal counts perceptibly in the total effect. Yet it is no imitation of "Salome," for the affinity between the two scores is in mood, not in idiom. Mr. Barber was roundly applauded and, leaving his seat to shake hands with Mr. Munch, bowed in response.

It had been thought that Clara Haskil had not visited this country before, but that was an error of oversight. She gave a concert in Jordan Hall Jan. 19, 1927, when she was described as a "pianist of brilliant, if somewhat provocative and erratic gifts." That was nearly 30 years ago. Today Miss Haskil is a pianist of utmost musical integrity, with nothing wayward, interpretively, except a liking for a little delicate rubato here and there.

Her performance of the C minor Concerto was a model of restraint, proportion, clean articulation and rhythmic exactitude and subtlety, almost unique in its avoidance of any personal display. This was, paradoxically, a brilliant performance because it avoided conscious brilliance. Today this sort of playing is very rare. It is also highly treasurable.

A small, seemingly frail woman, who looks grandmotherly with her abundant gray-white hair and her slightly humped back, Miss Haskil crouches over the instrument, an embodiment of cool concentration. There is, about the spare motion of her arms and long hands that absence of visible effort which indicates the seasoned master of technic. There is, in the strung-pearls evenness of scale passages and little figurations, that musical sense which makes them "sing" as beautifully as do the broad Beethoven melodies.

Her dynamic range is finely adjusted: when the music is supposed to be soft it is very soft, and a fortissimo is scaled accordingly. She was with the orchestra every second, and they with her, which produced one of the most splendid examples of hair-spun ensemble in my memory. Here was that rare greatness of simplicity in art. How well Miss Haskil deserved the applause, stamping and cheers which brought her back to the stage four times!

Turina's Sevillian Symphony, new to these concerts and likely to the city, is a well-wrought quasi-descriptive piece in more or less Impressionist style with Iberian spice and languors, lush solos and crisp, tapping rhythms. The three movements make a symphony in but the most general ways; this is really a species of program music coming late (1920) in the chronology of that type, but most attractive.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra were at their best all afternoon. Everything had a true glory of sound, and the strings had recaptured their old lapidary richness.

Next week's program: Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Ballet Suite, "Card Game"; Brahms' First Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 41,625

NOV 3 - 1956

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

NOV 6 - 1956

At Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, gives the third concert of the Tuesday series tonight. The first of the Open Rehearsals will be Thursday at 7:30 P.M.

Clara Haskil is soloist tonight for the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto. The rest of the program is Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, K. 297, Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and the Fourth Symphony by Robert Schuman.

The program for the Friday and Saturday concerts will consist of Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra with a solo string quartet, a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Card Game" and the First Symphony by Brahms. This program will also be the subject of the first Open Rehearsal on the Thursday evening previous.

Clara Haskill Enthralls With Beethoven Concerto

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's piano concerto No. 3 the Symphony hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony orchestra was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The grayhaired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil Gets Wild Applause At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahms' subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 3 - 1956

CLARA HASKIL WINS WILD APPLAUSE AT CONCERT IN BOSTON

BOSTON (AP) — For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 3 - 1956

Pianist of Another Era Plays, Hub Audience Cheers, Weeps

Boston—(AP)—Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally reserved audience of music lovers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform.

This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known to Americans in recent years only through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance yesterday, listeners exclaimed at her power and beauty of tone. One shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 61,300

NOV 3 - 1956

Bostonians Acclaim Pianist Haskil

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3, the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she won critics' acclaim for her power and tonal beauty.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 3 - 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Clara Haskil, pianist. The program:

Overture to "Anacreon"—Cherubini
Concerto N. 3 in C minor, Op. 37—Beethoven
Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance"—Barber
Sinfonia sevillana—Turina

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Had the widowed Schumann in her late '60's appeared yesterday as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, it could hardly have been more astounding than the actual appearance of another Clara, also possibly in her 60's, at this concert. She was Clara Haskil in her American debut with orchestra, and to say she took the audience by storm is a pallid observation indeed: no one in recent years has achieved such an ovation as this tiny, gray-haired, frail-looking woman did yesterday, nor have any deserved it more.

The stage was set from the moment of her entrance: a more improbable apparition could not be imagined. Miss Haskil, Hungarian born but now of Swiss nationality, appeared in a midnight blue taffeta dress with white lapels that might have been handed down by Clara Schumann herself. She wore black flat-heeled shoes but barely to be observed as her dress swept the floor. Her hair, off-white, was loosely drawn into a shapeless bun at the back, as if she had done it without benefit of mirror; her arms seemed thin and bony, her face a vaguely uneven mask. She made her way almost feebly to the instrument, sat down without acknowledging the audience's applause, head bowed, through the preliminary symphony. What, in heaven's name, would happen?

EXQUISITE PHRASING

What did happen, when this extraordinary old woman at last addressed herself to the keyboard, her grey head bowed not more than a foot from the keyboard, was one of those magical revelations that occurs in music once in a generation. Accompanied, with superb mastery, by Mr. Munch and the orchestra, Miss Haskil gave the most beautiful performance of Beethoven's Third Concerto I ever heard or expect to hear again. Her tone was something ravishing, her phrasing was exquisite; she articulated every note and found every light and shadow in the interplay of the voices.

She had power, too, but it was the power of perfect control: there was never a suggestion of the percussive, and it seemed to restore the piano to its proper place as a musical instrument of nobility and poetry rather than a thing to be pounded upon. But beyond all this there was a quality of burning inspiration, an utter artistic concentration oblivious to everything but the music itself, that suggested another Wanda Landowska and produced a breathless atmosphere throughout that verged on the uncanny. She took five calls, threading her way through the orchestra (which applauded with uncommon enthusiasm, too) as if she might at any moment trip over a riser on the stage, or bump into a music stand (as in fact she did), but her expression never changed.

The expressions that had changed, however, were those of the audience. From the unlatched jaws produced by her appearance, which remained agape throughout her performance, there now issued bravos which together with stamping on the floor and applause made a scene so untypical of a Friday afternoon as to be as improbable as Miss Haskil herself.

VERY GREAT ARTIST

I find I have referred to the pianist as an "old" woman. I do so out of confusion, as one source, one of those generally referred to as "unimpeachable" stated Miss Haskill to be a woman in her 80's. Another equally unimpeachable source stated that she had made her debut in Jordan Hall 30 years ago and was at that time about 30. Whatever the case may be, her appearance suggests the Grandma Moses of music but, unlike that dauntless spirit, she is no primitive. On the contrary, she must be reckoned one of the very great musical artists of the time.

This leaves little room to discourse on Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work I found to be both beautiful and exciting. Its opening moments are exceptionally lovely in a brooding way, and, as it works up into Medea's final fury, it presents a panorama of the most ingenious and effective rhythmic devices culminating in a passage of ferocity all but unique in American music. The composer was in the audience and was warmly received. From my view he should have been even more warmly received, for the work clearly reveals the hand of a master.

The concert began with Cherubini's entertaining "Overture to Anacreon" and ended with Turina's "Sinfonia sevillana," also entertaining but tending to be tiresome. Next week's program offers Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and Brahms' First Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 3 - 1956

Pianist of Another Era Plays, Hub Audience Cheers, Weeps

Boston—(AP)—Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later, the normally reserved audience of music lovers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform.

This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known to Americans in recent years only through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance yesterday, listeners exclaimed at her power and beauty of tone. One shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 3 - 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Superb New Music and Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Charles Munch music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight, at Symphony Hall, the fourth program in the Friday–Saturday series: Cherubini: "Anacreon" Overture; Beethoven: Piano Concerto in C minor, No. 3 (Clara Haskil, soloist, first appearances with this Orchestra); Samuel Barber: "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" (first performances in Boston); Turina: Sinfonia sevillana (first performances at these concerts).

By CYRUS DURGIN

Superb new music and a soloist making her first appearance with the Orchestra gave added distinction and excitement to the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The new music was Samuel Barber's ballet excerpt "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," last year re-scored for full orchestra. The soloist is pianist Clara Haskil, Romanian-born and for 20 years a Swiss resident, who gave a marvelously clean and subtle performance of a work far too seldom heard: the C minor Concerto of Beethoven.

The great virtue of "Medea" is its genuinely dramatic nature. Mr. Barber is no assiduous arranger of abstractions, but a composer with the gift for conveying the stormy depths of human emotion in music. Perhaps "Medea" might make an even greater impression if heard as foundation for the dance of Medea as she ponders the treachery of Jason and the murder of their children, among the most grisly episodes in mythology. Yet purely as concert music, this interlude takes hold of you powerfully, and that is a test of its worth.

From the eerie, ominous beginnings to the brutish din of vengeance, a climax which depicts dark passion with a technical cunning worthy of Richard Strauss and "Salome" (which it recalls), "Medea" is an emotional and a musical crescendo of enormous force. The writing here is absolutely expert, especially the parts for percussion, in which every beat on wood or metal counts perceptibly in the total effect. Yet it is no imitation of "Salome," for the affinity between the two scores is in mood, not in idiom. Mr. Barber was roundly applauded and, leaving his seat to shake hands with Mr. Munch, bowed in response.

It had been thought that Clara Haskil had not visited this country before, but that was an error of oversight. She gave a concert in Jordan Hall Jan. 19, 1927, when she was described as a "pianist of brilliant, if somewhat provocative and erratic gifts." That was nearly 30 years ago. Today Miss Haskil is a pianist of utmost musical integrity, with nothing wayward, interpretively, except a liking for a little delicate rubato here and there.

Her performance of the C minor Concerto was a model of restraint, proportion, clean articulation and rhythmic exactitude and subtlety, almost unique in its avoidance of any personal display. This was, paradoxically, a brilliant performance because it avoided conscious brilliance. Today this sort of playing is very rare. It is also highly treasurable.

A small, seemingly frail woman, who looks grandmotherly with her abundant gray-white hair and her slightly humped back, Miss Haskil crouches over the instrument, an embodiment of cool concentration. There is, about the spare motion of her arms and long hands that absence of visible effort which indicates the seasoned master of technic. There is, in the strung-pearls evenness of scale passages and little figurations, that musical sense which makes them "sing" as beautifully as do the broad Beethoven melodies.

Her dynamic range is finely adjusted: when the music is supposed to be soft it is very soft, and a fortissimo is scaled accordingly. She was with the orchestra every second, and they with her, which produced one of the most splendid examples of hair-spun ensemble in my memory. Here was that rare greatness of simplicity in art. How well Miss Haskil deserved the applause, stamping and cheers which brought her back to the stage four times!

Turina's Sevillian Symphony, new to these concerts and likely to the city, is a well-wrought quasi-descriptive piece in more or less Impressionist style with Ibe-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 41,625
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskill Enthralls With Beethoven Concerto

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's piano concerto No. 3 the Symphony hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony orchestra was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The grayhaired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 3 - 1956

CLARA HASKIL WINS WILD APPLAUSE AT CONCERT IN BOSTON

BOSTON (AP) — For the 36-minute duration of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 the Symphony Hall audience sat enraptured. But then the normally staid audience rose to its feet wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some even wept.

At the grand piano, surrounded by the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra was Clara Haskil, for the most part known to American audiences only through her recordings.

The gray-haired, stooped Miss Haskil had made her first American concert performance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania and a resident of Switzerland since 1936, she resembled a hesitant grandmother during her Friday afternoon concert.

Listeners and critics acclaimed her power and tonal beauty. Said one veteran subscriber: "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

rian spice and ... and crisp, ... three ... phony in ... way: this ... program music ... in the chronolo... but most attractive.

Mr. Munch ... were at the ... Everything, ... sound, and the strings ... tured their old ... richness.

Next week's program: Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Ballet ... "Card Game"; Brahms' ...

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
NOV 4 - 1956

At Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, gives the third concert of the Tuesday series tonight. The first of the Open Rehearsals will be Thursday at 7:30 P.M.

Clara Haskil is soloist tonight for the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto. The rest of the program is Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, K. 297, Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and the Fourth Symphony by Robert Schuman.

The program for the Friday and Saturday concerts will consist of Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra with a solo string quartet, a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Card Game" and the First Symphony by Brahms. This program will also be the subject of the first Open Rehearsal on the Thursday evening previous.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613
NOV 3 1956

Clara Haskil Gets Wild Applause At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano Wildly Applauded

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 12 1956

James F. Coyne
CONDUCTOR MUNCH & PIANIST HASKIL
One of those magical revelations.

Grande Ambiance

The audience sat rapt and bewitched. Not a feathered toque or a velvet pillbox moved in Boston's Symphony Hall. There was something vastly appealing about the frail, hunched woman as she bent over the keyboard; her playing of Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 was filled with a rare kind of fire, poetry and sadness. Bucharest-born Pianist Clara Haskil, 61, was making her first U.S. appearance in 30 years, with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When she finished, the hall reverberated to stamping feet and shouts of "Bravo!" She was called back an unprecedented five times.

Offstage, Pianist Haskil is a plain woman who wears no makeup to conceal the traces of suffering that line her face, but her features are livened by wisdom and humor. She was a prodigy, made her debut in Vienna at the age of nine, and won a Grand Prix at the Paris Conservatory at 14. After World War I, illness forced her into temporary retirement; later she took up playing sonatas with such greats as Ysaye, Enesco, Casals. She has appeared

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,780

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A Triumph At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Romania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

November 7-56
151
10  Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIE

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

If words could adequately capture the essence of Clara Haskil's music, there would be no need to hear her—indeed, there would be no need for music itself. But perhaps a quatrain by Aubrey Thomas de Vere comes close to summing up her delicate artistry:

"In holy music's golden speech
Remotest notes to notes respond:
Each octave is a world; yet each
Vibrates to worlds its own beyond."

There were the qualities of infinity—worlds beyond worlds—in Mme Haskil's playing in Symphony Hall last night. Be it a simple Mozartian scale, a limpid trill, an appoggiatura, or a melody played by single notes—through these guileless things came a flood of musical emotion that carried one's heart and spirit beyond the walls of Symphony Hall.

This was the pianist's fourth appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra within a week. She had been scheduled to play the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto on all four programs, but Charles Munch asked her to change to Mozart's D minor, K. 466, for last night's concert.

This was an excellent idea. Mme Haskil's Beethoven was incredibly beautiful, but her Mozart was one of those rare experiences that come too seldom in the life of a music lover. Listeners do not give a standing tribute without good reason—not in Boston, at least—and many rose in gratitude to Mme Haskil last night.

Th[illegible] was "a skilled pianist and musician, but above all else an interpreter who seeks out the core and essence of her music, rather than one who contents herself with its outer form."

These observations still apply to Mme Haskil's playing. Last night one was constantly caught up in the exquisite beauty of her phrasing, her limpid, singing tone, burnished like gold, her flawless and caressing touch, her devotion to the Mozartian ideal. As one listener said afterward: "Now I know how Mozart himself would have played it!"

Whatever the reasons for Mme Haskil's 30-year hiatus between visits to Boston, we know that she has not been idle meanwhile. Her many recordings attest to her activity on the European scene. But we urge her to make annual visits to Boston hereafter. Or even oftener.

Yugoslav Dancers

Following its recent performance in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Yugoslav State Company of folk dancers known as "Kolo" has embarked on a ten-week tour of leading cities which will bring the group to Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday evening, Dec. 14.

The company of 55 dancers, singers, and musicians, performing in colorful costumes, will present for the first time in America its "Slavonic Rhapsody," which combines the wealth of Yugoslav national dance styles, including those of the diverse races—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians, Montenegrins, and Macedonians—which make up modern Yugoslavia.

Haskil Has Notable Success With Boston Symphony

Boston.—Few hereabouts knew much about pianist Clara Haskil when she bowed from the stage at Symphony Hall, Nov. 2, before seating herself to play the Beethoven C minor Concerto with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony. She was said to have a big European reputation, and that was about all.

I remembered that she had appeared at the first Casals Bach Festival in Prades, France, in 1950—but after I had left. Office records revealed that she had played here in 1925 and 1927, when a reviewer had characterized her as a "pianist of brilliant if somewhat provocative and erratic gifts".

Miss Haskil looked grandmotherly and frail, wearing a gown of subdued colors and with her abundant gray-white hair wound into a bun at the back. She sat throughout crouched over the keyboard, an embodiment of cool concentration. But the performance she gave, to a truly gorgeous orchestral collaboration, brought Miss Haskil applause, stamping, and cheers when it was over.

It was a model of restraint, propor-

■ In Boston the well-known European pianist, Clara Haskil, made what really must be considered her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2 and 3. Miss Haskil had made a previous visit to this country and her records have been widely sold here, but until this visit she had not been publicly heard by American audiences on any scale. Her performance in the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 confirmed her European reputation as a sensitive and deeply musical pianist. Yet one might have wished that she had chosen to open her American concerts with a Mozart concerto, for her style seems to be made to order for that composer.

As it was, Miss Haskil did not appear completely at ease, particularly since she and Charles Munch differed [illegible]hore than one point. The soloist's [illegible]mpt to use flexibility of rhythm [illegible] not completely understood by the [illegible]ers or their conductor. Perhaps [illegible]e was not sufficient rehearsal time [illegible] perhaps the pianist needs to get [illegible]sted to American conditions, so [illegible]kedly different in many respects [illegible]n what she has been used to. But [illegible]e was no doubt whatever that the [illegible], stooped, white-haired artist [illegible]ed enormously with her audience. [illegible]he balance of the program was [illegible]erbly conducted and played, with [illegible]ch giving brilliant readings of the [illegible]rubini "Anacreon" Overture, Sam[illegible] Barber's "Medea's Meditation and [illegible]ce of Vengeance," with the com[illegible]er present for this first Boston [illegible]ring, and the Turina "Sinfonia [illegible]illana."

JULES WOLFFERS

piano?
y Hall,
turday, pipe which ven C
Symrnoon.
ndker-
e pipe was e the ment.
o the ard—
—and from Na-ants,
ons,
USIC einner to had ood

this superb music is its g[illegible] dramatic nature. Mr. Barber, who was present and was well received, is no assiduous arranger of abstractions, but a composer with the gift for conveying the stormy depths of human emotion.

The program began with Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, and ended with the first performance at these concerts of Turina's "Sinfonia sevillana", a work of 1920 which proved authentically Iberian in more or less impressionist style — quasi-descriptive late program music and pleasant, but somewhat too long.

One week earlier Mr. Munch and the orchestra had introduced to this city the Fifth Symphony by Walter Piston. The work had been written on commission for the Juilliard School and had had a single performance there last February. In certain respects, the Fifth Symphony is the most personal of Piston's half-dozen. Harmonically, it is bold, astringent, and of the day. In the orchestration, which is most original in some pages and a little Debussyan in others, the symphony is distinguished.

Mr. Munch conducted the slow movement—in a version for massed strings—of the F major String Quartet, Op. 135, of Beethoven, in memory of Leslie J. Rogers. Senior member of the orchestra, and for many years its librarian, Mr. Rogers had contracted pneumonia during the European tour and died at Stuttgart, Western Germany, Oct. 11. First number of the program was Mozart's "Paris" Symphony (K. 297), and the last, Schumann's D minor Symphony. All were superbly performed.

Thanks to the largesse of the Mason Music Foundation (which was reported to have paid an unusually high fee for the privilege), the extraordinary young German baritone, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, was introduced to Boston at Jordan Hall, Oct. 23. The concert was free and drew a near-capacity audience. Mr. Fischer-

Symphony for Five Strings, [illegible] be new here and to have been written for this group about a decade ago. It is an appealing score, less rigorous harmonically than some of the earlier Malipiero music I know. Boccherini's Quintet in C minor, Op. 29, No. 1, and the C major Quintet, Op. 163, of Schubert (marvelously played) made the remainder of the list.

The Early Music Society of Cambridge began its usual fall series of three concerts in Sanders Theater, Oct. 29, with a program devoted to Telemann. Harpsichordist Erwin Bodky, Alfred Mann, recorder, and musicians from the Boston Symphony were the artists. It was a nice evening, both of musical archeology and listening pleasure.

Pinkham's "Wedding Cantata"

A somewhat pallid but ably-written "Wedding Cantata" by Daniel Pinkham received a first performance when the New England Conservatory Alumni Chorus was conducted by Lorna Cooke de Varon at Jordan Hall Nov. 6. Bach's Cantata, "Christ Lay In Bonds of Death", and "Tom O'Bedlam", by Jacob Avshalomov, were important items of the program.

The opening of the 29th series of Boston Morning Musicales, in aid of the Boston School of Occupational Therapy, in the Hotel Statler ballroom, Nov. 7, was also the first solo concert here by soprano Eileen Farrell. She sang ably an assorted program from Bach, Verdi, Joseph Marx, Strauss, Duparc, Poulenc, and others. But she gave a brilliant performance of that difficult old war horse, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!", from Weber's "Oberon".

Other concert activity of the fortnight past has included pianist John Moriarty, at Jordan Hall, Oct. 28, and contralto Arimae Burrell, in the same auditorium, Nov. 4.

—Cyrus Durgin

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano Wildly Applauded

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it pl[illegible] anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,790
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A Triumph At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it pl[illegible] anybody else!"

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 12 1956

James F. Coyne
CONDUCTOR MUNCH & PIANIST HASKIL
One of those magical revelations.

Grande Ambiance

The audience sat rapt and bewitched. Not a feathered toque or a velvet pillbox moved in Boston's Symphony Hall. There was something vastly appealing about the frail, hunched woman as she bent over the keyboard; her playing of Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 was filled with a rare kind of fire, poetry and sadness. Bucharest-born Pianist Clara Haskil, 61, was making her first U.S. appearance in 30 years, with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When she finished, the hall reverberated to stamping feet and shouts of "Bravo!" She was called back an unprecedented five times.

Offstage, Pianist Haskil is a plain woman who wears no makeup to conceal the traces of suffering that line her face, but her features are livened by wisdom and humor. She was a prodigy, made her debut in Vienna at the age of nine, and won a Grand Prix at the Paris Conservatory at 14. After World War I, illness forced her into temporary retirement; later she took up playing sonatas with such greats as Ysaye, Enesco, Casals. She has appeared

November 7-56
151
10 Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIE

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

If words could adequately capture the essence of Clara Haskil's music, there would be no need to hear her — indeed, there would be no need for music itself. But perhaps a quatrain by Aubrey Thomas de Vere comes close to summing up her delicate artistry:

"In holy music's golden speech
Remotest notes to notes respond:
Each octave is a world; yet each
Vibrates to worlds its own beyond."

There were the qualities of infinity—worlds beyond worlds—in Mme Haskil's playing in Symphony Hall last night. Be it a simple Mozartian scale, a limpid trill, an appoggiatura, or a [illegible] played by single notes—[illegible] these guileless things [illegible] mood of musical emotion [illegible] one's heart and [illegible] the walls of Sym-

[illegible] pianist's fourth [illegible] the Boston [illegible] within a [illegible] been scheduled [illegible] Third [illegible] four pro- [illegible] much asked [illegible] Mozart's D [illegible] night's [illegible] idea. [illegible] was [illegible] but her [illegible] those rare [illegible] come too sel- [illegible] of a music lover. [illegible] do not give a standing [illegible] without good reason— [illegible] in Boston, at least—and [illegible] many rose in gratitude to Mme Haskil last night.

[illegible] was "a skilled pianist and musician, but above all else an interpreter who seeks out the core and essence of her music, rather than one who contents herself with its outer form."

These observations still apply to Mme Haskil's playing. Last night one was constantly caught up in the exquisite beauty of her phrasing, her limpid, singing tone, burnished like gold, her flawless and caressing touch, her devotion to the Mozartian ideal. As one listener said afterward: "Now I know how Mozart himself would have played it!"

Whatever the reasons for Mme Haskil's 30-year hiatus between visits to Boston, we know that she has not been idle meanwhile. Her many recordings attest to her activity on the European scene. But we urge her to make annual visits to Boston hereafter. Or even oftener.

Yugoslav Dancers

Following its recent performance in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Yugoslav State Company of folk dancers known as "Kolo" has embarked on a ten-week tour of leading cities which will bring the group to Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday evening, Dec. 14.

The company of 55 dancers, singers, and musicians, performing in colorful costumes, will present for the first time in America its "Slavonic Rhapsody," which combines the wealth of Yugoslav national dance styles, including those of the diverse races—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians, Montenegrins, and Macedonians—which make up modern Yugoslavia.

With Ballet and Gala Evening

National Symphony Report

Washington, D. C.—The National Symphony, which entered its 26th year quietly on November 2, opened and ended its 1956-57 season with the first two weeks of an ambitious program of numerous concert of the National Symphony on a chill Sunday afternoon early in November. The first two weeks of a music lover. Twenty-five years ago it would be more than a connoisseur's which finds the largest subscription to the day and management of the Boston New Philadelphia Ballet on the subscription series. Howard Mitchell, conductor of the Royal Danish Orchestra and the innovation of Wednesday evening performances, put the Boston Orchestra ideas of giving concerts in pairs, in addition to the Tuesday afternoon subscription series. Tuesday this subscribed audience has proved to be a structure. This year marks the 15th year of the Symphony's history.

Haskil last night.

Thanks to the largesse of the Mason Music Foundation (which was reported to have paid an unusually high fee for the privilege), the extraordinary young German baritone, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, was introduced to Boston at Jordan Hall, Oct. 23. The concert was free and drew a near-capacity audience. Mr. Fischer-Dieskau reinforced the impression gained here from his recordings that he is already a notable lieder artist and likely will become a great one. To the excellent piano-playing of Leo Taubman, the baritone sang a half-dozen songs from the "Schwanengesang" cycle of Schubert, and Schumann's "Dichterliebe" cycle.

The Quintetto Boccherini made its local debut in the Humanities Series of Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Kresge Auditorium, Oct. 28. This Italian ensemble is a very superior if not faultless one, and gave a large audience much pleasure. Highlight of the program was Malipiero's Symphony for Five Strings, said to be new here and to have been written for this group about a decade ago. It is an appealing score, less rigorous harmonically than some of the earlier Malipiero music I know. Boccherini's Quintet in C minor, Op. 29, No. 1, and the C major Quintet, Op. 163, of Schubert (marvelously played) made the remainder of the list.

The Early Music Society of Cambridge began its usual fall series of three concerts in Sanders Theater, Oct. 29, with a program devoted to Telemann. Harpsichordist Erwin Bodky, Alfred Mann, recorder, and musicians from the Boston Symphony were the artists. It was a nice evening, both of musical archeology and listening pleasure.

Pinkham's "Wedding Cantata"

A somewhat pallid but ably-written "Wedding Cantata" by Daniel Pinkham received a first performance when the New England Conservatory Alumni Chorus was conducted by Lorna Cooke de Varon at Jordan Hall Nov. 6. Bach's Cantata, "Christ Lay In Bonds of Death", and "Tom O'Bedlam", by Jacob Avshalomov, were important items of the program.

The opening of the 29th series of Boston Morning Musicales, in aid of the Boston School of Occupational Therapy, in the Hotel Statler ballroom, Nov. 7, was also the first solo concert here by soprano Eileen Farrell. She sang ably an assorted program from Bach, Verdi, Joseph Marx, Strauss, Duparc, Poulenc, and others. But she gave a brilliant performance of that difficult old war horse, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!", from Weber's "Oberon".

Other concert activity of the fortnight past has included pianist John Moriarty, at Jordan Hall, Oct. 28, and contralto Arimae Burrell, in the same auditorium, Nov. 4.

—Cyrus Durgin

■ In Boston the well-known European pianist, Clara Haskil, made what really must be considered her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2 and 3. Miss Haskil had made a previous visit to this country and her records have been widely sold here, but until this visit she had not been publicly heard by American audiences on any scale. Her performance in the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 confirmed her European reputation as a sensitive and deeply musical pianist. Yet one might have wished that she had chosen to open her American concerts with a Mozart concerto, for her style seems to be made to order for that composer.

As it was, Miss Haskil did not appear completely at ease, particularly since she and Charles Munch differed [illegible]hore than one point. The soloist's [illegible]mpt to use flexibility of rhythm [illegible] not completely understood by the [illegible]ers or their conductor. Perhaps [illegible]e was not sufficient rehearsal time [illegible] perhaps the pianist needs to get [illegible]sted to American conditions, so [illegible]kedly different in many respects [illegible] what she has been used to. But [illegible]e was no doubt whatever that the [illegible], stooped, white-haired artist [illegible]ed enormously with her audience. [illegible]he balance of the program was [illegible]rbly conducted and played, with [illegible]ch giving brilliant readings of the [illegible]rubini "Anacreon" Overture, Sam- [illegible] Barber's "Medea's Meditation and [illegible]ce of Vengeance," with the com- [illegible]r present for this first Boston [illegible]ring, and the Turina "Sinfonia [illegible]llana."

JULES WOLFFERS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano Wildly Applauded

BOSTON, N... and gray-hai... woman in black... hesitant grandr... way uncertainly... through the 104-... phony Orchestra... herself at the gra...

At the conclusio... Piano Concerto N... minutes later th... served audience of... scribers who fill... each Friday afterno... feet, wildly applaud... clamping. Some we... ing.

Again and again, C... unknown to present... can concert audience... plauded back to the pla... was her first America... ance in many years. B... charest, Rumania, and... Switzerland since 1936, ... been known only to Ame... sic lovers in recent years... her recordings.

At the conclusion of t... formance today, listen... claimed at her power—and... of tone. One veteran sub... shook his head and said... want to hear it pl... anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,790
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A... Triumph A...

phony No. 5 in B flat major, ... and concluded with Schubert's Sym... Concerto Grosso No. 15, in A minor, ... an admirable exposition of Handel's ... come off. The afternoon opened with ... never made his performance quite ...ously refined musical gifts, Mr. Foldes ... for piano and orchestra, Mr. Foldes ... zart's Concerto No. 17, in G major, ... his Philadelphia debut, playing Mozart ... conductor and Andor Foldes made ... Music. Nicholas Harsanyi was the ... afternoon concerts at the Academy of ... of its five chamber-music Sundays ... Philadelphia, on Nov. 4, gave the first ... The New Chamber Orchestra ... was a great and deserved success. ... it evident that this unusual evening ... at the piano, and the audience made ... Paul Ulanovsky was brilliantly present ... with great warmth and dedication. ... artistry of the highest caliber, singing ... the love songs. Both singers displayed ... buch," alternating in their delivery of ... Wolf's "Aus dem Italienisches Liederbuch," ... together, singing the 43 songs from ... The artists were always on the stage ... of Hugo Wolf songs at the Academy. ... rich Fischer-Dieskau in a joint recital ... presented Irmgard Seefried and Dietrich ... On Nov. 1, the Philadelphia Forum ... obviously interested. ... and, himself, and the audience was ... Lobos, Ginastera, Guarnieri, Casillo, ... the performances of pieces by Villa-... Herrate played polished and authen-... at the Philadelphia Art Alliance. Mr. ... ing recital of Latin-American music ... Guatemalan pianist, gave an interest-...

Latin-American Music Heard

On Oct. 25, Manuel Herrarte, a ... troopers," made up the balance of the ... program.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 12 1956

November 7-'56
10 Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIE

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

...rds could adequately ... the essence of Clara ...usic, there would be ... hear her—indeed, ... be no need for mu... But perhaps a qua... Aubrey Thomas de ... close to summing up ... artistry:

...usic's golden speech ... notes to notes re...

...e is a world; yet ...o worlds its own."

...the qualities of in... beyond worlds—...kil's playing in ... last night. Be it ...tian scale, a lim... ...poggiatura, or a ...y single notes—... guileless things ... musical emotion ...e's heart and ...walls of Sym...

...anist's fourth ... the Boston ...ra, within a ... scheduled ...oven Third ... four pro... ...nch asked ...zart's D ... night's ... idea. ... was ...but her ...se rare ...po sel... ...lover. ...anding ...son— ...and ...Mme ...ked ...the ...ut ...on ...

...ed ...

Entremont in Joliet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy presented the local premiere of Andrich Giiler's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with a new pianist to play it, Joliver's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, which again scored a success.

Entremont, the 22-year-old French pianist, Philippe Entremont, Both piece and soloist sizzled up quite a bit of excitement in the old Academy. Joliver's piece takes us into a primitive jungle with its drums, tom-toms and earthy rhythms, bringing us to a final bang—the orgiastic confusion of percussion up organic, including xylophones, instruments. This concerto is engaging and much fun and makes demands on all its performers—demands that were brilliantly met.

Mr. Entremont was able to show his technical prowess and artistic stature in a performance of Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. His success was one of the biggest of the yet-young season. Ormandy added a performance of Debussy's rarely heard and a beautiful "Printemps," and a Overture to "The School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber's symphonic suite, "Prayers of Kierkegaard," by Aubrey Thomas de Lee performance of Reinhold Glière's 55-minute symphony, "Ilya Mourametz," was the focal point of the Philadelphia Orchestra's fourth ... the Boston ...ra, within a ... scheduled ...oven Third ... four pro... ...nch asked ...zart's D ... night's ... idea. ... was ...but her ...se rare ...po sel... ...lover. ...anding ...son— ...and ...Mme ...ked ...the ...ut ...on ...

...ed ...

Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he brought glowing tone and much technical virtuosity. He also repeated Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for Orchestra, which again scored a success.

Entremont in Joliet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy presented the local premiere of Andrich Giiler's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with a new pianist to play it, Joliver's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, which again scored a success.

Entremont, the 22-year-old French pianist, Philippe Entremont, Both piece and soloist sizzled up quite a bit of excitement in the old Academy. Joliver's piece takes us into a primitive jungle with its drums, tom-toms and earthy rhythms, bringing us to a final bang—the orgiastic confusion of percussion up organic, including xylophones, instruments. This concerto is engaging and much fun and makes demands on all its performers—demands that were brilliantly met.

Mr. Entremont was able to show his technical prowess and artistic stature in a performance of Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. His success was one of the biggest of the yet-young season. Ormandy added a performance of Debussy's rarely heard and a beautiful "Printemps," and a Overture to "The School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber's symphonic suite, "Prayers of Kierkegaard," by Aubrey Thomas de Lee performance of Reinhold Glière's 55-minute symphony, "Ilya Mourametz," was the focal point of the Philadelphia Orchestra's fourth ... the Boston ...ra, within a ... scheduled ...oven Third ... four pro... ...nch asked ...zart's D ... night's ... idea. ... was ...but her ...se rare ...po sel... ...lover. ...anding ...son— ...and ...Mme ...ked ...the ...ut ...on ...

...ed ...

Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he brought glowing tone and much technical virtuosity. He also repeated Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for Orchestra, which again scored a success.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes was soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, playing the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 with exquisite style and finish and a strong personal touch to wit. The hearty approval of the audience ... Eugene Ormandy programmed a first performance by the orchestra here of Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he brought glowing tone and much technical virtuosity. He also repeated Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for Orchestra, which again scored a success.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes was soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, playing the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 with exquisite style and finish and a strong personal touch to wit. The hearty approval of the audience ... Eugene Ormandy programmed a first performance by the orchestra here of Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he brought glowing tone and much technical virtuosity. He also repeated Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for Orchestra, which again scored a success.

On Nov. 1, the Philadelphia Forum ... obviously interested. ... and, himself, and the audience was ... Lobos, Ginastera, Guarnieri, Casillo, ... the performances of pieces by Villa-... Herrate played polished and authen-... at the Philadelphia Art Alliance. Mr. ... ing recital of Latin-American music ... Guatemalan pianist, gave an interest-...

Latin-American Music Heard

On Oct. 25, Manuel Herrarte, a ... troopers," made up the balance of the ... program.

...ed ...

...ed ...

...ed ...

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano Wildly Applauded

BOSTON, N[illegible] and gray-hai[illegible] woman in black [illegible] hesitant grandm[illegible] way uncertainly [illegible] through the 104-p[illegible] phony Orchestra [illegible] herself at the gra[illegible]

At the conclusio[illegible] Piano Concerto N[illegible] minutes later th[illegible] served audience of [illegible] scribers who fill [illegible] each Friday afterno[illegible] feet, wildly applaud[illegible] stamping. Some wer[illegible] ing.

Again and again, C[illegible] unknown to present[illegible] can concert audience[illegible] plauded back to the pla[illegible] was her first America[illegible] ance in many years. B[illegible] charest, Rumania, and [illegible] Switzerland since 1936, [illegible] been known only to Amer[illegible] sic lovers in recent years [illegible] her recordings.

At the conclusion of [illegible] formance today, listen[illegible] claimed at her power—and [illegible] of tone. One veteran sub[illegible] shook his head and said [illegible] want to hear it pl[illegible] anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,790
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A[illegible] Triumph A[illegible]

[illegible] phony No. 5 in B flat [illegible] Concerto Grosso No. 15, in A minor, [illegible] and concluded with Schubert's Sym-[illegible] phony, "Ilya Mourametz," was the [illegible] focal point of the Philadelphia Or-[illegible]

Entremont in Jolivet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy pre-[illegible] sented the local premiere of Andr[illegible] Jolivet's Concerto for Piano and Or-[illegible] chestra with a new pianist to play it, [illegible] the 22-year-old French Philip[illegible] ppe Entremont. Both piece and solo-[illegible] ist stirred up quite a bit of excitement [illegible] —musical emotion [illegible] e's heart and [illegible] walls of Sym-[illegible] cess.

[illegible] anist's fourth [illegible] the Boston [illegible] ra, within a [illegible] n scheduled [illegible] oven Third [illegible] l four pro-[illegible] nch asked [illegible] zart's D [illegible] night's [illegible] idea. [illegible] was [illegible] out her [illegible] se rare [illegible] too sel-[illegible] lover. [illegible] anding [illegible] son—[illegible] —and [illegible] Mme [illegible] ked [illegible] the [illegible] ut [illegible] Schaunard, his singing of "Vecchia [illegible] line and Zimmara," were among the best ele-[illegible] ments of an uneven performance of [illegible] the opera.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes was [illegible] soloist with the Philadelphia Concerto [illegible] tra, playing the Beethoven Concerto [illegible] No. 4 with exquisite style and finish [illegible] and a strong personal touch to wir[illegible] the hearty approval of the audience. [illegible] Eugene Ormandy programmed a first [illegible] performance by the orchestra here of [illegible] Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," [illegible] Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he [illegible] brought glowing tone and much tech-[illegible] nical virtuosity. He also repeated [illegible] Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for [illegible] Orchestra, which again scored a suc-[illegible]

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 12 1956

[illegible] mandy's justly esteemed [illegible] Brahms's E minor Symphony, which [illegible] had begun with Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon" Overture.

On Nov. 7, the Philadelphia Or-[illegible] chestra's first Student Concert took place, with Mr. Ormandy as conductor and master of ceremonies. There were two soloists, Janet Smith, a 21-year-old mezzo, who showed talent in arias from "Werther" and "Troyatore," and a young pianist, Bonny Hoy, who made a big hit in the Richard Strauss "Burleske." Benjamin Britten's Varia-tions and Fugue on a Theme of Pur-cell, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Paul Creston's "Fanfare for Para-troopers" made up the balance of the program.

Latin-American Music Heard

On Oct. 25, Manuel Herrarte, a Guatemalan pianist, gave an interest-ing recital of Latin-American music at the Philadelphia Art Alliance. Mr. Herrarte played polished and authen-tic performances of pieces by Villa-Lobos, Ginastera, Guarnieri, Castillo, and himself, and the audience was obviously interested.

On Nov. 1, the Philadelphia Forum presented Irmgard Seefried and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau in a joint recital of Hugo Wolf songs at the Academy. The artists were always on the stage, singing the 43 songs Lieder-artistry of the highest calibre. Both singers displayed great warmth and deep devotion to the love songs. Both singers delivery of Wolf's "Aus dem Italienisches Liederbuch," alternating in their delivery together, "Aus dem Italienischen Liederbuch," alternating in their delivery of Wolf's songs, and the audience made it evident that this unusual presentation was a great and deserved success.

The New Chamber Orchestra of Philadelphia, on Nov. 4, gave the first of its five chamber-music concerts at the Academy of Music. Nicholas Harsanyi was the conductor and Andor Foldes made his Philadelphia debut, playing Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 17, in G major, with the orchestra. Despite obvious nervousness, Mr. Foldes gave a mature performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 17, in G major, with the orchestra. Despite obvious nervousness, Mr. Foldes gave a mature performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 17, in G major, playing with a delicate touch and a fine sense of the style of the period. At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Foldes was called back to the platform for a number of bows.

November 7-56
151
10 Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIE[illegible]

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

[illegible] rds could adequately [illegible] the essence of Clara [illegible] music, there would be [illegible] o hear her—indeed, [illegible] d be no need for mu-[illegible] But perhaps a que-[illegible] Aubrey Thomas de [illegible] close to summing up [illegible] artistry.

[illegible] usic's golden speech [illegible] t notes to notes re-[illegible]

[illegible] e is a world; yet [illegible] to worlds its own [illegible]

[illegible] the qualities of in-[illegible] beyond worlds—[illegible] kil's playing in [illegible] last night. Be it [illegible] tian scale, a lim-[illegible] poggiatura, or a [illegible] by single notes—[illegible] guileless things [illegible] musical emotion [illegible] e's heart and [illegible] walls of Sym-[illegible]

[illegible] anist's fourth [illegible] the Boston [illegible] ra, within a [illegible] n scheduled [illegible] oven Third [illegible] l four pro-[illegible] nch asked [illegible] zart's D [illegible] night's [illegible] idea. [illegible] was [illegible] out her [illegible] se rare [illegible] too sel-[illegible] lover. [illegible] anding [illegible] son—[illegible] —and [illegible] Mme [illegible] ked [illegible] the [illegible] ut [illegible] Schaunard, his singing of "Vecchia [illegible] line and Zimmara," were among the best ele-[illegible] ments of an uneven performance of [illegible] the opera.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes was [illegible] soloist with the Philadelphia Concerto [illegible] tra, playing the Beethoven Concerto [illegible] No. 4 with exquisite style and finish [illegible] and a strong personal touch to wir[illegible] the hearty approval of the audience. [illegible] Eugene Ormandy programmed a first [illegible] performance by the orchestra here of [illegible] Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," [illegible] Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he [illegible] brought glowing tone and much tech-[illegible] nical virtuosity. He also repeated [illegible] Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for [illegible] Orchestra, which again scored a suc-[illegible] cess.

Entremont in Jolivet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy pre-[illegible] sented the local premiere of Andr[illegible] Jolivet's Concerto for Piano and Or-[illegible] chestra with a new pianist to play it, [illegible] the 22-year-old French Philip[illegible] ppe Entremont. Both piece and solo-[illegible] ist stirred up quite a bit of excitement [illegible] —musical emotion [illegible] e's heart and [illegible] walls of Sym-[illegible]

[illegible] anist's fourth [illegible] the Boston [illegible] ra, within a [illegible] n scheduled [illegible] oven Third [illegible] l four pro-[illegible] nch asked [illegible] zart's D [illegible] night's [illegible] idea. [illegible] was [illegible] out her [illegible] se rare [illegible] too sel-[illegible] lover. [illegible] anding [illegible] son—[illegible] —and [illegible] Mme [illegible] ked [illegible] the [illegible] ut [illegible] Schaunard, his singing of "Vecchia [illegible] line and Zimmara," were among the best ele-[illegible] ments of an uneven performance of [illegible] the opera.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes was [illegible] soloist with the Philadelphia Concerto [illegible] tra, playing the Beethoven Concerto [illegible] No. 4 with exquisite style and finish [illegible] and a strong personal touch to wir[illegible] the hearty approval of the audience. [illegible] Eugene Ormandy programmed a first [illegible] performance by the orchestra here of [illegible] Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," [illegible] Ballet Suite No. 2, to which he [illegible] brought glowing tone and much tech-[illegible] nical virtuosity. He also repeated [illegible] Gottfried von Einem's Concerto for [illegible] Orchestra, which again scored a suc-[illegible] cess.

languors, lush selos
ing rhythms. The make a sym-
the most general ally a species of coming late (1920)
logy of that type,
tive.
and the orchestra
best all afternoon.
d a true glory of strings had recap-
lapidary richness.
program: Elgar's In-Allegro for Strings; ballet Suite, "Card
first Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
TON, Mass.
dent Republican
re. 198,749
OV 6 - 1956

mphony

oston Symphony Or-under the direction of Munch, gives the third of the Tuesday series
The first of the Open s will be Thursday at Haskil is soloist to-the Beethoven Third erto. The rest of is Mozart's "Paris"

K. 297, Barber's
Meditation and Dance nce," and the Fourth
by Robert Schuman.
ram for the Friday
day concerts will con-ar's Introduction and or String Orchestra
olo string quartet, a Stravinsky's Ballet
ame" and the First by Brahms. This will also be the sub-e first Open Rehearsal
Thursday evening previ-

hralls Concerto

power and tonal beauty.
one veteran subscriber: "I r want to hear it played n by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil Gets Wild Applause At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,790

NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A[illegible] Triumph

[illegible] Pianist Eugene Istomin, who helped persuade her to venture a return to the U.S.

Boston critics were as ecstatic as the audience. The Herald's Rudolph Elie called it "one of those magical revelations that occurs in music once in a generation . . . the most beautiful performance of Beethoven's Third Concerto I ever heard or expect to hear again."

. . .

In Philadelphia, the same day, a lanky, 22-year-old pianist named Philippe Entremont had his own triumph. When he auditioned for the Philadelphia Orchestra two years ago, Conductor Eugene Ormandy called him "one of the great young-er pianists of our day," hired him on the spot. Last week Entremont made his Philadelphia debut—with a spiky-rhythmed modern concerto by [illegible] André Jolivet, and Rachmaninoff's [illegible]amel-flavored Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini—and fully lived up to his sponsor's judgment.

Pianist Entremont seemed to have a talent as impressive as the late William Kapell's—speed, big tone, a sense of soul, flair. Even if he had flubbed a tricky rhythm, nobody would have known it, for Entremont played with a momentum that swept all before him. Few in the audience liked the Jolivet concerto much at first, but when the final notes faded there was a roar of approval. The orchestra refused to share the pianist's reward, simply sat tight and applauded too.

Entremont got his first piano lesson at eight, from his mother, herself a Grand Prix pianist. At twelve, he was winning his own prizes. Now starting a 50-concert American tour, accompanied by his pretty, redheaded wife, he thinks he might like to live in the U.S. "I like the people," he says. "For the performer, the audience creates a grande ambiance."

November 7-56

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

[illegible]ds could adequately [illegible] the essence of Clara [illegible]usic, there would be [illegible] hear her — indeed, [illegible] be no need for mu- [illegible]ut perhaps a qua- [illegible]Aubrey Thomas de [illegible]close to summing up [illegible]artistry:

[illegible]sic's golden speech [illegible] notes to notes re-

[illegible] is a world: yet

[illegible]to worlds its own

[illegible] the qualities of in- [illegible] beyond worlds— [illegible]kil's playing in [illegible] last night. Be it [illegible]tian scale, a lim- [illegible] poggiatura, or a [illegible]y single notes— [illegible] guileless things [illegible] musical emotion [illegible]e's heart and [illegible] walls of Sym-

[illegible]anist's fourth [illegible] the Boston [illegible]tra within a [illegible]n scheduled [illegible]oven Third [illegible] four pro- [illegible]nch asked [illegible]zart's D [illegible] night's

[illegible] idea. [illegible] was [illegible] but her [illegible]se rare [illegible] too sel- [illegible]c lover. [illegible]tanding [illegible]ason— [illegible]—and [illegible] Mme

[illegible]ked [illegible] the [illegible] but [illegible]ton [illegible]an [illegible] she [illegible]hu- [illegible]sy,

[illegible] extraordinary artist. According to a review of her debut that appeared in this newspaper, she brought to her listeners "far more than the polished technical facility most newcomers muster. She makes her music shine with a lustrous individuality." And again the reviewer said that she was "a skilled pianist and musician, but above all else an interpreter who seeks out the core and essence of her music, rather than one who contents herself with its outer form."

These observations still apply to Mme Haskil's playing. Last night one was constantly caught up in the exquisite beauty of her phrasing, her limpid, singing tone, burnished like gold, her flawless and caressing touch, her devotion to the Mozartian ideal. As one listener said afterward: "Now I know how Mozart himself would have played it!"

Whatever the reasons for Mme Haskil's 30-year hiatus between visits to Boston, we know that she has not been idle meanwhile. Her many recordings attest to her activity on the European scene. But we urge her to make annual visits to Boston hereafter. Or even oftener.

Yugoslav Dancers

Following its recent performance in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Yugoslav State Company of folk dancers known as "Kolo" has embarked on a ten-week tour of leading cities which will bring the group to Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday evening, Dec. 14.

The company of 55 dancers, singers, and musicians, performing in colorful costumes, will present for the first time in America its "Slavonic Rhapsody," which combines the wealth of Yugoslav national dance styles, including those of the diverse races—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians, Montenegrins, and Macedonians—which make up modern Yugoslavia.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

NOV 15 1956

■ In Boston the well-known European pianist, Clara Haskil, made what really must be considered her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2 and 3. Miss Haskil had made a previous visit to this country and her records have been widely sold here, but until this visit she had not been publicly heard by American audiences on any scale. Her performance in the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 confirmed her European reputation as a sensitive and deeply musical pianist. Yet one might have wished that she had chosen to open her American concerts with a Mozart concerto, for her style seems to be made to order for that composer.

As it was, Miss Haskil did not appear completely at ease, particularly since she and Charles Munch differed more than one point. The soloist's [illegible]empt to use flexibility of rhythm [illegible] not completely understood by the [illegible]yers or their conductor. Perhaps [illegible]re was not sufficient rehearsal time [illegible] perhaps the pianist needs to get [illegible]usted to American conditions, so [illegible]rkedly different in many respects [illegible]m what she has been used to. But [illegible]re was no doubt whatever that the [illegible]il, stooped, white-haired artist [illegible]red enormously with her audience. [illegible]he balance of the program was [illegible]erbly conducted and played, with [illegible]nch giving brilliant readings of the [illegible]erubini "Anacreon" Overture, Sam- [illegible] Barber's "Medea's Meditation and [illegible]nce of Vengeance," with the com- [illegible]er present for this first Boston [illegible]aring, and the Turina "Sinfonia [illegible]villana."

JULES WOLFFERS

MUSIC TRADE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 1956

Pianist Haskil Plays Piping Good Concert

Who left the tobacco pipe in the piano? That was the mystery at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the morning of Saturday, November 3. Someone left his pipe within the piano, at one side, on which Clara Haskil played the Beethoven C Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the preceding afternoon.

When she reached for her handkerchief, which she had put inside, the pipe came out with it. The orchestra was sounding the cadence chord before the solo piano cadenza in the first movement. Miss Haskil had just time to drop the pipe at the lower end of the keyboard—whence it clattered to the floor—and make her own split-second entrance.

The answer to this mystery came from Paul E. Murphy, president of the National Association of Music Merchants, Inc.; treasurer of M. Steinert & Sons, Boston; and humor editor of THE MUSIC TRADES, who said:

"Haskil played beautifully on a Steinway piano supplied by us, and our tuner does not smoke. The pipe belonged to Zighera, the orchestra harpist, who had been getting in a little practice on a good piano."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 29,537
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,[illegible]
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A[illegible] Triumph A[illegible]

Entremont in Jolivet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy presented the local premiere of André Jolivet's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with a new pianist to play it in the old Academy. Jolivet's piece stirred up quite a bit of excitement—the 22-year-old Frenchman Philippe Entremont. Both piece and soloist gave an impressive performance.

On Nov. 1, the Philadelphia presented Irmgard Seefried and rich Fischer-Dieskau in a joint obviously interested and the audien[illegible] Lobos, Ginastera, Guarnieri, C[illegible] tic performances of pieces by at the Philadelphia and [illegible] ing recital of Latin-American Guatemalan pianist, gave an in[illegible]

Latin-American Music Heard

On Oct. 25, Manuel Herra[illegible] program.

[illegible] Symphony [illegible] Beethoven's Eighth Symph[illegible] and Paul Creston's "Fanfare for H[illegible] troopers" made up the balance o[illegible] program.

[illegible] Guiomar Novaes was [illegible] Beethoven Concerto [illegible] Fugue on a Theme of H[illegible] Benjamin Britten's Va[illegible] Richard Str[illegible] Bonny Hoy, w[illegible] "Werther," and "Trovatore," a[illegible] soloists, Janet Smith, a 21-yea[illegible] master of ceremonies. There wa[illegible] with Mr. Ormandy as conduct[illegible] First Student Concert to [illegible] the Philadelphia [illegible] program, which [illegible] Kabalevsky's "Co[illegible] symphony [illegible] opening.

[illegible] Pianist Eugene Istomin, who hel[illegible] suade her to venture a return to [illegible] Boston critics were as ecstati[illegible] audience. The Herald's Rudol[illegible] called it "one of those magical re[illegible] that [illegible] music once in [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] Concerto I [illegible] or ex[illegible] again."

In Phi[illegible] the same day, a lanky, 22-year-old pianist named Philippe Entremont had his own triumph. When he auditioned for the Philadelphia Orchestra two years ago, Conductor Eugene Ormandy called him "one of the great young pianists of our day," hired him on the spot. Last week Entremont made his Philadelphia debut—with a spiky-rhythmed modern concerto by France's André Jolivet, and Rachmaninoff's caramel-flavored

[illegible] Concerto [illegible] power and tonal beauty [illegible] one veteran subscriber: "[illegible] want to hear it play[illegible] by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil Gets Wild Applause At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at a grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

November 7-56
10  Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIE

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

[illegible] could adequately [illegible] the essence of Clara [illegible] music, there would be [illegible] to hear her—indeed, [illegible] be no need for mu[illegible] But perhaps a qua[illegible] Aubrey Thomas de [illegible] close to summing up [illegible] artistry.

[illegible] music's golden speech [illegible] notes to notes re[illegible] [illegible] is a world; yet [illegible] to worlds its own [illegible] the qualities of in[illegible] beyond worlds—[illegible] last night. Be it [illegible] scale, a lim[illegible] poggiatura, or a [illegible] single notes—[illegible] guileless things [illegible] musical emotion [illegible] heart and [illegible] walls of Sym[illegible]

[illegible] was "a skilled pianist and musician, but above all else an interpreter who seeks out the core and essence of her music, rather than one who contents herself with its outer form."

These observations still apply to Mme Haskil's playing. Last night one was constantly caught up in the exquisite beauty of her phrasing, her limpid, singing tone, burnished like gold, her flawless and caressing touch, her devotion to the Mozartian ideal. As one listener said afterward: "Now I know how Mozart himself would have played it!"

Whatever the reasons for Mme Haskil's 30-year hiatus between visits to Boston, we know that she has not been idle meanwhile. Her many recordings attest to her activity on the European scene. But we urge her to make annual visits to Boston hereafter. Or even oftener.

Yugoslav Dancers

Following its recent performance in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Yugoslav State Company of folk dancers known as "Kolo" has embarked on a ten-week tour of leading cities which will bring the group to Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday evening, Dec. 14.

The company of 55 dancers, singers, and musicians, performing in colorful costumes, will present for the first time in America its "Slavonic Rhapsody," which combines the wealth of Yugoslav national dance styles, including those of the diverse races—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians, Montenegrins, and Macedonians—which make up modern Yugoslavia.

■ In Boston the well-known European pianist, Clara Haskil, made what really must be considered her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2 and 3. Miss Haskil had made a previous visit to this country and her records have been widely sold here, but until this visit she had not been publicly heard by American audiences on any scale. Her performance in the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 confirmed her European reputation as a sensitive and deeply musical pianist. Yet one might have wished that she had chosen to open her American concerts with a Mozart concerto, for her style seems to be made to order for that composer.

As it was, Miss Haskil did not appear completely at ease, particularly since she and Charles Munch differed on more than one point. The soloist's attempt to use flexibility of rhythm was not completely understood by the players or their conductor. Perhaps there was not sufficient rehearsal time and perhaps the pianist needs to get adjusted to American conditions, so markedly different in many respects from what she has been used to. But there was no doubt whatever that the frail, stooped, white-haired artist scored enormously with her audience.

The balance of the program was superbly conducted and played, with Munch giving brilliant readings of the Cherubini "Anacreon" Overture, Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," with the composer present for this first Boston hearing, and the Turina "Sinfonia Sevillana." JULES WOLFFERS

Clara Haskil at Symphony

Pianist Wins Acclaim In Concerto by Mozart

By Harold Rogers

If words could adequately capture the essence of Clara Haskil's music, there would be no need to hear her — indeed, there would be no need for music itself. But perhaps a quatrain by Aubrey Thomas de Vere comes close to summing up her delicate artistry:

"In holy music's golden speech
Remotest notes to notes respond:
Each octave is a world: yet each
Vibrates to worlds its own beyond."

There were the qualities of infinity—worlds beyond worlds—in Mme Haskil's playing in Symphony Hall last night. Be it a simple Mozartian scale, a limpid trill, an appoggiatura, or a melody played by single notes—through these guileless things came a flood of musical emotion that carried one's heart and spirit beyond the walls of Symphony Hall.

This was the pianist's fourth appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra within a week. She had been scheduled to play the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto on all four programs, but Charles Munch asked her to change to Mozart's D minor, K. 466, for last night's concert.

This was an excellent idea. Mme Haskil's Beethoven was incredibly beautiful, but her Mozart was one of those rare experiences that come too seldom in the life of a music lover. Listeners do not give a standing tribute without good reason—not in Boston, at least—and many rose in gratitude to Mme Haskil last night.

These performances marked Mme Haskil's debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but they did not mark her Boston debut. This took place in Jordan Hall on Jan. 19, 1927, when she played works by Bach, Schumann, Brahms, Chopin, Debussy, Ravel, and Liapounov.

Even three decades ago Mme Haskil must have been an extraordinary artist. According to a review of her debut that appeared in this newspaper, she brought to her listeners "far more than the polished technical facility most newcomers muster. She makes her music shine with a lustrous individuality." And again the reviewer said that she was "a skilled pianist and musician, but above all else an interpreter who seeks out the core and essence of her music, rather than one who contents herself with its outer form."

These observations still apply to Mme Haskil's playing. Last night one was constantly caught up in the exquisite beauty of her phrasing, her limpid, singing tone, burnished like gold, her flawless and caressing touch, her devotion to the Mozartian ideal. As one listener said afterward: "Now I know how Mozart himself would have played it!"

Whatever the reasons for Mme Haskil's 30-year hiatus between visits to Boston, we know that she has not been idle meanwhile. Her many recordings attest to her activity on the European scene. But we urge her to make annual visits to Boston hereafter. Or even oftener.

Yugoslav Dancers

Following its recent performance in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Yugoslav State Company of folk dancers known as "Kolo" has embarked on a ten-week tour of leading cities which will bring the group to Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday evening, Dec. 14.

The company of 55 dancers, singers, and musicians, performing in colorful costumes, will present for the first time in America its "Slavonic Rhapsody," which combines the wealth of Yugoslav national dance styles, including those of the diverse races—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians, Montenegrins, and Macedonians—which make up modern Yugoslavia.

MUSICAL COURIER (NEW YORK CITY)
NOV 15 1956

■ In Boston the well-known European pianist, Clara Haskil, made what really must be considered her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2 and 3. Miss Haskil had made a previous visit to this country and her records have been widely sold here, but until this visit she had not been publicly heard by American audiences on any scale. Her performance in the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 confirmed her European reputation as a sensitive and deeply musical pianist. Yet one might have wished that she had chosen to open her American concerts with a Mozart concerto, for her style seems to be made to order for that composer.

As it was, Miss Haskil did not appear completely at ease, particularly since she and Charles Munch differed more than one point. The soloist's empt to use flexibility of rhythm s not completely understood by the yers or their conductor. Perhaps re was not sufficient rehearsal time l perhaps the pianist needs to get usted to American conditions, so rkedly different in many respects m what she has been used to. But re was no doubt whatever that the il, stooped, white-haired artist red enormously with her audience. The balance of the program was perbly conducted and played, with nch giving brilliant readings of the erubini "Anacreon" Overture, Sam- Barber's "Medea's Meditation and nce of Vengeance," with the com- er present for this first Boston aring, and the Turina "Sinfonia villana."

JULES WOLFFERS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Independent Republican
Circ. 20,537
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil At Grand Piano Wildly Applauded

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day Ameri- can concert audiences, was ap- plauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Independent
Circ. 20,790
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil A Triumph At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail - looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again, Clara Haskil, present - day Ameri- audiences, was ap- o the platform. This American appear- ears. Born in Bu- a and resident of e 1936, she has o American mu- t years through n of her per- steners ex- r—and beauty n subscriber, id, "I never d again by

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
NOV 6 - 1956

mphony

Boston Symphony Or- under the direction of Munch, gives the third of the Tuesday series The first of the Open als will be Thursday at M.

Haskil is soloist to- r the Beethoven Third Concerto. The rest of ram is Mozart's "Paris" ny, K. 297, Barber's Meditation and Dance eance," and the Fourth by by Robert Schumann. rogram for the Friday urday concerts will con- Elgar's Introduction and for String Orchestra solo string quartet, a om Stravinsky's Ballet Game" and the First ny by Brahms. This will also be the sub- he first Open Rehearsal Thursday evening previ-

hralls Concerto

power and tonal beauty one veteran subscriber: "I want to hear it played by anybody else!"

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613
NOV 3 - 1956

Clara Haskil Gets Wild Applause At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Nov. 2 (AP) — Stooped and gray-haired, a frail-looking woman in black who seemed like a hesitant grandmother picked her way uncertainly under stage lights through the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra today and seated herself at the grand piano.

At the conclusion of Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number Three, 36 minutes later the normally-reserved audience of Brahmin subscribers who fill Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon was on its feet, wildly applauding, cheering, stamping. Some were even weeping.

Again and again, Clara Haskil, unknown to present-day American concert audiences, was applauded back to the platform. This was her first American appearance in many years. Born in Bucharest, Rumania, and resident of Switzerland since 1936, she has been known only to American music lovers in recent years through her recordings.

At the conclusion of her performance today, listeners exclaimed at her power—and beauty of tone. One veteran subscriber, shook his head and said, "I never want to hear it played again by anybody else!"

Burr
EST
BArc
PRESS CLIPPING
165 Church Street

TIME
NEW YORK,
NOV 12

With Ballet and Gal

Washington, D. C.—The National Symphony, which entered its 26th year quietly on November 2, opened the 1956-57 season with numerous and varied activities. The first two weeks found the orchestra playing to an opening concert audience studded with ambassadors and diplomats, three overflowing houses with the Royal Danish Ballet, and a half-time concert at a local football game with listeners on 38 television stations.

In 1931 Hans Kindler organized, rehearsed, and shaped 76 local men to present to Washingtonians the first concert of th a chill Sund vember. Twenty-five which to build this structure to be more than a co year finds the largest subscribed a ence in its history. In addition to th innovation of giving concerts in Tues- day and Wednesday evening pairs, new management ideas put the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras and the Royal Danish Ballet on the subscription series.

Howard Mitchell, conductor of the symphony, has outlined one of the ional

to move the audience in legi fashion. Obviously underrehe conductor Carlo Moresco er tered some difficult moments. Greco was an excellent Mimi, s expressively and looking well i part. Brian Sullivan, after a fir in which he was unable to with the high C of Rodolfo's N tive, sang admirably and presen sympathetic picture of the ten mental poet. Bernyce Fontayne Musetta, and Hugh Thompson Richard Green were Marcello Schaunard. William Wilderman's line and his singing of "Ve zimarra" were among the best ments of an uneven performanc the opera.

On Oct. 26, Guiomar Novaes soloist with the Philadelphia Or tra, playing the Beethoven Con No. 4 with exquisite style and f and a strong personal touch to the hearty approval of the audi Eugene Ormandy programmed a performance by the orchestra her Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ari Ballet Suite No. 2, to which brought glowing tone and much t nical virtuosity. He also repe Gottfried von Einem's Concerto Orchestra, which again scored a cess.

Entremont in Jolivet Concerto

On Nov. 2, Mr. Ormandy sented the local premiere of A Jolivet's Concerto for Piano and chestra with a new pianist to pla —the 22-year-old Frenchman l ippe Entremont. Both piece and s ist stirred up quite a bit of exciter in the old Academy. Jolivet's p takes us into a primitive jungle its drums, tom-toms and ea rhythms, bringing us to a final ba up orgiastic confusion of percus instruments, including xylopho This concerto is engaging and m fun and makes demands on all performers—demands that were liantly met.

Mr. Entremont was able to s his technical prowess and artistic ture in a performance of Rachma off's Rhapsody on a Theme of Pa nini. His success was one of biggest of the yet-young season. mandy added a performance of I bussy's rarely heard and youth symphonic suite, "Printemps", and fine performance of Samuel Barbe Overture to "The School for Scanda

Reinhold Glière's 55-minute sy phony, "Ilya Mourametz", was t focal point of the Philadelphia

Cherubi

The first Bos Meditati an exce been re Samuel this su dramati present assiduo but a c veying emotion

The bini's ended these c sevillan proved or less descript pleasan

One the orc city th Piston. on com and h there spects, most Harmo and of which and a symph

Mr. mover string tet, O ory o ber o years contr Euro West ber "Pari last, All

T Mus port high ordi Die duc 23. nea

Grande Ambience

The [illegible] rapt and bewitched. No [illegible] moved in B [illegible] was sorely [illegible] frail bu[illegible] keyboard [illegible] Con[illegible] of fire [illegible] Pianist Clara Has[illegible] first U[illegible] Charles [illegible] Orchest[illegible] verbera[illegible] of "Bu[illegible] precedent[illegible]

Outsi[illegible] Haskil is a plain woman who wears no makeup to conceal the traces of suffering that line her face, but her features are [illegible]

Grand Pr[illegible] 14. After World War I [illegible] retired her into temporary retirement; later she took up playing sonatas with such greats as Ysaye, Enesco, Casals. She has appeared

MUSIC TRADE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 1956

Pianist Haskil Plays Piping Good Concert

Who left the tobacco pipe in the piano? That was the mystery at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the morning of Saturday, November 3. Someone left his pipe within the piano, at one side, on which Clara Haskil played the Beethoven C Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the preceding afternoon.

When she reached for her handkerchief, which she had put inside, the pipe came out with it. The orchestra was sounding the cadence chord before the solo piano cadenza in the first movement. Miss Haskil had just time to drop the pipe at the lower end of the keyboard—whence it clattered to the floor—and make her own split-second entrance.

The answer to this mystery came from Paul E. Murphy, president of the National Association of Music Merchants, Inc.; treasurer of M. Steinert & Sons, Boston; and humor editor of THE MUSIC TRADES, who said:

"Haskil played beautifully on a Steinway piano supplied by us, and our tuner does not smoke. The pipe belonged to Zighera, the orchestra harpist, who had been getting in a little practice on a good piano."

152

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
San Francisco, Calif.
NEWS
Circ. D. 106,983
NOV 3 1956

Music

Europe About

What do you think would happen if a political party put a music subsidy plan into its platform? The question was asked by a European artist, one of many who fails to understand why U. S. money supports touring musical groups abroad, but not at home.

It is a question worth pondering. Would such a project win or lose votes for the party proposing it?

Our Presidents have been a fairly musical lot. President Eisenhower has had fun with the harmonica. Vice President Nixon can play the violin. Harry Truman let it be known that he played the piano.

Not Contemplated

Yet no party has contemplated putting support for music into its platform.

The fact that [illegible] finance the musical arts as a matter of course is well known. That they are able to build programs and repertoire without keeping one eye on the boxoffice has proved advantageous in many ways, and made American directors envious.

Would it be to our advantage to follow their example? Perhaps. Perhaps not.

If either Eisenhower or Stevenson were campaigning for national subsidization of musical enterprises, would it win or lose him votes? I wonder?

Burrelle's
PRESS CLIPP
165 Church St
SARASO
HERALD
Circ. D. 11,0
NOV

Social Highli

Few Avail

Very few mem for the 1956-57 c the Sarasota Co Association, acco ment at a meetin committee in the Walter R. Thomps

Admission to co membership only, ship is not closed. So long as seats remain available anyone may join by paying for the season membership. No single concert tickets will be sold.

The 1956-57 concert series will begin on January 9 with George London, bass-baritone. On January 23, the Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler will be here. On February 11 Jose Greco and his Spanish dancers will appear. This is a return engagement by popular request.

Dorothy Warenskjold, soprano, will be the guest artist for the concert on March 8. The final concert of the season will be given by Clifford Curzon, one of the world's finest pianists.

For further information, telephone Mrs. Stella Martin, 6-4743, or Mrs. G. H. Boyer, 3-6553.

Mr Burke

a-18 EVENING TRIBUNE SAN DIEGO, CALIFORNIA Tuesday, Nov. 6, 1956

CURTAIN CALL

Public

- Boston Symphony Praised
- Program Cutting Annoying
- Piston Work Dramatic

By BRUNO USSHER

GOOD LISTENING: Sunday broadcasts from the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic made good listening. Unfortunately the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch already was under way in the Mozart D-major Symphony (K-297) by the time the National Broadcasting Co. opened the performance for Southern California.

It was evidently a busy day crowded with spot announcements for the network because the closing remarks by the leisurely Ben Grauer also were lost.

USSHER

That sort of audience treatment is disconcerting, especially when it seems due to commercial reasons and not due to unexpected technical difficulties. In addition to the lovely, gracefully elaborate Mozart score, Munch programmed also the thoughtful, quietly dramatic Symphony No. 5 by Walter Piston. This is beyond doubt one of the emotionally more substantial and universal symphonies by an American composer. Piston, by the way, heads the music department at Harvard.

To say that Munch programmed the two scores is not quite correct. They were part of a concert. For some reason NBC has never sent a complete evening's music-making from Boston to the West Coast. What looks like three-quarters of an hour on the radio log, dwindles to less in actual hearing, but that is greatly rewarding. The Bostonians were exquisite in their Mozartian liveliness and engagingly contemplative in the Piston, no matter what the tempos.

From Carnegie Hall came delightfully the "Military" Symphony by Haydn, a new "Symphony for 17 Brass and Percussion Instruments" by Gunther Schuller, and Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" which introduced Canadian violinist Betty Jean Hagen as an artist of excellent technique, tone, and taste. The concert altogether found maestro Dmitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic in their most spontaneous and versatile playing moods.

Piston's Symphony No. 5 is the work of ripe feelings. It might be dangerous and unfair, therefore, to say speak of an American Brahms. Perhaps it might compare better with the best of Vaughan-Williams, Hindemith or Shostakovitch in their quiet moods. Piston has many long melodies. Rhythmic and harmonic elements are well proportioned and developed in a manner that determines the overall form. It is music which, in its consistent idiom and intensities, has many touches of the inevitable. Here is moderate modernism that sounds as old and assuring as Gregorian chant multiplied by itself. I should like to hear it again soon.

Schuller's "Symphony for Brass and Percussion" was given with almost embarrassing meticulousness. A more rhapsodic reading might have added life to what reminded me of a superb brass ensemble tuning up.

Some of the effects may well have been suggested that way because the composer is the first French horn at the "Met." He experiments systematically with combinations of instruments as such, varying mathematically individual timbres and harmonic relations. It sounds largely calculated with occasionally haunting results for better or worse.

I found it difficult to follow thematically. Quite modern harmonically, it seems to lack emotional impetus. Here is as much coldness as the Piston Symphony is spiritually warming.

In opposite directions, both composers derive their methods from their ideas. About Schuller's Brass Symphony one might quote a recent Clifton Fadiman review. "The major defect lies in the choice of subject matter."

Schuller's work becomes tedious and cold long before the fourth movement ends. Perhaps it has more appeal when heard as background music for Jose Limon's ballet, "The Traitor," but as abstract art it lacks appeal.

The Record Season Begins With Miscellaneous Classics

Nov. 4

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Having fallen far behind in discussing the new recordings of the day, what with one thing and another—principally the long absence with the Boston Symphony in Europe—there seems no alternative for me than to plow into them willy-nilly and try to catch up. The season may begin with a flood of new recordings from all the big labels and if in general it may be said there are considerably more re-recordings nowadays of the familiar repertoire (there are now 20 versions of Beethoven's "Eroica" available beside the new one mentioned below), a good deal of novelty may be expected as the season progresses. There is little novelty in the ensuing list, however, though a series of four Unicorn discs called "Music at MIT" classifies as such for local purposes.

This is because they represent the first attempt to catch the special acoustic quality of both Kresge Auditorium and the MIT chapel on recordings. I find the results brilliant, there being a spacious quality to the sound that softens yet does not diminish the extraordinary high fidelity response the auditoria themselves provide. The Kresge is represented by four piano sonatas of Beethoven given massive, almost granitic performances by Ernst Levy, whose serious approach to the "Appassionata" and the last three of Opus 109, 110 and 111 is very impressive.

Equally brilliant is a recording of the Roger Voisin Brass Ensemble, a Boston Symphony group that had a stunning success last summer at the Edinburgh Festival. It plays works none too rewarding musically (by Dahl, Hindemith, Berezowski and Sanders) but the sound of these pairs of trumpets, horns, trombones and a tuba, is bright and keen, and again the auditorium seems to become a part of the instrumental group. A performance of four Handel concertos for organ and orchestra by Lawrence Moe with the Unicorn Concert orchestra under Klaus Liepmann is perhaps a shade less impressive tonally due perhaps to the quicker response of the chapel, but it is still a masterly recording studio that enhances the exceptionally "clean" baroque quality of the Holtcamp organ.

This appears to be the David Oistrakh month with Angel, it having issued three. The most interesting is Taneiev's seldom-heard Concert Suite with the Philharmonia under Malko, a rich-bodied work very Russian in character. Beethoven's E flat major Sonata and Brahms' D minor Sonata are most persuasively done by the violinist with Vladimir Yampolsky as pianist and a volume of encores (works of Debussy, Falla, Ysaye, Suk, Tchaikovsky, etc.) rounds out the new Oistrakh issues.

Other new releases:

THE VIRTUOSO ORCHESTRA; The Boston Symphony under Charles Munch (Victor). Mr. Munch here does Ravel's Bolero, Rapsodie Espagnol and La Valse, and Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun in superb style, all of the works long among his partcular specialties. (My interest in this, I must admit, as well as in Arthur Fiedler's new Pops album of waltzes by the Strauss family, is heightened by the fact I did the program note for them).

SCHUMANN: THE FOUR SYMPHONIES; Paul Kletzki and the Israel Philharmonic (Angel, three separate volumes). There is a mellow tonal glow to these versions of the familiar symphonies that eminently suits them, and the sound is good if not Angel's best. The First and Third are coupled; the Second presents the little-known Overture, Scherzo and Finale, and the Fourth is backed by Manfred Overture. They were recorded for the centenary of the death of the composer. Toscanini's 1949 broadcast version of the Third is now offered by Victor, and it is very fine indeed, though not one of his best things.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 5 SYMPHONY NO. 5; Ferenc Fricsay and the RIAS Symphony (Decca). A lovely and very colorful performance of this great favorite. Another version by the Oslo Philharmonic under Odd Gruner-Hegge on the Allegro label reveals this orchestra to be a distinguished one, though perhaps it is not numbered among the great ensembles of the world.

SCHUBERT: "UNFINISHED" SYMPHONY; French Radio Orchestra conducted by Igor Markevitch (Angel). This is Markevitch at his best, and that is about the best there is. He also does Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the finale going about as well as I ever heard it go on records.

DELIBES: "SYLVIA" and "COPPELIA" (Victor, two separate discs). These perfectly charming ballet scores are set forth by the Philharmonia and the orchestra of Covent Garden, respectively, both conducted by Robert Irving. There are in every way delightful, and the orchestras are as alike as the two famous pins.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

San Francisco, Calif.
NEWS
Circ. D. 106,983
NOV 3 1956

Music

European Artist Wonders About Music Subsidy

By Marjory M. Fisher

What do you think would happen if a political party put a music subsidy plan into its platform? The question was asked by a European artist, one of many who fails to understand why U. S. money supports touring musical groups abroad, but not at home.

It is a question worth pondering. Would such a project win or lose votes for the party proposing it?

Our Presidents have been a fairly musical lot. President Eisenhower has had fun with the harmonica. Vice President Nixon can play the violin. Harry Truman let it be known that he played the piano.

Not Contemplated

Yet no party has contemplated putting support for music into its platform.

The fact that Europeans finance the musical arts as a matter of course is well known. That they are able to build programs and repertoire without keeping one eye on the boxoffice has proved advantageous in many ways, and made American directors envious.

Would it be to our advantage to follow their example? Perhaps. Perhaps not.

If either Eisenhower or Stevenson were campaigning for national subsidization for musical enterprises, would it win or lose him votes? I wonder?

Now for a look at some of the new records.

When Jascha Heifetz made his New York debut uncounted years ago, it was reported that his playing was comparable to a bas relief carved in marble. Impeccable, cold.

An Achievement

As I listened to his RCA-Victor recording of the Beethoven Concerto with the Boston Symphony under Carl Munch, I began to wonder what that reporter would say if he could hear Heifetz today. For certainly his playing is anything but cold. Nor is it altogether flawless.

But this new recording is a truly beautiful achievement. Heifetz gives some surprisingly fresh nuances and unexpected accents to the familiar violin score that seem to reveal new facets of beauty. There was nothing routine about it. And Munch got a more flexible, relaxed tone from the orchestra than has been this Frenchman's habit. This, indeed, is a recording to be treasured.

Chamber Music

And so is the Epic recording of I Musici playing Corelli Concerti Grossi as revised by B. Bettinelli. Nos. 1, 7, 9, 8 and 10 of opus 6 are beautifully played with Felix Ayo, Walter Gallozzi (violinists) and Vincenzo Altobelli (cellist) in the solo parts.

Beethoven's fourth and eighth symphonies are paired on a Mercury disc, nicely played by Antal Dorati conducting the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

If Glenn Gould's piano playing is at all on a par with his recordings, San Francisco should find his forthcoming appearance with the Symphony a rare treat.

The Canadian pianist's new Columbia release consists of three Beethoven Sonatas (Nos. 109, 110, 111). They are exceptionally well recorded and finely played.

Recording for Mercury, Paul Paray and the Detroit Symphony present in able fashion Debussy's "Iberia," "La Mer" and "Afternoon of a Faun."

Fine Artistry

The artistry with which Elisabeth Schwartzkopf sings such miniature gems as "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," "Songs My Mother Taught Me" and other well-loved melodies is beautifully exemplified in her new Angel release, "Songs You Love." You can't help loving them all as Mme. Schwartzkopf sings them.

Some of the best violin on record is now coming from young Michael Rabin, via Angel. Tchaikowsky's Violin Concerto and Saint-Saens' "Rondo Capriccioso" are paired with excellent results under the baton of Alceo Galliera and the Philharmonia Orchestra.

The Record Season Begins With Miscellaneous Classics

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Having fallen far behind in discussing the new recordings of the day, what with one thing and another—principally the long absence with the Boston Symphony in Europe—there seems no alternative for me than to plow into them willy-nilly and try to catch up. The season has begun with a flood of new recordings from all the big labels and if in general it may be said there are considerably more re-recordings nowadays of the familiar repertoire (there are now 20 versions of Beethoven's "Eroica" available beside the new one mentioned below), a good deal of novelty may be expected as the season progresses. There is little novelty in the ensuing list, however, though a series of four Unicorn discs called "Music at MIT" classifies as such for local purposes.

This is because they represent the first attempt to catch the special acoustic quality of both Kresge Auditorium and the MIT chapel on recordings. I find the results brilliant, there being a spacious quality to the sound that softens yet does not diminish the extraordinary high fidelity response the auditoria themselves provide. The Kresge is represented by four piano sonatas of Beethoven given massive, almost granitic performances by Ernst Levy, whose serious approach to the "Appassionata" and the last three of Opus 109, 110 and 111 is very impressive.

Equally brilliant is a recording of the Roger Voisin Brass Ensemble, a Boston Symphony group that had a stunning success last summer at the Edinburgh Festival. It plays works none too rewarding musically (by Dahl, Hindemith, Berezowski and Sanders) but the sound of these pairs of trumpets, horns, trombones and a tuba, is bright and keen, and again the auditorium seems to become a part of the instrumental group. A performance of four Handel concertos for organ and orchestra by Lawrence Moe with the Unicorn Concert orchestra under Klaus Liepmann is perhaps a shade less impressive tonally due perhaps to the quicker response of the chapel, but it is still a masterly recording studio that enhances the exceptionally "clean" baroque quality of the Holtcamp organ.

This appears to be the David Oistrakh month with Angel, it having issued three. The most interesting is Taneiev's seldom-heard Concert Suite with the Philharmonia under Malko, a rich-bodied work very Russian in character. Beethoven's E flat major Sonata and Brahms' D minor Sonata are most persuasively done by the violinist with Vladimir Yampolsky as pianist and a volume of encores (works of Debussy, Falla, Ysaye, Suk, Tchaikovsky, etc.) rounds out the new Oistrakh issues.

Other new releases:

THE VIRTUOSO ORCHESTRA; The Boston Symphony under Charles Munch (Victor). Mr. Munch here does Ravel's Bolero, Rapsodie Espagnol and La Valse, and Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun in superb style, all of the works among his particular specialties, (My interest in this, I must admit, as well as in Arthur Fiedler's new Pops album of waltzes by the Strauss family, is heightened by the fact I did the program note for them).

SCHUMANN: THE FOUR SYMPHONIES; Paul Kletzki and the Israel Philharmonic (Angel, three separate volumes). There is a mellow tonal glow to these versions of the familiar symphonies that eminently suits them, and the sound is good if not Angel's best. The First and Third are coupled: the Second presents the little-known Overture, Scherzo and Finale, and the Fourth is backed by Manfred Overture. They were recorded for the centenary of the death of the composer. Toscanini's 1949 broadcast version of the Third is now offered by Victor, and it is very fine indeed, though not one of his best things.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 5; SYMPHONY NO. 5; Ferenc Fricsay and the RIAS Symphony (Decca). A lovely and very colorful performance of this great favorite. Another version by the Oslo Philharmonic under Odd Gruner-Hegge on the Allegro label reveals this orchestra to be a distinguished one, though perhaps it is not numbered among the great ensembles of the world.

SCHUBERT: "UNFINISHED" SYMPHONY; French Radio Orchestra conducted by Igor Markevitch (Angel). This is Markevitch at his best, and that is about the best there is. He also does Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the finale going about as well as I ever heard it go on records.

DELIBES: "SYLVIA" and "COPPELIA" (Victor, two separate discs). These perfectly charming ballet scores are set forth by the Philharmonia and the orchestra of Covent Garden, respectively, both conducted by Robert Irving. There are in every way delightful, and the orchestras are as alike as the two famous pins.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 11,001 - S. 13,388
NOV 5 1956

Social Highlights

Few Concert Tickets Available For Series

Very few memberships remain for the 1956-57 concert series of the Sarasota Community Concert Association, according to announcement at a meeting of the concert committee in the home of Mrs. Walter R. Thompson.

Admission to concerts will be by membership only, but the membership is not closed. So long as seats remain available anyone may join by paying for the season membership. No single concert tickets will be sold.

The 1956-57 concert series will begin on January 9 with George London, bass-baritone. On January 23, the Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler will be here. On February 11 Jose Greco and his Spanish dancers will appear. This is a return engagement by popular request.

Dorothy Warenskjold, soprano, will be the guest artist for the concert on March 8. The final concert of the season will be given by Clifford Curzon, one of the world's finest pianists.

For further information, telephone Mrs. Stella Martin, 6-4743 or Mrs. G. H. Boyer, 3-6553.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
NOV 10 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fifth concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Soloists were Alfred Krips and George Zazovsky, violins; Joseph de Pasquale, viola and Samuel Mayes, cello. The program:

Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Op. 47 ..... Elgar
"Jeu de Cartes" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Among the peaks that are the great majority of the Boston Symphony concerts there are occasional valleys. Yesterday's, for example.

The Elgar was good, the Stravinsky dry and clever, and who ever raises his voice against Brahms' First? Still and all it did not add up to a particularly interesting afternoon.

It is 15 years since Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings has been performed here, and 15 more will doubtless elapse before it is done again. It is a work of much persuasion, exploiting the strings more for their suavity and geniality than their virtuosity or their capacity for wide ranging sonorities. There are, in short, a good many other works for the string band that dig in to the medium, so to speak, more powerfully than this.

Ends Happily

Yet the materials here and the composer's methods are polished though not lacking in robustness. Stating at once a charming subject, he moves right along into an ingenious development that leads presently into a fugato section notable for its lack of contrapuntal clarity. This in turn leads to a recollection of the opening and a powerful statement of a little Welsh melody that was the inspiration of the work. All ends happily and sweetly.

The use of the solo string quartet lends additional interest to the composition, though it is never employed with the bravura of similar solo groups of the concerto grosso style of writing, commenting, and underlining the musical ideas rather than dominating or leading them. It was exceedingly well played by the string orchestra and made its point, but it nonetheless proved more on the special side than a universally communicating piece.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," for all its wit, its clean, spare lines, its wide variety of coloristic effects and rhythms, does not seem to lend itself too effectively to the concert hall. It is, after all, ballet music, and while a great deal of ballet music does make its way in concert, there are a number of notable exceptions. This, it seems to me, is one. The listener savors all the subtleties of the score, its piquant instrumental combinations, its sudden transitions from scene to scene. Yet what, when all is said and done, has it added up to? A soap bubble, vanishing at the prick of an invisible pin.

Ups and Downs

Mr. Munch is generally at his best with Brahms' First and so is the orchestra, but this performance didn't seem to go any too well. There were occasional ups and downs instrumentally, and the performance didn't have the usual luster. The slow movement was very beautifully done, however, and the finale brought the usual burst of applause and scattered bravos, yet I found myself more or less unmoved by it, perhaps from having been exposed to it too often.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning Nov. 23 with Vladimir Golschman as guest conductor. And what is Mr. Golschman playing? Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Fourth! To be sure he is also giving the American premiere of Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra and Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon," but the lack of imaginative programming that plagues these concerts was never better demonstrated than this.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TABLET
Circ. W. 93,165
NOV 10 1956

HONOR STUDENTS: Brooklyn Borough President John Cashmore and Mrs. Carroll J. Dickson, chairman of the Women's Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn, award season tickets to Eleanor Kistner and Jeannette Noell, honor music students at Bishop McDonnell High School. The concerts, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will open Friday, Nov. 16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 181,485
NOV 10 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Elgar, Stravinsky and Brahms

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the fifth program in the Friday-Saturday series: Elgar: Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky; "Card Game" Ballet; Brahms; Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Sir Edward Elgar and his polished, elegant music belonged to another age: the later Victorian and the Edwardian times when, for those who had the means to be polished and elegant, this was the best of all possible worlds. Now, though it continues to be the only world we know, it is unnerved by jitters of one kind and another. Consequently, such infrequent performances as we have of Elgar's music are both tonic and reassuring. They seem to re-connect us, even briefly, with enjoyment for the sake of enjoyment.

For this reason, I, for one derived much pleasure from Mr. Munch's enterprise in restoring the Introduction and Allegro for Strings, unheard from the Boston Symphony since 1941. There is no more stress in this music than that of a light breeze upon the surface of a lake in Summer. All is serenely beautiful.

In Elgar, too, all is very good taste, and a quality of writing whose standard is high. This is pure ear-and-mind pleasure, in the interplay of the strings in counterpoint, in the graceful sort of melody which came to Elgar in profusion, and in the solo touches based upon the old concert grosso manner. This variety of music, I suppose, might be called "decorative art," for the listener absorbs it from the outside; there is no emotional turmoil to draw him within.

It might be thought, in terms of the tonal egg-grading which is considered to be part of the reviewer's business, that such music is no more than pullet size. Perhaps, but the contents, in their way, are just as appetizing as that of the whopping double-volker, like the Brahms First Symphony which ends this program. Furthermore, Elgar here and elsewhere provided opportunity for strings like those of the Boston Symphony to sound in all the deep, rich glory they can command. Yesterday they sounded just like that.

Two Types of Ballet Music

There are two varieties of ballet music: the one that seems complete when heard simply as music at a concert, and the other which always seems to require visual spectacle at the same time. Stravinsky's "Card Game," wayward, clever and mobile though it is, belongs, as I hear it, to the second category. There just isn't enough purely musical continuity to keep one from thinking: "Now what would the dancers be doing at this point?"

Barber's "Medea" music, which we heard last week, is an example of the other kind of ballet music. It is complete, in emotional power and in musical continuity, by itself. More than that, it actually suggests what passes upon the stage. So, while capable of intermittent diversion, the mechanically rhythmic and sweet-sour "Card Game" is only part of a show. Perhaps not the better part, either.

Yesterday the audience clapped and cheered when Mr. Munch and the orchestra let go the mighty last C major chord of Brahms' First Symphony. They had reason to do so, for it had been a stirring, even exalting performance of a large masterwork. That chord, in itself, was a certain testimony to the nature of the whole performance, for Mr. Munch drew out the E's in the chord to make it sound full.

It was an interpretation of extreme attention to the various markings of dynamics and tempo in the score—the familiar tune of the finale was kept as moderate as Brahms must have intended when he wrote "fast, but not too much so," and it did not gather speed like a train leaving a station. When the word "animato" appeared, the conductor properly opened the throttle.

Horns Stressed

The first movement stressed the horns parts to the extent of bringing them into balance with strings and woodwinds more than is usual. The effect was good, and made me wonder if it had been accomplished simply by more volume or by more horns. There was some little tinkering with the tympani part, at least two rolls — where Brahms wrote quarter notes—in the last two chords of the big chorals near the end. That was not so good, but neither was it greatly important. What was important was the prevailing right style ocupled with Munch's own emotional drive and the marvelous response of the orchestra.

Next week the Orchestra goes to New York. At Symphony Hall, Nov. 23 and 24, Vladimir Golschmann will be guest conductor, presenting Kabalevsky's Overture to Colas Breugnon, the first American performance of Tansmans' Concerto for Orchestra; "La Mer," by Debussy, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Circ. D. 27,535 - S. 24,406
NOV 11 1956

Fiedler Reminisces In Strauss Program

It is appropriate to reminisce on an anniversary, and Arthur Fiedler does just that as he leads the Boston Pops Orchestra in "Waltzes By The Strauss Family" [LM-2029] on the RCA Victor Red Seal label. The new orthophonic high fidelity recording is one of those made during this Fiedler's silver anniversary year with the Boston Pops.

Fiedler has been identified with the Viennese waltz tradition since he began his career as a boy of 16 in the orchestra of Johann Strauss III. This Strauss was the son of Eduard, one of the three Strauss brothers who followed the lead of their father, the famous Johann, in the musical world.

The essence of the Viennese tradition, which Fiedler delineates romance, has been captured well too, in these waltzes, which make up the album. Three of the pieces are by Johann Strauss Jr., namely the Ottrom [illegible] "Tausend und eine Nacht" Op. 346 and [illegible] from [illegible] Op. [illegible] Two are by Josef Strauss, namely "Ach, [illegible]" Op. 271 and "Music of the Spheres" Op. 235. The sixth is by Eduard, "Destinn Op. [illegible]."

This pleasant selection ranges from the waltz at its height, it was born early in the nineteenth century and was the first dance in which couples embraced one another, and it [illegible] furore as the jive and roll today.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

The waltz that put the waltz [illegible] Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" which came out in [illegible] Fiedler. Its pattern of graciousness, chivalry, melodic charm and piquancy has been followed by the Viennese musical world to make the romantic haze of Vienna as much a "state of mind" as a geographical location.

—Sara Caldwell

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 10 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fifth concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Soloists were Alfred Krips and George Zazovsky, violins; Joseph de Pasquale, viola and Samuel Mayes, cello. The program:

Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Op. 47 ..... Elgar
"Jeu de Cartes" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Among the peaks that are the great majority of the Boston Symphony concerts there are occasional valleys. Yesterday's, for example.

The Elgar was good, the Stravinsky dry and clever, and who ever raises his voice against Brahms' First? Still and all it did not add up to a particularly interesting afternoon.

It is 15 years since Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings has been performed here, and 15 more will doubtless elapse before it is done again. It is a work of much persuasion, exploiting the strings more for their suavity and geniality than their virtuosity or their capacity for wide ranging sonorities. There are, in short, a good many other works for the string band that dig in to the medium, so to speak, more powerfully than this.

Ends Happily

Yet the materials here and the composer's methods are polished though not lacking in robustness. Stating at once a charming subject, he moves right along into an ingenious development that leads presently into a fugato section notable for its lack of contrapuntal clarity. This in turn leads to a recollection of the opening and a powerful statement of a little Welsh melody that was the inspiration of the work. All ends happily and sweetly.

The use of the solo string quartet lends additional interest to the composition, though it is never employed with the bravura of similar solo groups of the concerto grosso style of writing, commenting, and underlining the musical ideas rather than dominating or leading them. It was exceedingly well played by the string orchestra and made its point, but it nonetheless proved more on the special side than a universally communicating piece.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," for all its wit, its clean, spare lines, its wide variety of coloristic effects and rhythms, does not seem to lend itself too effectively to the concert hall. It is, after all, ballet music, and while a great deal of ballet music does make its way in concert, there are a number of notable exceptions. This, it seems to me, is one. The listener savors all the subtleties of the score, its piquant instrumental combinations, its sudden transitions from scene to scene. Yet what, when all is said and done, has it added up to? A soap bubble, vanishing at the prick of an invisible pin.

Ups and Downs

Mr. Munch is generally at his best with Brahms' First and so is the orchestra, but this performance didn't seem to go any too well. There were occasional ups and downs instrumentally, and the performance didn't have the usual luster. The slow movement was very beautifully done, however, and the finale brought the usual burst of applause and scattered bravos, yet I found myself more or less unmoved by it, perhaps from having been exposed to it too often.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning Nov. 23 with Vladimir Golschman as guest conductor. And what is Mr. Golschman playing? Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Fourth! To be sure he is also giving the American premiere of Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra and Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon," but the lack of imaginative programming that plagues these concerts was never better demonstrated than this.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Circ. D. 27,535 - S. 24,406

NOV 11 1956

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 10 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Elgar, Stravinsky and Brahms

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the fifth program in the Friday-Saturday series: Elgar: Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky: "Card Game" Ballet; Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Sir Edward Elgar and his polished, elegant music belonged to another age: the later Victorian and the Edwardian times when, for those who had the means to be polished and elegant, this was the best of all possible worlds. Now, though it continues to be the only world we know, it is unnerved by jitters of one kind and another. Consequently, such infrequent performances as we have of Elgar's music are both tonic and reassuring. They seem to re-connect us, even briefly, with enjoyment for the sake of enjoyment.

For this reason, I for one derived much pleasure from Mr. Munch's enterprise in restoring the Introduction and Allegro for Strings, unheard from the Boston Symphony since 1941. There is no more stress in this music than that of a light breeze upon the surface of a lake in Summer. All is serenely beautiful.

In Elgar, too, all is very good taste, and a quality of writing whose standard is high. This is pure ear-and-mind pleasure, in the interplay of the strings in counterpoint, in the graceful sort of melody which came to Elgar in profusion, and in the solo touches based upon the old concert grosso manner. This variety of music, I suppose, might be called "decorative art," for the listener absorbs it from the outside; there is no emotional turmoil to draw him within.

It might be thought, in terms of the tonal egg-grading which is considered to be part of the reviewer's business, that such music is no more than pullet size. Perhaps, but the contents, in their way, are just as appetizing as that of the whopping double-volker, like the Brahms First Symphony which ends this program. Furthermore, Elgar here and elsewhere provided opportunity for strings like those of the Boston Symphony to sound in all the deep, rich glory they can command. Yesterday they sounded just like that.

Two Types of Ballet Music

There are two varieties of ballet music: the one that seems complete when heard simply as music at a concert, and the other which always seems to require visual spectacle at the same time. Stravinsky's "Card Game," waggish, clever and mobile though it is, belongs, as I hear it, to the second category. There just isn't enough purely musical continuity to keep one from thinking: "Now what would the dancers be doing at this point?"

Barber's "Medea" music, which we heard last week, is an example of the other kind of ballet music. It is complete, in emotional power and in musical continuity, by itself. More than that, it actually suggests what passes upon the stage. So, while capable of intermittent diversion, the mechanically rhythmic and sweet-sour "Card Game" is only part of a show. Perhaps not the better part, either.

Yesterday's audience clapped and cheered when Mr. Munch and the orchestra let go the mighty last C major chord of Brahms' First Symphony. They had reason to do so, for this had been a stirring, even exalting performance of a large masterwork. That chord, in itself, was a certain testimony to the nature of the whole performance, for Mr. Munch drew out the E's in the chord to make it sound full.

It was an interpretation of extreme attention to the various markings of dynamics and tempo in the score—the familiar tune of the finale was kept as moderate as Brahms must have meant when he wrote "fast, but not too much so," and it did not gather speed like a train leaving a station. When the word "animato" appeared, the conductor properly opened the throttle.

Horns Stressed

The first movement stressed the horns parts to the extent of bringing them into balance with strings and woodwinds more than is usual. The effect was good, and made me wonder if it had been accomplished simply by more volume or by more horns. There was some little tinkering with the tympani part, at least two rolls — where Brahms wrote quarter notes—in the last two chords of the big chorals near the end. That was not so good, but neither was it greatly important. What was important was the prevailing right style ocupled with Munch's own emotional drive and the marvelous response of the orchestra.

Next week the Orchestra goes to New York. At Symphony Hall, Nov. 23 and 24, Vladimir Golschmann will be guest conductor, presenting Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon"; the first American performance of Tansmans' Concerto for Orchestra; "La Mer," by Debussy, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TABLET
Circ. W. 93,165

NOV 10 1956

HONOR STUDENTS: Brooklyn Borough President John Cashmore and Mrs. Carroll J. Dickson, chairman of the Women's Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn, award season tickets to Eleanor Kistner and Jeannette Noell, honor music students at Bishop McDonnell High School. The concerts, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will open Friday, Nov. 16.

Fiedler Reminisces In Strauss Program

It is appropriate to reminisce on an anniversary, and Arthur Fiedler does just that as he leads the Boston Pops Orchestra in "Waltzes By The Strauss Family" [LM-2028] on the RCA Victor Red Seal Label. The new orthophonic high fidelity recording is one of those made during this Fiedler's silver anniversary year with the Boston Pops.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Fiedler has been identified with the Viennese waltz tradition since he began his career as a boy of 16 in the orchestra of Johann Strauss III. This Strauss was the son of Eduard, one of the three Strauss brothers who followed the lead of their father, the famous Johann, in the musical world.

The essence of the Viennese tradition, which Fiedler delivers as romance, has been captured well, too, in these selections which make up the album. Three of the six are by Johann Strauss Jr.: "Where the Citrons Bloom, Op. 364," "One Thousand and One Nights, Op. 346" and "Roses from the South, Op. [illegible]." Two are by Josef Strauss: "Sweet Attractions, Op. [illegible]" and "Music of the Spheres, Op. 235." The sixth is by Eduard, "Doctrine, Op. [illegible]."

This pleasant selection illustrates the waltz at its height. It was born early in the nineteenth century and was the first dance in which couples embraced one another. And it created as much furore as has the rock and roll today!

The waltz that put the waltz over was Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" which came out in [illegible] with Fiedler. Its pattern of gracefulness, chivalry, melodic charm and piquancy has been followed by the Viennese musical world to make the romantic haze of Vienna as much a "state of mind" as a geographical location.

—Sara Caldwell

154

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 99,506

NOV 11 1956

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch, wielding the baton, will present a concert in Woolsey Hall on Tuesday night. This is the third concert of the current Woolsey Hall Series.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

NOV 11 1956

VISITING MUSICIANS CONVERGE ON CARNEGIE HALL THIS WEEK

William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony prepare for Friday's concert with Inge Borkh, soprano, who will make her debut here at this event.

Paul Paray, musical director of the Detroit Symphony, who will take over as guest conductor of the Philharmonic for two weeks beginning Thursday.

Photo Associates, Tony Spina and Gus Manos.

Charles Munch brings the Boston Symphony here for the first of its series of concerts in New York and Brooklyn Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
Circ. D. 637,561 - S. 1,124,395

NOV

Bostonians to Return

Munch Conducts On Forum Program

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, annual favorites of The Philadelphia Forum series, a ... The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc., will be heard in ... cert at the Academy of Music Thursday evening.

CHARLES MUNCH

For the Forum program, the celebrated conductor has chosen three familiar and melodious works. The concert will begin with the playing of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris." This will be followed by Debussy's "Images" ("Images" for Orchestra, in ...

The post intermission work is Tchaikovsy's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

VERSATILE CONDUCTOR

Munch, who is the 10th ... conductor of the great musical organization which just has celebrated the 75th anniversary of its founding by Bostonian Henry L. Higginson, naturally has shown an affinity for Gallic composers such as Debussy and Berlioz because of his own French upbringing.

But he has displayed a surprising range and versatility in his programming. In his second season as the Symphony's permanent master he did not repeat a single work he had presented in his first year.

SALUTE TO MUSIC

In his book, "I Am a Conductor," Munch has written, "Music is the art of expressing the inexpressible. It rises far above what words can mean or the intelligence define. Its domain is the imponderable and impalpable land of reverie. Man's right to speak this language is for me the most precious gift that heaven has bestowed upon us. And we have no right to misuse it.

"Whenever I am about to conduct a concert, at the moment when the musicians are holding their breath and the bows are ... a fraction of an inch in the air above the strings, at that moment of infinite silence before the first note is heard, all these things run through my mind—just as all your life is said to pass in a flash before your eyes at the moment of death."

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
Circ. D. 705,054 - S. 709,787
NOV 11 1956

Boston and] To Be Heard

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

A WEEK of instrumental and choral music looms ahead of us this week, as the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra offer programs at the Academy of Music, and Singing City, the chorus sponsored by Fellowship House, also makes its bow on Tuesday evening at the Academy of Music.

Thursday evening brings us the famed Boston Symphony. Its appearance this year is not without a touch of drama, for this famed orchestra has just returned from Moscow and Leningrad, having replaced the Philadelphia Orchestra, some of whose members voted against making the trip.

The Boston Symphony rounded off its European tour with triumphant appearances at the Edinborough Festival, and with an unprecedented concert in the ever-glorious Cathedral of Chartres, where an audience of some 10,000 contributed, through attendance, a substantial sum for the restoration of this wondrous edifice.

Presented here for the 24th time by William K. Huff's Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony will be directed by its famed conductor, Charles Munch, who will do some guest-conducting here in Philadelphia, later in the season.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony in our main concert hall always constitutes one of the distinguished musical events of the city's season. Like all the truly great orchestras, the Boston Symphony has its own particular tone and its way of presenting things. Just as actors and singers differ sharply from one another, so do symphony orchestras, which is one of the fascinating angles offered to keen followers of symphonic fare.

The Boston Symphony is scheduled to open its program, this Thursday night, in classic style with Mozart's ineffably lovely Symphony in D Major, also known as the "Paris." Mr. Munch will then have an opportunity to show his fine French hand in Debussy's "Iberia" (Images for Orchestra No. 2). He will conclude his program with a playing of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, the famed "Pathetique."

• • •

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra's weekend concerts will be highlighted by the first appearances here in more than seven years of the famed 'cello virtuoso, Gregor Piatigorsky. The Monday evening audience will also have the privilege of hearing a man who is generally ranked as the world's top active 'cellist.

Eugene Ormandy has arranged an interesting program in which Mr. Piatigorsky is scheduled to play the Dvorak Concerto in B Minor—a specialty of the Russian-born virtuoso. Incidentally dentally

one of America
Orchest
The o gram wi mous ove the late phony N mixed c which is Cycle" ( Hsuan).
This la

CHA ducts chest of M greate years voices.
this T sent area.

Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 99,506
NOV 11 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Concert In Woolsey Hall

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

One of Europe's greatest orchestras, the Berlin Philharmonic, was here a few weeks ago to open the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. On Tuesday evening one of this country's greatest symphony orchestras, the Boston Symphony, will make its first appearance of the season to give the third concert of the current series. Aided by the proximity of the events, subscribers to these concerts will be better enabled to compare the merits of the two world famous orchestras.

It will be recalled that the Boston musicians have just recently returned from their second European tour during which they had the distinction of being the first major American orchestra to penetrate the Iron Curtain. The Boston Orchestra appeared in most of the principal European music centers, giving two concerts in such places as London and Paris and making five appearances at the celebrated Edinburgh Festival. All of the orchestra's concerts abroad were wildly acclaimed and even the Soviet Union went all out in its efforts to make the Boston musicians' Russian stay a memorable one. The government handled all details connected with housing and transportation of the orchestra and honored it with an auspicious official reception attended by high Soviet officials and the American embassy staff.

Present world conditions notwithstanding, this latest European jaunt of the Boston Orchestra undoubtedly did much to remind our neighbors across the sea that we are concerned with aesthetic matters as well as material things. At each concert on the recent tour, at least one contemporary American work was included. Harvard's Walter Piston, whose Fifth Symphony will be heard here on Tuesday evening, was among the American composers whose works were performed. The Festival Overture, by Isadore Freed of the Hartt Music School in Hartford, was another American work included in the repertoire of the tour.

One of the most unusual concerts given by the orchestra was that presented in the celebrated Gothic Cathedral in Chartres, France, believed to be the first orchestral program ever given there. Elaborate preparations were made for the event. Special platforms to accommodate the Boston musicians were erected in the main part of the cathedral and the 3,000 square yards of the ancient edifice's beautiful stained glass windows had specially constructed exterior lighting during the concert. Incidentally, the proceeds of this event were donated to the maintenance fund of the cathedral. A previous concert in Dublin, Ireland, was given for the benefit of the fund for rebuilding the 97-year-old archdiocesan Seminary of the Holy Cross at Clonliffe.

We are indeed fortunate in having the opportunity of hearing two concerts each season by the virtuoso Boston Symphony. But for the efforts of Daggett M. Lee, the schedule would have been reduced a few years ago to one Woolsey Hall concert each season. This would have been a great loss to many music devotees here, particularly those who have an interest in music of our time. We have come to depend upon this famous symphonic ensemble for our principal hearings of contemporary music, such as the Piston work to be heard on Tuesday evening. The balance of Tuesday's program will be devoted to Mozart's D major Symphony ("Paris") and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony ("Pathetique"). Charles Munch, the orchestra's regular conductor, will be on the podium.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
CLIPPING BUREAU
ch Street - New York
ORK CITY, N. Y.
AL AMERICAN
653,991 - S. 855,847
1 1956

on to Play hoven's 3d

n's Symphony No. 3, will be performed by es Munch and the ymphony Orchestra y evening, 8:30 p.m., pera House of the cademy of Music.

ert launches a series lay evening perform- e Academy and inau- e orchestra's 1956- in the Metropolitan more than any other e in the Boston re- he "Eroica" captured n of prominent Euro- s on the orchestra's the auspices of the Dept. and the Amer- ional Theatre and ast Summer.

nphony opened the in both Leningrad w on Sept. 6 and 8, Boston became the ern Symphony Or- perform in the Soviet

BY PRESIDENT

o sell-out audiences the continent and 105-man organiza- ceived the personal President Eisenhow- a letter to Henry B. hestra president

r outstanding Amer- he men and women ton Symphony dis- alents to the people ntries, the cause of d understanding is ltly, Borough Presi- ore issued a procla- this week be de- Boston Symphony Brooklyn Week."

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

Y.

553,302

Be 16

y No. 3, rmed by the Bos-
a Friday,
he Opera Academy pens a se-ning peremy and ra's 1956-tropolitan

tured the European s tour un-
U. S. State
Department and the American National Theatre and Academy (ANTA) last Summer.

This symphony served to open the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western symphony orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

Borough President Cashmore has issued a proclamation that the week beginning today (Sunday) designated "Boston Symphony, Welcome to Brooklyn Week." The proclamation stated in part that the Friday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn over the past six

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 12,928
NOV 13 1956

155

Boston Symphony Concert Rewarding At Smith College

A well defined program marked the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch to John M. Greene Hall last evening, in the second of the current Smith College Concert series. Moving from the exquisite elegance of Mozart through the academic contemporary Walter Piston to end with the incomparably impassioned sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky it was a concert of dazzling richness.

Though not among the most popular of his many compositions, Mozart's Paris Symphony K297, is a work of lucid simplicity. Just as Mozart had composed it with particular regard for the pleasure of Parisian audiences, so Mr. Munch and the orchestra displayed its harmonically simple themes, graceful beauty and intricate polyphony, with the matchless skill they have led their audiences to expect and receive.

A complete and not unpleasant change to the complex in harmony and melodic line ensued with the performance of Walter Piston's fifth symphony, composed in 1954, and first performed in New York in 1956. It is interesting for its carefully contrived construction and abundance of rhythmic vigor; the first movement seems by far the most encompassing, especially in its array of tonal colors; with the composer's notes it was relatively simple to follow the slow and finely drawn theme and variations of the second movement; the syncopated themes of the finale seemed a little repetitious in spite of modal changes. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a careful and considerate reading.

The intermission was well placed, as it set apart the profound and emotional sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. One is nevermore aware of Mr. Munch's sensitive and continuous searching of the composer's personal and musical utterances than at a performance of a popular composition. In spite of numerous live and recorded hearings there is always freshly gleaned inspiration, sometimes audacious but never obvious or distorted. Such was last night's performance of the Sixth; never has it moved through such gradations of sound; when the strings had seemingly given their all, a rich reserve of vibrant tone was still there to be exposed and to move one with its powerful intensity. The music called for the utmost virtuosity of the whole orchestra; the response could not fail to have moved even the most lethargic concert-goer. The brilliant and climactic finish of the third movement did sweep much of the audience into a burst of applause at the finale, not in hopes of an encore as Mr. Munch has at times graciously conceded, but out of sincere appreciation and supreme pleasure.

The next concert will see the return of the Cleveland Symphony on Feb. 9.

M. deB. B.

w England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
LOUCESTER, Mass.
dependent Republican
Circ. 8,809
NOV 14 1956

SYMPHONY TOUR PICTURES TO BE SHOWN THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers [redacted] are interested in the first showing of the official color pictures of the musicians' summer tour in Europe and Russia.

The showing will take place on Thursday, November 15, at 8.15 p.m. at Fellowship House on Monument avenue, Swampscott.

The illustrated lecture will be given by J. Edward Fitzgerald, Boston newsman (United Press), who was the official photographer for Boston Symphony, and will be sponsored by the Quota Club of Lynn, women's service club.

President of the club is Miss Hazel Anderson, former resident of Rockport. Tickets will be available at the door.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 188
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
Circ. D. 705,054 - S. 709,787
NOV 11 1956

MUSIC

Boston and Phila. Orchestras To Be Heard in Week's Concerts

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

A WEEK of instrumental and choral music looms ahead of us this week, as the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra offer programs at the Academy of Music, and Singing City, the chorus sponsored by Fellowship House, also makes its bow on Tuesday evening at the Academy of Music.

Thursday evening brings us the famed Boston Symphony. Its appearance this year is not without a touch of drama, for this famed orchestra has just returned from Moscow and Leningrad, having replaced the Philadelphia Orchestra, some of whose members voted against making the trip.

The Boston Symphony rounded off its European tour with triumphant appearances at the Edinborough Festival, and with an unprecedented concert in the ever-glorious Cathedral of Chartres, where an audience of some 10,000 contributed, through attendance, a substantial sum for the restoration of this wondrous edifice.

Presented here for the 24th time by William K. Huff's Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony will be directed by its famed conductor, Charles Munch, who will do some guest-conducting here in Philadelphia, later in the season.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony in our main concert hall always constitutes one of the distinguished musical events of the city's season. Like all the truly great orchestras, the Boston Symphony has its own particular tone and its way of presenting things. Just as actors and singers differ sharply from one another, so do symphony orchestras, which is one of the fascinating angles offered to keen followers of symphonic fare.

The Boston Symphony is scheduled to open its program, this Thursday night, in classic style with Mozart's ineffably lovely Symphony in D Major, also known as the "Paris." Mr. Munch will then have an opportunity to show his fine French hand in Debussy's "Iberia" (Images for Orchestra No. 2). He will conclude his program with a playing of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, the famed "Pathetique."

• • •

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra's weekend concerts will be highlighted by the first appearances here in more than seven years of the famed 'cello virtuoso, Gregor Piatigorsky. The Monday evening audience will also have the privilege of hearing a man who is generally ranked as the world's top active 'cellist.

Eugene Ormandy has arranged an interesting program in which Mr. Piatigorsky is scheduled to play the Dvorak Concerto in B Minor—a specialty of the Russian-born virtuoso. Incidentally, Mr. Piatigorsky made one of his first appearances in America with the Philadelphia Orchestra in November, 1929.

The opening half of the program will contain Weber's famous overture to "Oberon," and the late Harl McDonald's Symphony No. 3, for solo soprano, mixed chorus and orchestra, which is subtitled "A Tragic Cycle" (Lamentations of Fu Hsuan).

This latter work was first presented here by Leopold Stokowski in January, 1936; it has not been performed here since. Emelina De Vita will be heard in the solo part, while William R. Smith's Philadelphia Orchestra chorus, aided and abbeted by the Musical Art Society of Camden, directed by Henry C. Smith, 3d, will also take part.

Only the Dvorak Concerto will be repeated on Monday

Continued on Page 8, Col. 3

CHARLES MUNCH conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in visit to Academy of Music, Thursday night.

greater Philadelphia. Over the years it has enlisted some 5,000 voices. The singers and dancers this Tuesday night will represent the entire Philadelphia area.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 188
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
NOV 11 1956

Boston to Play Beethoven's 3d

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," will be performed by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, 8:30 p.m., in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The concert launches a series of five Friday evening performances at the Academy and inaugurates the orchestra's 1956-1957 season in the Metropolitan Area.

Perhaps more than any other single piece in the Boston repertoire, the "Eroica" captured the acclaim of prominent European critics on the orchestra's tour under the auspices of the U.S. State Dept. and the American National Theatre and Academy last Summer.

The symphony opened the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western Symphony Orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

CITED BY PRESIDENT

Playing to sell-out audiences throughout the continent and Britain, the 105-man organization has received the personal citation of President Eisenhower, who in a letter to Henry B. Cabot, orchestra president wrote:

"Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced."

More recently, Borough President Cashmore issued a proclamation that this week be designated "Boston Symphony Welcome to Brooklyn Week."

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

Department and the American National Theatre and Academy (ANTA) last Summer.

This symphony served to open the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western symphony orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

Borough President Cashmore has issued a proclamation that the week beginning today (Sunday) designated "Boston Symphony, Welcome to Brooklyn Week." The proclamation stated in part that the Friday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn over the past six

155
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 12,928
NOV 13 1956

Boston Symphony Concert Rewarding At Smith College

A well defined program marked the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch to John M. Greene Hall last evening, in the second of the current Smith College Concert series. Moving from the exquisite elegance of Mozart through the academic contemporary Walter Piston to end with the incompartably impassioned sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky it was a concert of dazzling richness.

Though not among the most popular of his many compositions, Mozart's Paris Symphony K297, is a work of lucid simplicity. Just as Mozart had composed it with particular regard for the pleasure of Parisian audiences, so Mr. Munch and the orchestra displayed its harmonically simple themes, graceful beauty and intricate polyphony, with the matchless skill they have led their audiences to expect and receive.

A complete and not unpleasant change to the complex in harmony and melodic line ensued with the performance of Walter Piston's fifth symphony, composed in 1954, and first performed in New York in 1956. It is interesting for its carefully contrived construction and abundance of rhythmic vigor; the first movement seems by far the most encompassing, especially in its array of tonal colors; with the composer's notes it was relatively simple to follow the slow and finely drawn theme and variations of the second movement; the syncopated themes of the finale seemed a little repetitious in spite of modal changes. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a careful and considerate reading.

The intermission was well placed, as it set apart the profound and emotional sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. One is nevermore aware of Mr. Munch's sensitive and continuous searching of the composer's personal and musical utterances than at a performance of a popular composition. In spite of numerous live and recorded hearings there is always freshly gleaned inspiration, sometimes audacious but never obvious or distorted. Such was last night's performance of the Sixth; never has it moved through such gradations of sound; when the strings had seemingly given their all, a rich reserve of vibrant tone was still there to be exposed and to move one with its powerful intensity. The music called for the utmost virtuosity of the whole orchestra; the response could not fail to have moved even the most lethargic concert-goer. The brilliant and climactic finish of the third movement did sweep much of the audience into a burst of applause at the finale, not in hopes of an encore as Mr. Munch has at times graciously conceded, but out of sincere appreciation and supreme pleasure.

The next concert will see the return of the Cleveland Symphony on Feb. 9.

M. deB. B.

w England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
LOUCESTER, Mass.
dependent Republican
Circ. 8,809
NOV 14 1956

SYMPHONY TOUR PICTURES TO BE SHOWN THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers [redacted] are interested in the first showing of the official color pictures of the musicians' summer tour in Europe and Russia.

The showing will take place on Thursday, November 15, at 8.15 p.m. at Fellowship House on Monument avenue, Swampscott.

The illustrated lecture will be given by J. Edward Fitzgerald, Boston newsman (United Press), who was the official photographer for Boston Symphony, and will be sponsored by the Quota Club of Lynn, women's service club.

President of the club is Miss Hazel Anderson, former resident of Rockport. Tickets will be available at the door.

Estonians in Music Events

Continued From Page 7

night, when the program will avail itself of Gliere's "Ilya Mourametz" Symphony and of the Kabalevsky "Colas Breugnon" Overture.

• • •

COMMEMORATING the 250th anniversary of Benjamin Franklin's birth, Singing City, a major musical project of Fellowship House, will present more than 300 outstanding singers and dancers at the Academy of Music, this Tuesday night.

The founder and director of this important choral group is Elaine Brown, formerly choral director at Temple University. Musical Philadelphians are not apt to forget that they will hear top-flight choral singing when Mrs. Brown has a hand in it.

Among items scheduled to be heard and seen is a concert-drama, a choral opera entitled "Mr. Franklin Builds a Bridge." This piece is designed to pay tribute to the memory of Franklin, who was famous for his contributions to good-will and understanding among all manner of people.

With sentiments of brotherhood in mind, the program will include religious music, representing Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish groups among the early Philadelphia settlers.

Singing City is a massive choir of many choirs. It was founded by Mrs. Brown as an instrument to bring better understanding through music among people of various racial and religious backgrounds.

The Singing City actually encompasses approximately 50 choruses, from synagogues, churches, civic organizations, and other groups throughout greater Philadelphia. Over the years it has enlisted some 5,000 voices. The singers and dancers this Tuesday night will represent the entire Philadelphia area.

CHARLES MUNCH conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in visit to Academy of Music, Thursday night.

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street New York
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
NOV 11 1956

Boston to Play Beethoven's 3d

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," will be performed by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, 8:30 p.m., in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The concert launches a series of five Friday evening performances at the Academy and inaugurates the orchestra's 1956-1957 season in the Metropolitan Area.

Perhaps more than any other single piece in the Boston repertoire, the "Eroica" captured the acclaim of prominent European critics on the orchestra's tour under the auspices of the U.S. State Dept. and the American National Theatre and Academy last Summer.

The symphony opened the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western Symphony Orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

CITED BY PRESIDENT

Playing to sell-out audiences throughout the continent and Britain, the 105-man organization has received the personal citation of President Eisenhower, who in a letter to Henry B. Cabot, orchestra president wrote:

"Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced."

More recently, Borough President Cashmore issued a proclamation that this week be designated "Boston Symphony Welcome to Brooklyn Week."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
Circ. D. 897,711 - S. 1,559,216
NOV 11 1956

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
Circ. D. 2,092,455 - S. 3,653,302
NOV 11 1956

'Eroica' to Be Heard Nov. 16

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," will be performed by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 16, at 8:30 p.m. in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert opens a series of five Friday evening performances at the Academy and inaugurates the Orchestra's 1956-1957 season in the Metropolitan area.

THE "EROICA" captured the acclaim of prominent European critics on the orchestra's tour under the auspices of the U. S. State Department and the American National Theatre and Academy (ANTA) last Summer.

This symphony served to open the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western symphony orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

Borough President Cashmore has issued a proclamation that the week beginning today (Sunday) designated "Boston Symphony. Welcome to Brooklyn Week." The proclamation stated in part that the Friday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn over the past six decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 12,928
NOV 13 1956

155

Boston Symphony Concert Rewarding At Smith College

A well defined program marked the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch to John M. Greene Hall last evening, in the second of the current Smith College Concert series. Moving from the exquisite elegance of Mozart through the academic contemporary Walter Piston to end with the incomparably impassioned sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky it was a concert of dazzling richness.

Though not among the most popular of his many compositions, Mozart's Paris Symphony K297, is a work of lucid simplicity. Just as Mozart had composed it with particular regard for the pleasure of Parisian audiences, so Mr. Munch and the orchestra displayed its harmonically simple themes, graceful beauty and intricate polyphony, with the matchless skill they have led their audiences to expect and receive.

A complete and not unpleasant change to the complex in harmony and melodic line ensued with the performance of Walter Piston's fifth symphony, composed in 1954, and first performed in New York in 1956. It is interesting for its carefully contrived construction and abundance of rhythmic vigor; the first movement seems by far the most encompassing, especially in its array of tonal colors; with the composer's notes it was relatively simple to follow the slow and finely drawn theme and variations of the second movement; the syncopated themes of the finale seemed a little repetitious in spite of modal changes. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a careful and considerate reading.

The intermission was well placed, as it set apart the profound and emotional sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. One is nevermore aware of Mr. Munch's sensitive and continuous searching of the composer's personal and musical utterances than at a performance of a popular composition. In spite of numerous live and recorded hearings there is always freshly gleaned inspiration, sometimes audacious but never obvious or distorted. Such was last night's performance of the Sixth; never has it moved through such gradations of sound; when the strings had seemingly given their all, a rich reserve of vibrant tone was still there to be exposed and to move one with its powerful intensity. The music called for the utmost virtuosity of the whole orchestra; the response could not fail to have moved even the most lethargic concert-goer. The brilliant and climactic finish of the third movement did sweep much of the audience into a burst of applause at the finale, not in hopes of an encore as Mr. Munch has at times graciously conceded, but out of sincere appreciation and supreme pleasure.

The next concert will see the return of the Cleveland Symphony on Feb. 9.

M. deB. R.

w England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
LOUCESTER, Mass.
dependent Republican
Circ. 8,809
NOV 14 1956

SYMPHONY TOUR PICTURES TO BE SHOWN THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers [redacted] are interested in the first showing of the official color pictures of the musicians' summer tour in Europe and Russia.

The showing will take place on Thursday, November 15, at 8.15 p.m. at Fellowship House on Monument avenue, Swampscott.

The illustrated lecture will be given by J. Edward Fitzgerald, Boston newsman (United Press), who was the official photographer for Boston Symphony, and will be sponsored by the Quota Club of Lynn, women's service club.

President of the club is Miss Hazel Anderson, former resident of Rockport. Tickets will be available at the door.

Estonians in Music Events

Continued From Page 7

...when the program will ...self of Gliere's "Ilya Mouramets" Symphony and of ...Kabalevsky "Colas Breugnon" Overture.

• • •

COMMEMORATING the 250th anniversary of Benjamin Franklin's birth, Singing City, a major musical project of Fellowship House, will present more than 300 outstanding singers and dancers at the Academy of Music, this Tuesday night.

The founder and director of this important choral group is Elaine Brown, formerly choral director at Temple University. Musical Philadelphians are not apt to forget that they will hear top-flight choral singing when Mrs. Brown has a hand in it.

Among items scheduled to be heard and seen is a concert-drama, a choral opera entitled "Mr. ...

CHARLES MUNCH conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in visit to Academy of Music, Thursday night.

greater Philadelphia. Over the years it has enlisted some 5,000 voices. The singers and dancers this Tuesday night will represent the entire Philadelphia area.

Big or Small MAYS
Clothes
'Em all

Burrelle's
ESTABLISHED 1888
BArclay 7-5371
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
165 Church Street - New York

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
NOV 11 1956

Boston to Play Beethoven's 3d

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," will be performed by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, 8:30 p.m., in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The concert launches a series of five Friday evening performances at the Academy and inaugurates the orchestra's 1956-1957 season in the Metropolitan Area.

Perhaps more than any other single piece in the Boston repertoire, the "Eroica" captured the acclaim of prominent European critics on the orchestra's tour under the auspices of the U.S, State Dept. and the American National Theatre and Academy last Summer.

The symphony opened the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western Symphony Orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

CITED BY PRESIDENT

Playing to sell-out audiences throughout the continent and Britain, the 105-man organization has received the personal citation of President Eisenhower, who in a letter to Henry B. Cabot, orchestra president wrote:

"Whenever outstanding Americans like the men and women of the Boston Symphony display their talents to the people of other countries, the cause of international understanding is advanced."

More recently, Borough President Cashmore issued a proclamation that this week be designated "Boston Symphony Welcome to Brooklyn Week."

decades have "helped keep Brooklyn in the forefront of the musical life of our country."

THE PROGRAM Friday will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Debussy "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major.

Heard Nov. 16

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," will be performed by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 16, at 8:30 p.m. in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert opens a series of five Friday evening performances at the Academy and inaugurates the Orchestra's 1956-1957 season in the Metropolitan area.

THE "EROICA" captured the acclaim of prominent European critics on the orchestra's tour under the auspices of the U. S. State Department and the American National Theatre and Academy (ANTA) last Summer.

This symphony served to open the programs in both Leningrad and Moscow on Sept. 6 and 8, when the Boston became the first Western symphony orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

Borough President Cashmore has issued a proclamation that the week beginning today (Sunday) designated "Boston Symphony, Welcome to Brooklyn Week." The proclamation stated in part that the Friday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn over the past six

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 12,928
NOV 13 1956

Boston Symphony Concert Rewarding At Smith College

A well defined program marked the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch to John M. Greene Hall last evening, in the second of the current Smith College Concert series. Moving from the exquisite elegance of Mozart through the academic contemporary Walter Piston to end with the incomparably impassioned sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky it was a concert of dazzling richness.

Though not among the most popular of his many compositions, Mozart's Paris Symphony K297, is a work of lucid simplicity. Just as Mozart had composed it with particular regard for the pleasure of Parisian audiences, so Mr. Munch and the orchestra displayed its harmonically simple themes, graceful beauty and intricate polyphony, with the matchless skill they have led their audiences to expect and receive.

A complete and not unpleasant change to the complex in harmony and melodic line ensued with the performance of Walter Piston's fifth symphony, composed in 1954, and first performed in New York in 1956. It is interesting for its carefully contrived construction and abundance of rhythmic vigor; the first movement seems by far the most encompassing, especially in its array of tonal colors; with the composer's notes it was relatively simple to follow the slow and finely drawn theme and variations of the second movement; the syncopated themes of the finale seemed a little repetitious in spite of modal changes. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a careful and considerate reading.

The intermission was well placed, as it set apart the profound and emotional sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. One is nevermore aware of Mr. Munch's sensitive and continuous searching of the composer's personal and musical utterances than at a performance of a popular composition. In spite of numerous live and recorded hearings there is always freshly gleaned inspiration, sometimes audacious but never obvious or distorted. Such was last night's performance of the Sixth; never has it moved through such gradations of sound; when the strings had seemingly given their all, a rich reserve of vibrant tone was still there to be exposed and to move one with its powerful intensity. The music called for the utmost virtuosity of the whole orchestra; the response could not fail to have moved even the most lethargic concert-goer. The brilliant and climactic finish of the third movement did sweep much of the audience into a burst of applause at the finale, not in hopes of an encore as Mr. Munch has at times graciously conceded, but out of sincere appreciation and supreme pleasure.

The next concert will see the return of the Cleveland Symphony on Feb. 9.

M. deB. B.

w England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
LOUCESTER, Mass.
dependent Republican
Circ. 8,809
NOV 14 1956

SYMPHONY TOUR PICTURES TO BE SHOWN THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers are interested in the first showing of the official color pictures of the musicians' summer tour in Europe and Russia.

The showing will take place on Thursday, November 15, at 8.15 p.m. at Fellowship House on Monument avenue, Swampscott.

The illustrated lecture will be given by J. Edward Fitzgerald, Boston newsman (United Press), who was the official photographer for Boston Symphony, and will be sponsored by the Quota Club of Lynn, women's service club.

President of the club is Miss Hazel Anderson, former resident of Rockport. Tickets will be available at the door.

TIGHT BINDING

156

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 5 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 14 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TOP FORM FOR WOOLSEY CONCERT

Brilliance or bust! This isn't the slogan of the Boston Symphony but it might well be, as we were reminded once again Tuesday evening when the celebrated orchestra made its first appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston musicians, was on the podium for a program which highlighted a new symphony by Harvard's Walter Piston.

Fresh from its recent European tour, the orchestra was in top form. It is to be hoped that the Boston ensemble played abroad the way it did here for in that case its playing may be said to be truly representative of American life — loud, fast, furious and rewarding!

Mr. Munch may be getting older but he still has young ideas and doesn't seem to be slowing up perceptively in tempos, that is! Take the Tchaikovsky Sixth, the major offering in yesterday's third concert of the Woolsey series. A timing of this performance must surely have revealed that it was one of the fastest ever achieved; surely it was one of the most brilliant. Bright tempos reached their zenith in the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, where many string passages were almost in the category of glissandos. Massive climaxes were of the order throughout to reveal the work's grandeur while its pathos and solemnity registered most impressively in the opening and closing moments of hushed sonorities.

Other orchestras, notably the foreign ones which we have heard recently, may sometimes give more refined performances than the Boston Symphony and even excel the latter at times in a lushness of string sonorities. But the "excesses" of this great American orchestra, so characteristic in yesterday's Tchaikovsky performance, add an overall exciting quality unmatched by other symphonic groups. The penetrating brilliance and carrying power of the Boston strings lends itself admirably to interpretive conceptions aimed to project a work's greatest dramatic impact. The Tchaikovsky performance certainly found a full realization of this potential. It was a wow!

The opening Mozart "Paris" Symphony received the vigorous treatment with a resulting roughness in attack and accenting at times but on the whole this was a minor consideration in view of a beautifully precisioned performance in all respects.

The Harvard composer's Fifth Symphony, which represented the program's new music interest, must have had more than an academic interest for the Yale musicians in the audience. At least they were probably more receptive to the work which was commissioned by the Juilliard School of Music and first performed there on Feb. 24 of this year.

Comments overheard after the performance indicated a mixed reaction to the work on the part of the audience. The writer was on the affirmative side and his approval was in no wise influenced by a pupil's loyalty to his former teacher! He was specially taken with the "ordered cacophony" of the final movement which the Boston musicians played with a zest and power that permitted the brasses a blaring opportunity. The new symphony is one of the most colorful and imaginative of this scholarly composer's efforts to date though his excellent book on harmony would be of little help in unravelling its dissonant structure.

Did I detect a certain jazz influence, rhythmically speaking, professor?

G. E. A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 5 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 14 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Notable Woolsey Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its two annually scheduled concerts at Woolsey Hall last night and under Charles Munch's baton gave a magnificent performance of Tschaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony No. 6 before a capacity audience.

This last symphony of the great composer was dramatically presented by the symphony with all of the melancholy grandeur which identifies it as one of the most expressive of concert works. Its moods were brilliantly presented by the orchestra as Munch led his musicians through the maze of chromatic themes, from the burning intensity of the first movements to the dirge-like last one. Through the winds, strings and trumpets a most fascinating picture of pathos and tragedy was painted in music. It was the final work for the evening and the audience stood, cheering and applauding both the men and the music.

Mozart's Symphony in D Major, the "Paris" symphony, opened the program; filled with grace and a singularly lovely theme. The orchestra's deft and smooth performance made it a delight to the ear.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, which was performed by the orchestra on its recent European concert tour, was found to be interesting to New Haveners, most of whom were hearing it for the first time. Composed in 1954, as a commission for the Julliard School, the first performance was given this year in February by the Julliard Orchestra. It is full of a variety of interests and is generally light in mood.

The Boston Symphony comes back to New Haven in February.

—F. R. J.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

NOV 16 1956

BOWS AT ACADEMY . . . Charles Munch will direct the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in its debut this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Symphony showed off the orchestra in peerless glory.

An exhibition was hardly Charles Munch's intent in playing this masterpiece, however. His special affinity for the music found the poet in him as expressive as the virtuoso. Imbued with understanding reaching into the depths of being, he let the music utter its profoundest emotions.

If the virtuoso occasionally asserted himself too strongly, some miracle of balance kept the proportioning just. The performance of the symphony was as magnificent as the work itself.

The program comprised three symphonies: Mozart's "Paris," K. 297, Piston's 5th, and the Tchaikovsky. Using a full orchestra, Munch nevertheless achieved the effect of a "Mozart" orchestra through the expert response of his musicians. The andantino was a cherishable moment in the concert.

Piston's symphony generates respect for his workmanship, for his orchestration, and for the first movement. What might have been an introspective work of value becomes less convincing in the second and third movements. Indeed, the rhythmic finale amounts to little more than a workout, thoroughly objective.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502

NOV 15 1956

Music

Boston Symphony Heard

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

With Charles Munch directing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its first visit this season to Carnegie Hall last night.

Fresh from European triumphs on both sides of the Great Divide, the orchestra sounded even brighter and more confident than when last heard here. Its travels seemed to have both broadened and deepened it.

The Mozart Bicentennary not having lapsed yet, what better tribute to the Salzburg genius than to open the Bostonians' New York season with the D Major Symphony, better known as the "Paris Symphony."

Tailor-Made for Munch.

This is music tailor-made for Mr. Munch's inspired strings, woodwinds and brasses. The music rippled along like a summer breeze, every tiny detail snugly in place, and the whole bathed in the sunny mood of the Salzburg traveler.

Mozart composed the symphony in the French capital in the latter part of May 1778—which makes it a sort of Paris in the spring a la Mozart, a double attraction hard to resist and even harder to beat!

Their fingers still tingling from Mozart, the musicians next tackled a totally different score, Walter Piston's latest symphony—No. 5—first heard last season at the Juilliard School.

Turgid and Static.

Where the Mozart music sang and frolicked and bubbled, Mr. Piston's new symphony seemed for the most part turgid and static. Even the spirited finale sounded like forced rather than natural motion.

Great care and craftsmanship have gone into this music by the gifted New England composer. There are passages of striking beauty, but the rest is strangely inert, rarely setting the mind in motion.

This is strange music coming from Mr. Piston, whose main impulse has been a lively sense of direction. He has written better symphonies and will doubtless go on writing them, with a return to spontaneity.

Powerfully Revealed.

The greatness of both the orchestra and the conductor stood powerfully revealed in the third of last night's symphonies — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." For one and all in the crowd this was a rare treat.

The music surged like a monument of woe, as it sounded the desolation of a soul. Few composers know about despair like Tschaikowsky, and no conductor seemed to know Tschaikowsky better than Charles Munch last night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

NOV 15 1956

Music: Piston Symphony

The Fifth Performed by Boston Orchestra

BY HOWARD TAUBMAN

THE eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries were represented by the three symphonies that comprised last night's Boston Symphony program at Carnegie Hall. These works by Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Walter Piston were not brought together to prove a thesis but to provide a diversified evening.

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony, commissioned by the Juilliard School and performed for the first time at its festival of American music last February, wears well. Indeed, it takes on new values when performed by a professional orchestra of the first rank. This is no reflection on the Juilliard School ensemble, which presented the première last winter, but the Bostonians were able to give the symphony a brilliance of texture and a dimension it had not seemed to possess.

Mr. Piston is not an assertive personality; he prefers restraint and understatement. But underneath the refinement of his symphonic style there is a sturdy mind. One found it speaking with eloquence in the first movement. The introduction and close of this movement have a delicate poetry, and the second theme is attractively lyrical. The slow movement grows pallid on reacquaintance, but the third has a bouncing briskness that probably harks back to the composer's spare-time playing of ragtime in his youth.

Charles Munch and the orchestra, paying their first visit of the season here, were in good form. They gave Mr. Piston's symphony a vivid performance, bringing out contrasts of the first movement with particular persuasiveness and romping through the lively third movement as though they relished it.

Charles Munch as he appeared at recent rehearsal

The Progr

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Charles Munch conducting at Carnegie Hall.
Symphony in D (K. 297) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 5 ..... Piston
Symphony No. 6 ..... Tchaikovsky

Mozart's "Paris" Sy began the evening in rating fashion. This which was written for the cert Spirituel, a Paris trained to play so that effects would dazzle agreeably to the ear full string contingent modern orchestra. Mr. whipped his ensemble the end movements membered to sing the ing andantino affection Tchaikovsky's "Path ended the program tense, passionate level a work that has long prime vehicle for the ans, and Mr. Munch's conducting style gives that so it will remain.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

DEC 1 1956

PHIL

■ C Symp annua the F audien formance
Symphony work does sound ment, tion, a keeping movem it. The was a fu fury neve Munch formance phony an reading of

MUSICAL LEADER December

The Boston Symphony made its first appearance in Carnegie Hall this season on Nov. 14 and 17, with Charles Munch conducting. We attended the Saturday afternoon performance on the 17th, when the program included Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica." How wonderful to hear this magnificent orchestra again; it was like listening to an old friend spin a beautiful yarn.

TIGHT BINDING

156

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 14 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TOP FORM FOR WOOLSEY CONCERT

Brilliance or bust! This isn't the slogan of the Boston Symphony but it might well be, as we were reminded once again Tuesday evening when the celebrated orchestra made its first appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston musicians, was on the podium for a program which highlighted a new symphony by Harvard's Walter Piston.

Fresh from its recent European tour, the orchestra was in top form. It is to be hoped that the Boston ensemble played abroad the way it did here for in that case its playing may be said to be truly representative of American life — loud, fast, furious and rewarding!

Mr. Munch may be getting older but he still has young ideas and doesn't seem to be slowing up perceptively in tempos, that is! Take the Tchaikovsky Sixth, the major offering in yesterday's third concert of the Woolsey series. A timing of this performance must surely have revealed that it was one of the fastest ever achieved; surely it was one of the most brilliant. Bright tempos reached their zenith in the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, where many string passages were almost in the category of glissandos. Massive climaxes were of the order throughout to reveal the work's grandeur while its pathos and solemnity registered most impressively in the opening and closing moments of hushed sonorities.

Other orchestras, notably the foreign ones which we have heard recently, may sometimes give more refined performances than the Boston Symphony and even excel the latter at times in a lushness of string sonorities. But the "excesses" of this great American orchestra, so characteristic in yesterday's Tchaikovsky performance, add an overall exciting quality unmatched by other symphonic groups. The penetrating brilliance and carrying power of the Boston strings lends itself admirably to interpretive conceptions aimed to project a work's greatest dramatic impact. The Tchaikovsky performance certainly found a full realization of this potential. It was a wow!

The opening Mozart "Paris" Symphony received the vigorous treatment with a resulting roughness in attack and accenting at times but on the whole this was a minor consideration in view of a beautifully precisioned performance in all respects.

The Harvard composer's Fifth Symphony, which represented the program's new music interest, must have had more than an academic interest for the Yale musicians in the audience. At least they were probably more receptive to the work which was commissioned by the Juilliard School of Music and first performed there on Feb. 24 of this year.

Comments overheard after the performance indicated a mixed reaction to the work on the part of the audience. The writer was on the affirmative side and his approval was in no wise influenced by a pupil's loyalty to his former teacher! I was especially taken with the "ordered polyphony" of the final movement which the Boston musicians played with a zest and power that permitted the brasses a blaring opportunity. The new symphony is one of the most colorful and imaginative of this scholarly composer's efforts to date though his excellent book on harmony would be of little help in unravelling its dissonant structure.

Did I detect a certain jazz influence, rhythmically speaking, professor?

G. E. A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 14 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Notable Woolsey Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its two annually scheduled concerts at Woolsey Hall last night and under Charles Munch's baton gave a magnificent performance of Tschaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony No. 6 before a capacity audience.

This last symphony of the great composer was dramatically presented by the symphony with all of the melancholy grandeur which identifies it as one of the most expressive of concert works. Its moods were brilliantly presented by the orchestra as Munch led his musicians through the maze of chromatic themes, from the burning intensity of the first movements to the dirge-like last one. Through the winds, strings and trumpets a most fascinating picture of pathos and tragedy was painted in music. It was the final work for the evening and the audience stood, cheering and applauding both the men and the music.

Mozart's Symphony in D Major, the "Paris" symphony, opened the program; filled with grace and a singularly lovely theme. The orchestra's deft and smooth performance made it a delight to the ear.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, which was performed by the orchestra on its recent European concert tour, was found to be interesting to New Haveners, most of whom were hearing it for the first time. Composed in 1954, as a commission for the Julliard School, the first performance was given this year in February by the Julliard Orchestra. It is full of a variety of interests and is generally light in mood.

The Boston Symphony comes back to New Haven in February.

—F. R. J.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

NOV 16 1956

BOWS AT ACADEMY . . . Charles Munch will direct the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in its debut this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502

NOV 15 1956

Music

Boston Symphony Heard

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

With Charles Munch directing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its first visit this season to Carnegie Hall last night.

Fresh from European triumphs on both sides of the Great Divide, the orchestra sounded even brighter and more confident than when last heard here. Its travels seemed to have both broadened and deepened it.

The Mozart Bicentennary not having lapsed yet, what better tribute to the Salzburg genius than to open the Bostonians' New York season with the D Major Symphony, better known as the "Paris Symphony."

Tailor-Made for Munch.

This is music tailor-made for Mr. Munch's inspired strings, woodwinds and brasses. The music rippled along like a summer breeze, every tiny detail snugly in place, and the whole bathed in the sunny mood of the Salzburg traveler.

Mozart composed the symphony in the French capital in the latter part of May 1778—which makes it a sort of Paris in the spring a la Mozart, a double attraction hard to resist and even harder to beat.

Their fingers still tingling from Mozart, the musicians next tackled a totally different score, Walter Piston's latest symphony—No. 5—first heard last season at the Juilliard School.

Turgid and Static.

Where the Mozart music sang and frolicked and bubbled, Mr. Piston's new symphony seemed for the most part turgid and static. Even the spirited finale sounded like forced rather than natural motion.

Great care and craftsmanship have gone into this music by the gifted New England composer. There are passages of striking beauty, but the rest is strangely inert, rarely setting the mind in motion.

This is strange music coming from Mr. Piston, whose main impulse has been a lively sense of direction. He has written better symphonies and will doubtless go on writing them, with a return to spontaneity.

Powerfully Revealed.

The greatness of both the orchestra and the conductor stood powerfully revealed in the third of last night's symphonies — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." For one and all in the crowd this was a great treat.

The music surged like a monument of woe, as if mourning the desolation of a world. Few composers knew abandoned despair like Tschaikowsky, and no conductor seemed to know Tschaikowsky better than Charles Munch last night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

NOV 15 1956

Music: Piston Symphony

The Fifth Performed by Boston Orchestra

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

THE eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries were represented by the three symphonies that comprised last night's Boston Symphony program at Carnegie Hall. These works by Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Walter Piston were not brought together to prove a thesis but to provide a diversified evening.

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony, commissioned by the Juilliard School and performed for the first time at its festival of American music last February, wears well. Indeed, it takes on new values when performed by a professional orchestra of the first rank. This is no reflection on the Juilliard School ensemble, which presented the première last winter, but the Bostonians were able to give the symphony a brilliance of texture and a dimension it had not seemed to possess.

Mr. Piston is not an assertive personality; he prefers restraint and understatement. But underneath the refinement of his symphonic style there is a sturdy mind. One found it speaking with eloquence in the first movement. The introduction and close of this movement have a delicate poetry, and the second theme is attractively lyrical. The slow movement grows pallid on reacquaintance, but the third has a bouncing briskness that probably harks back to the composer's spare-time playing of ragtime in his youth.

Charles Munch and the orchestra, paying their first visit of the season here, were in good form. They gave Mr. Piston's symphony a vivid performance, bringing out contrasts of the first movement with particular persuasiveness and romping through the lively third movement as though they relished it.

Charles Munch [illegible] peared at recent [illegible]

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible]
Charles Munch conducting at Carnegie Hall.
Symphony in D (K. 297) [illegible]
Symphony No. 5 [illegible]
Symphony No. 6 [illegible]

Mozart's "Paris" Symphony began the evening in [illegible] rating fashion. This [illegible] which was written for the [illegible] cert Spirituel, a Paris [illegible] trained to play so that its [illegible] fects would dazzle, [illegible] agreeably to the use of a full string contingent of [illegible] modern orchestra. Mr. Munch whipped his ensemble through the end movements and [illegible] membered to sing the [illegible] ing andantino affectingly.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" ended the program on a tense, passionate level. This a work that has been [illegible] prime vehicle for the Bostonians, and Mr. Munch's [illegible] conducting style [illegible] that so it will remain.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

DEC 1 1956

PHI[illegible]

■ [illegible] Symp[illegible] annu[illegible] the [illegible] audie[illegible] forma[illegible] Sympho[illegible] sound[illegible] ment, [illegible] tion, [illegible] keepin[illegible] moven[illegible] it. The [illegible] was a [illegible] fury ne[illegible]

Munch [illegible] formance [illegible] phony [illegible] reading [illegible]

Symphony showed off the orchestra in peerless glory.

An exhibition was hardly Charles Munch's intent in playing this masterpiece, however. His special affinity for the music found the poet in him as expressive as the virtuoso. Imbued with understanding reaching into the depths of being, he let the music utter its profoundest emotions.

If the virtuoso occasionally asserted himself too strongly, some miracle of balance kept the proportioning just. The performance of the symphony was as magnificent as the work itself.

The program comprised three symphonies: Mozart's "Paris," K. 297, Piston's 5th, and the Tchaikowsky. Using a full orchestra, Munch nevertheless achieved the effect of a "Mozart" orchestra through the expert response of his musicians. The andantino was a cherishable moment in the concert.

Piston's symphony generates respect for his workmanship, for his orchestration, and for the first movement. What might have been an introspective work of value becomes less convincing in the second and third movements. Indeed, the rhythmic finale amounts to little more than a workout, thoroughly objective.

MUSICAL LEADER December

The Boston Symphony made its first appearance in Carnegie Hall this season on Nov. 14 and 17, with Charles Munch conducting. We attended the Saturday afternoon performance on the 17th, when the program included Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica." How wonderful to hear this magnificent orchestra again; it was like listening to an old friend spin a beautiful yarn.

TIGHT BINDING

156

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 14 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TOP FORM FOR WOOLSEY CONCERT

Brilliance or bust! This isn't the slogan of the Boston Symphony but it might well be, as we were reminded once again Tuesday evening when the celebrated orchestra made its first appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston musicians, was on the podium for a program which highlighted a new symphony by Harvard's Walter Piston.

Fresh from its recent European tour, the orchestra was in top form. It is to be hoped that the Boston ensemble played abroad the way it did here for in that case its playing may be said to be truly representative of American life — loud, fast, furious and rewarding!

Mr. Munch may be getting older but he still has young ideas and doesn't seem to be slowing up perceptively—in tempos, that is! Take the Tchaikovsky Sixth, the major offering in yesterday's third concert of the Woolsey series. A timing of this performance must surely have revealed that it was one of the fastest ever achieved; surely it was one of the most brilliant. Bright tempos reached their zenith in the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, where many string passages were almost in the category of glissandos. Massive climaxes were of the order throughout to reveal the work's grandeur while its pathos and solemnity registered most impressively in the opening and closing moments of hushed sonorities.

Other orchestras, notably the foreign ones which we have heard recently, may sometimes give more refined performances than the Boston Symphony and even excel the latter at times in a lushness of string sonorities. But the "excesses" of this great American orchestra, so characteristic in yesterday's Tchaikovsky performance, add an overall exciting quality unmatched by other symphonic groups. The penetrating brilliance and carrying power of the Boston strings lends itself admirably to interpretive conceptions aimed to project a work's greatest dramatic impact. The Tchaikovsky performance certainly found a full realization of this potential. It was a wow!

The opening Mozart "Paris" Symphony received the vigorous treatment with a resulting roughness in attack and accenting at times but on the whole this was a minor consideration in view of a beautifully precisioned performance in all respects.

The Harvard composer's Fifth Symphony, which represented the program's new music interest, must have had more than an academic interest for the Yale musicians in the audience. At least they were probably more receptive to the work which was commissioned by the Juilliard School of Music and first performed there on Feb. 24 of this year.

Comments overheard after the performance indicated a mixed reaction to the work on the part of the audience. The writer was on the affirmative side and his approval was in no wise influenced by a pupil's loyalty to his former teacher! I was especially taken with the "ordered cacophony" of the final movement which the Boston musicians played with a zest and power that permitted the brasses a blaring opportunity. The new symphony is one of the most colorful and imaginative of this scholarly composer's efforts to date though his excellent book on harmony would be of little help in unravelling its dissonant structure.

Did I detect a certain jazz influence, rhythmically speaking, professor?

G. E. A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 14 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Notable Woolsey Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its two annually scheduled concerts at Woolsey Hall last night and under Charles Munch's baton gave a magnificent performance of Tschaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony No. 6 before a capacity audience.

This last symphony of the great composer was dramatically presented by the symphony with all of the melancholy grandeur which identifies it as one of the most expressive of concert works. Its moods were brilliantly presented by the orchestra as Munch led his musicians through the maze of chromatic themes, from the burning intensity of the first movements to the dirge-like last one. Through the winds, strings and trumpets a most fascinating picture of pathos and tragedy was painted in music. It was the final work for the evening and the audience stood, cheering and applauding both the men and the music.

Mozart's Symphony in D Major, the "Paris" symphony, opened the program; filled with grace and a singularly lovely theme. The orchestra's deft and smooth performance made it a delight to the ear.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, which was performed by the orchestra on its recent European concert tour, was found to be interesting to New Haveners, most of whom were hearing it for the first time. Composed in 1954, as a commission for the Julliard School, the first performance was given this year in February by the Julliard Orchestra. It is full of a variety of interests and is generally light in mood.

The Boston Symphony comes back to New Haven in February.

—F. R. J.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

NOV 16 1956

BOWS AT ACADEMY . . . Charles Munch will direct the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in its debut this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502

NOV 15 1956

Music

Boston Symphony Heard

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Charles Munch directing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its first visit this season to Carnegie Hall last night.

Fresh from European triumphs on both sides of the Great Divide, the orchestra sounded even brighter and more confident than when last heard here. Its travels seemed to have both broadened and deepened it.

The Mozart Bicentennary not having lapsed yet, what better tribute to the Salzburg genius than to open the Bostonians' New York season with the D Major Symphony, better known as the "Paris Symphony."

Tailor-Made for Munch.

This is music tailor-made for Mr. Munch's inspired strings, woodwinds and brasses. The music rippled along like a summer breeze, every tiny detail snugly in place, and the whole bathed in the sunny mood of the Salzburg traveler.

Mozart composed the symphony in the French capital in the latter part of May 1778—which makes it a sort of Paris in the spring a la Mozart, a double attraction hard to resist and even harder to beat.

Their fingers still tingling from Mozart, the musicians next tackled a totally different score, Walter Piston's latest symphony—No. 5—first heard last season at the Juilliard School.

Turgid and Static.

Where the Mozart music sang and frolicked and bubbled, Mr. Piston's new symphony seemed for the most part turgid and static. Even the spirited finale sounded like forced rather than natural motion.

Great care and craftsmanship have gone into this music by the gifted New England composer. There are passages of striking beauty, but the rest is strangely inert, rarely setting the mind in motion.

This is strange music coming from Mr. Piston, whose main impulse has been a lively sense of direction. He has written better symphonies and will doubtless go on writing them, with a return to spontaneity.

Powerfully Revealed.

The greatness of both the orchestra and the conductor stood powerfully revealed in the third of last night's symphonies — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." For one and all in the crowd this was a rare treat.

The music surged like a monument of woe, as if marking the desolation of a world. Few composers knew absolute despair like Tschaikowsky, and no conductor seemed to know Tschaikowsky better than Charles Munch last night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

NOV 15 1956

Music: Piston Symphony

The Fifth Performed by Boston Orchestra

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

THE eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries were represented by the three symphonies that comprised last night's Boston Symphony program at Carnegie Hall. These works by Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Walter Piston were not brought together to prove a thesis but to provide a diversified evening.

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony, commissioned by the Juilliard School and performed for the first time at its festival of American music last February, wears well. Indeed, it takes on new values when performed by a professional orchestra of the first rank. This is no reflection on the Juilliard School ensemble, which presented the première last winter, but the Bostonians were able to give the symphony a brilliance of texture and a dimension it had not seemed to possess.

•

Mr. Piston is not an assertive personality; he prefers restraint and understatement. But underneath the refinement of his symphonic style there is a sturdy mind. One found it speaking with eloquence in the first movement. The introduction and close of this movement have a delicate poetry, and the second theme is attractively lyrical. The slow movement grows pallid on reacquaintance, but the third has a bouncing briskness that probably harks back to the composer's spare-time playing of ragtime in his youth.

Charles Munch and the orchestra, paying their first visit of the season here, were in good form. They gave Mr. Piston's symphony a vivid performance, bringing out contrasts of the first movement with particular persuasiveness and romping through the lively third movement as though they relished it.

Charles Munch at the ... peared at recent rehe...

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ... Charles Munch conducting at Carnegie Hall.
Symphony in D (K. 297) ...
Symphony No. 5 ...
Symphony No. 6 ...

Mozart's "Paris" Symphony began the evening in ... rating fashion. This ... which was written for the Concert Spirituel, a Paris ... trained to play so that the ... fects would dazzle, ... agreeably to the use of ... full string contingent of ... modern orchestra. Mr. Munch ... whipped his ensemble through ... the end movements and ... membered to sing the charming andantino affectingly.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" ... ended the program on ... tense, passionate level. It ... a work that has long been ... prime vehicle for the Bostonians, and Mr. Munch's ... conducting style gives ... that so it will remain.

Symphony showed off the orchestra in peerless glory.

An exhibition was hardly Charles Munch's intent in playing this masterpiece, however. His special affinity for the music found the poet in him as expressive as the virtuoso. Imbued with understanding reaching into the depths of being, he let the music utter its profoundest emotions.

If the virtuoso occasionally asserted himself too strongly, some miracle of balance kept the proportioning just. The performance of the symphony was as magnificent as the work itself.

The program comprised three symphonies: Mozart's "Paris," K. 297, Piston's 5th, and the Tchaikowsky. Using a full orchestra, Munch nevertheless achieved the effect of a "Mozart" orchestra through the expert response of his musicians. The andantino was a cherishable moment in the concert.

Piston's symphony generates respect for his workmanship, for his orchestration, and for the first movement. What might have been an introspective work of value becomes less convincing in the second and third movements. Indeed, the rhythmic finale amounts to little more than a workout, thoroughly objective.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

DEC 1 1956

PHI...

■ (... Symp... annu... the ... audi... form... Symp... sound... ment, ... tion, ... keepin... moven... it. Th... was a ... fury n... Munc... forman... phony ... reading...

MUSICAL LEADER December

The Boston Symphony made its first appearance in Carnegie Hall this season on Nov. 14 and 17, with Charles Munch conducting. We attended the Saturday afternoon performance on the 17th, when the program included Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica." How wonderful to hear this magnificent orchestra again; it was like listening to an old friend spin a beautiful yarn.

TIGHT BINDING

156

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 95,161

NOV 14 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN TOP FORM FOR WOOLSEY CONCERT

Brilliance or bust! This isn't the slogan of the Boston Symphony but it might well be, as we were reminded once again Tuesday evening when the celebrated orchestra made its first appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston musicians, was on the podium for a program which highlighted a new symphony by Harvard's Walter Piston.

Fresh from its recent European tour, the orchestra was in top form. It is to be hoped that the Boston ensemble played abroad the way it did here for in that case its playing may be said to be truly representative of American life — loud, fast, furious and rewarding!

Mr. Munch may be getting older but he still has young ideas and doesn't seem to be slowing up perceptively—in tempos, that is! Take the Tchaikovsky Sixth, the major offering in yesterday's third concert of the Woolsey series. A timing of this performance must surely have revealed that it was one of the fastest ever achieved; surely it was one of the most brilliant. Bright tempos reached their zenith in the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, where many string passages were almost in the category of glissandos. Massive climaxes were of the order throughout to reveal the work's grandeur while its pathos and solemnity registered most impressively in the opening and closing moments of hushed sonorities.

Other orchestras, notably the foreign ones which we have heard recently, may sometimes give more refined performances than the Boston Symphony and even excel the latter at times in a lushness of string sonorities. But the "excesses" of this great American orchestra, so characteristic in yesterday's Tchaikovsky performance, add an overall exciting quality unmatched by other symphonic groups. The penetrating brilliance and carrying power of the Boston strings lends itself admirably to interpretive conceptions aimed to project a work's greatest dramatic impact. The Tchaikovsky performance certainly found a full realization of this potential. It was a wow!

The opening Mozart "Paris" Symphony received the vigorous treatment with a resulting roughness in attack and accenting at times but on the whole this was a minor consideration in view of a beautifully precisioned performance in all respects.

The Harvard composer's Fifth Symphony, which represented the program's new music interest, must have had more than an academic interest for the Yale musicians in the audience. At least they were probably more receptive to the work which was commissioned by the Juilliard School of Music and first performed there on Feb. 24 of this year.

Comments overheard after the performance indicated a mixed reaction to the work on the part of the audience. The writer was on the affirmative side and his approval was in no wise influenced by a pupil's loyalty to his former teacher! I was especially taken with the "ordered cacophony" of the final movement which the Boston musicians played with a zest and power that permitted the brasses a blaring opportunity. The new symphony is one of the most colorful and imaginative of this scholarly composer's efforts to date though his excellent book on harmony would be of little help in unravelling its dissonant structure.

Did I detect a certain jazz influence, rhythmically speaking, professor?

G. E. A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Independent
Circ. 20,613

NOV 14 1956

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Notable Woolsey Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its two annually scheduled concerts at Woolsey Hall last night and under Charles Munch's baton gave a magnificent performance of Tschaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony No. 6 before a capacity audience.

This last symphony of the great composer was dramatically presented by the symphony with all of the melancholy grandeur which identifies it as one of the most expressive of concert works. Its moods were brilliantly presented by the orchestra as Munch led his musicians through the maze of chromatic themes, from the burning intensity of the first movements to the dirge-like last one. Through the winds, strings and trumpets a most fascinating picture of pathos and tragedy was painted in music. It was the final work for the evening and the audience stood, cheering and applauding both the men and the music.

Mozart's Symphony in D Major, the "Paris" symphony, opened the program; filled with grace and a singularly lovely theme. The orchestra's deft and smooth performance made it a delight to the ear.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, which was performed by the orchestra on its recent European concert tour, was found to be interesting to New Haveners, most of whom were hearing it for the

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 S. 172,502

NOV 15 1956

Music

Boston Symphony Heard

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Charles Munch directing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its first visit this season to Carnegie Hall last night.

Fresh from European triumphs on both sides of the Great Divide, the orchestra sounded even brighter and more confident than when last heard here. Its travels seemed to have both broadened and deepened it.

The Mozart Bicentennary not having lapsed yet, what better tribute to the Salzburg genius than to open the Bostonians' New York season with the D Major Symphony, better known as the "Paris Symphony."

Tailor-Made for Munch.

This is music tailor-made for Mr. Munch's inspired strings, woodwinds and brasses. The music rippled along like a summer breeze, every tiny detail snugly in place, and the whole bathed in the sunny mood of the Salzburg traveler.

Mozart composed the symphony in the French capital in the latter part of May 1778—which makes it a sort of Paris in the spring a la Mozart, a double attraction hard to resist and even harder to beat.

Their fingers still tingling from Mozart, the musicians next tackled a totally different score, Walter Piston's latest symphony—No. 5—first heard last season at the Juilliard School.

Turgid and Static.

Where the Mozart music sang and frolicked and bubbled, Mr. Piston's new symphony seemed for the most part [illegible] craftsman- [illegible] to this music by the gifted New England composer. There are passages of striking beauty, but the rest is strangely inert, rarely setting the mind in motion.

This is strange music coming from Mr. Piston, whose main impulse has been a lively sense of direction. He has written better symphonies and will doubtless go on writing them, with a return to spontaneity.

Powerfully Revealed.

The greatness of both the orchestra and the conductor stood powerfully revealed in the third of last night's symphonies — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." For one and all in the crowd this was a rare treat.

The music surged like a monument of woe, as if marking the desolation of a world. Few composers knew absolute despair like Tschaikowsky, and no conductor seemed to know Tschaikowsky better than Charles Munch last night.

THEATRE DINNER

THANKSGIVING DINNER $4.25
And of course STEAKS, ROAST BEEF AND LOBSTER, as usual
FREE PARKING ANY TWO HOURS SUN. THRU FRI.
OPEN TILL 1:00 A.M.
SATS. TIL 2:00 A.M.
MEMBER OF THE DINERS' CLUB
115 W. 52 St., JU 6-3380

New York Journal-American ★ Thurs., Nov. 15, 1956 25

AT CARNEGIE HALL:

Bostonians Exhibit Their Peerless Sound

By MILES KASTENDIECK

To remind us how marvelously a symphony orchestra can play, the Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night. If it played as it played throughout Europe recently, there is no wonder why Europeans grew ecstatic. Tchaikowsky's 6th Symphony showed off the orchestra in peerless glory.

An exhibition was hardly Charles Munch's intent in playing this masterpiece, however. His special affinity for the music found the poet in him as expressive as the virtuoso. Imbued with understanding reaching into the depths of being, he let the music utter its profoundest emotions.

If the virtuoso occasionally asserted himself too strongly, some miracle of balance kept the proportioning just. The performance of the symphony was as magnificent as the work itself.

The program comprised three symphonies: Mozart's "Paris," K. 297, Piston's 5th, and the Tchaikowsky. Using a full orchestra, Munch nevertheless achieved the effect of a "Mozart" orchestra through the expert response of his musicians. The andantino was a cherishable moment in the concert.

Piston's symphony generates respect for his workmanship, for his orchestration, and for the first movement. What might have been an introspective work of value becomes less convincing in the second and third movements. Indeed, the rhythmic finale amounts to little more than a workout, thoroughly objective.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860

NOV 15 1956

Music: Piston Symphony

The Fifth Performed by Boston Orchestra

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries were represented by the three symphonies that comprised last night's Boston Symphony program at Carnegie Hall. These works by Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Walter Piston were not brought together to prove a thesis but to provide a diversified evening.

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony, commissioned by the Juilliard School and performed for the first time at its festival of American music last February, wears well. Indeed, it takes on new values when performed by a professional orchestra of the first rank. This is no reflection on the Juilliard School ensemble, which presented the première last winter, but the Bostonians were able to give the symphony a brilliance of texture and a dimension it had not seemed to possess.

Mr. Piston is not an assertive personality; he prefers restraint and understatement. But underneath the refinement of his symphonic style there is a sturdy mind. One found it speaking with eloquence in the first movement. The introduction and close of this movement have a delicate poetry, and the second theme is attractively lyrical. The slow movement grows pallid on reacquaintance, but the third has a bouncing briskness that probably harks back to the composer's spare-time playing of ragtime in his youth.

Charles Munch and the orchestra, paying their first visit of the season here, were in good form. They gave Mr. Piston's symphony a vivid performance, bringing out contrasts of the first movement with particular persuasiveness and romping through the lively third movement as though they relished it.

Charles Munch [illegible] peared at recent rehe[illegible]

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Charles Munch conducting [illegible] Hall.
Symphony in D (K. 297) [illegible]
Symphony No. 5 [illegible]
Symphony No. 6 [illegible]

Mozart's "Paris" Sym[illegible] began the evening in [illegible] rating fashion. This [illegible] which was written for the [illegible] cert Spirituel, a Paris [illegible] trained to play so that [illegible] fects would dazzle, [illegible] agreeably to the use of [illegible] full string contingent of [illegible] modern orchestra. Mr. Munch [illegible] whipped his ensemble [illegible] the end movements and [illegible] membered to sing the [illegible] ing andantino affectingly.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" [illegible] ended the program on [illegible] tense, passionate level. It [illegible] a work that has long [illegible] prime vehicle for the Bostonians, and Mr. Munch's [illegible] conducting style guarantees that so it will remain.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

DEC 1 1956

PHI

■ [illegible] Sym[illegible] ann[illegible] the [illegible] aud[illegible] for[illegible] Sym[illegible] sou[illegible] mo[illegible] tion [illegible] keep[illegible] move[illegible] it. Ti[illegible] was [illegible] fury [illegible] Mu[illegible] form[illegible] phony [illegible] readin[illegible]

MUSICAL LEADER December

The Boston Symphony made its first appearance in Carnegie Hall this season on Nov. 14 and 17, with Charles Munch conducting. We attended the Saturday afternoon performance on the 17th, when the program included Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica." How wonderful to hear this magnificent orchestra again; it was like listening to an old friend spin a beautiful yarn.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 · S. 528,253
NOV 15 1956

Boston Symphon
Its Carnegie Ha

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Russia and various other lands since its last appearance here, gave the first concert of its seventy-first New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, where the admirable musicians under Charles

Phila. Inquirer Nov. 16

Symphony Gives Annual Concert

By SAMUEL L. SINGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Charles Munch, gave their annual concert last night in the Academy of Music, and for the 24th time this city's music lovers are indebted to The Philadelphia Forum (a division of The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.) for a visit from "America's other orchestra."

For the Boston Symphony is indeed one of the few that have—and deserve—comparison with our own Philadelphia Orchestra. Its virtuoso qualities were amply demonstrated in a program that consisted of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, No. 31 in D; Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's second set of "Images," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

MUSCULAR QUALITY

With the possible exception of the Debussy, this was not a performance that one could term fastidious or delicately nuanced, although finesse of nuance was present in proper measure. Rather the two symphonies, so disparate in nature, had in common the qualities of muscularity and excitement.

Perhaps not since the days of Stokowski and Koussevitzky (before his mellow later years), had a "Pathetique" of such fury been heard here. The work's intrinsic strong contrasts were intensified, more in tempo and dynamics rather than over-all mood, particularly in the first movement where the conductor lashed the orchestra into musical frenzy. Yet the furor was always controlled; it never exceeded the bounds of good taste, as it well could have in the thrilling third movement which the audience involuntarily applauded.

FULL STRING COMPLEMENT

The second movement had an air of graciousness, with the melodic theme winningly enunciated, while the pathos of the finale was held in merciful restraint.

For the Mozart Symphony, the composer's first for what might be termed full orchestra, Munch employed the entire complement of strings. This added volume to a generous conception of the work in which Munch showed that an aristocratic bearing and virility in Mozart can team well. The strings, as elsewhere, had brightness and sheen rather than warmth.

Munch likewise communicated the Spanish atmosphere of the Debussy work. Debussy wrote music having Spain without having been there, and sometimes his musical impression bears a Moorish tinge. In any event, the Bostonians portrayed Spain's "fragrance of the night" and "festival day" as if they were native.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,909 · S. 172,502
NOV 16 1956

Student Rate For Symphony

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has set a special admission price of $1 for high school students who wish to attend [illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible] will be applicable to below seats for any one of the [illegible] concerts scheduled this season. The opening concert, tonight, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major, the "Eroica," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000
NOV 15 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

Editor's Note: This week's column is by Allan Sly, noted composer and pianist, whose criticism often appears here.

THE BSO'S FIFTH PROGRAM

The BSO's fifth program last Saturday gave us a broad panorama of styles. Elgar's resplendent Introduction and Allegro for strings, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and Brahms' first symphony. This latter left a towering impression of Mr. Munch's ability to identify himself with the total German tradition. It was all there, from epic to lied, from Luther to Bismarck, from Bach, through Beethoven and Schumann, to the very threshold of our own century. It is almost picayune to mention merely musical matters when these were but the vehicle for a broader, deeper communication, but the tympani part had something to do with it. Brahms rarely sounds so universal as he did on this occasion.

Burrowing back through one's recollections leads to another acknowledgment of indebtedness—to Stravinsky. This indomitable original has paced our lives since about 1910 with his constant flow of creative effort, still happily unabated. The Jeu de Cartes, which signals the translation of Stravinsky to these shores, is still a piece of universal theatre. It embraces a fascinating dramatic theme, it abounds in wit, it moves on its toes throughout, it transports the listener from his fauteuil to an order of things where everyone is endowed with insight and nobility. The Boston Symphony has long been "broken" to Stravinsky, but I feel that for Mr. Munch it is still an acquired form of musical speech, notwithstanding the superb piloting he gives his colleagues throughout.

To refer now to the Elgar. Here is still another form of musical speech, one of great subjectivity, and the strings of the orchestra under Mr. Munch's guidance traversed the score faithfully, even affectionately. It is no fault of theirs if a certain bouquet was lacking, a certain afterglow that some people mistake for dusk. For Sir Osbert Sitwell this quality is already the darkness of the tomb; for others it is the radiant glory of the West. Elgar, like Bax, uses the apparatus of the metropolis to evoke the ethos of remote regions—Wales, Ireland, Atlantis, Tintern Abbey. What has this to do with the Introduction and Allegro? The riddle is still unsolved. But the BSO strings sounded magnificent, just the same.

* * *

This column has recently paid tribute to certain musical renaissances in our midst and the time has now come to indicate still another. To the resources of this fair city have recently been added some supremely fine examples of the organ builder's art, not all of which, however, are in the path of the concert goer. One that is, of course, is Walter Holtkamp's in Kresge Auditorium at MIT. Arthur Poister's recital on it on Tuesday, Nov. 20, at 8:30 p.m. (no tickets required), will be an event of major importance. A renaissance of organ building and playing is definitely in progress, as concert goers are nowadays eager to attest.

upon first [illegible] nonetheless [illegible] further [illegible] this feeling [illegible] structural va[illegible]

Munch [illegible] Bostonians performed t[illegible]phony with painstaking [illegible] and with appreciation [illegible] contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

Phila. Evening Bulletin Nov. 16

Big Audience Thrilled By Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

Presented by the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony and its dynamic leader, Charles Munch, appeared at the Academy of Music, last night, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Boston Symphony, now in its 76th season, is one of America's most distinguished organizations, and has adhered to the highest possible standards since its founding many years ago. Last night, one was again conscious of such facts and the results that are obtained because of them.

Mr. Munch has absolute control over his orchestra, and with a minimum of gesture and outward stress commands a wide range of emotional color and an amazing set of legitimately achieved dynamic contrasts.

His Mozart, as exemplified by an exhilarating account of the "Paris" Symphony, was a delight. The lovely andantino never sounded [illegible] and [illegible] was a straightforward, honest energy to the opening Allegro [illegible] and the closing Allegro that must have reached the audience, judging from the applause.

Debussy's atmospheric "Iberia," from his "Images pour Orchestre," finds Mr. Munch and his men on ground that they know better than most. There was an authority, as the conductor evoked the teeming streets and the festivals, the evanescent fragrance of the night, the distant seguillana, and the Andalusian revels. The virtuoso qualities of the Bostonians, the clarity of the orchestra's texture was eloquently served by Debussy's music.

The program closed with a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Mr. Munch chose to state the implied tragedy as an inescapable and incomprehensible fact rather than to wallow in a slough of self-pity. The result was that the logic and pathos of the "Pathetique" was greatly heightened, and the symphony became invested with nobility. Particularly thrilling was Mr. Munch's superbly disciplined playing of the famous Allegro molto vivace. The audience was very enthusiastic.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,952 · S. 274,577
NOV 14 1956

Bostonians Open 76th N.Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th [illegible] at Carnegie [illegible] last night found the il[illegible] with the [illegible] which [illegible] sky, Char[illegible] an inspira[illegible] the strings [illegible] in dark, some[illegible]

[illegible] server spoke [illegible] intensity, [illegible] the first and last [illegible] which conductor and [illegible] expressed in the su[illegible] nuance of this melan[illegible] Tchaikovsky, him[illegible] wrote that he frequently [illegible] tears while composing the [illegible], and it is generally [illegible] that this is one work in [illegible] innermost nature ex[illegible] itself.

[illegible] contrasting buoyancy of [illegible] Mozart, Paris Symphony [illegible] K. 297, the [illegible] the novelty of [illegible] Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed [illegible] by the Boston Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature view as to its significance. [illegible] manly lyrical and reflective mood, it turns in the first [illegible] to sudden, dramatic [illegible], and in the final "al[illegible] syncopat[illegible] The [illegible] one [illegible] of a [illegible] circu[illegible] and wind [illegible] restricted [illegible] tenu[illegible] little [illegible] which [illegible] tension that is mysterious [illegible] most foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most [illegible] and contrast, [illegible] upon first [illegible] its effect, nonetheless [illegible] further [illegible] this feeling in the direction of structural va[illegible]

Munch [illegible] Bostonians performed the [illegible]phony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

[illegible] Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 14 [illegible] The best performance of the [illegible] from aesthetic and technical standpoints, was the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" Symphony. In conductor Munch's hands this familiar work glowed in the first movement, sparkled in the third, and the finale was a superb study of somber shadows.

The concert opened with a well-paced and effectively colored performance of Mozart's Symphony in D Major, although there were moments of faulty ensemble.

It was good to again hear Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5. This well-knit work seems built to withstand the ravages of time. There is a cold, dry lento at the beginning which builds to some magnificent brass passages, followed by a typically energetic American allegro. The second movement, adagio, is introspective and typically Piston. The third and final movement, again bears the unmistakable American stamp. As a whole, the music is warmer and more romantic than most of the composer's music. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a sturdy reading. G. W.

MUSICAL COURIER NYC DEC. 1. '56

[illegible] ony

[illegible] day

[illegible] art of the [illegible] the Boston [illegible] will take [illegible] direction of [illegible] Tuesday eve[illegible] Memorial [illegible]

[illegible] resent Mo[illegible] D major, [illegible] my whereby, visiting [illegible] ad, the composer from Salzburg made his first bid for the attention of the French public. Debussy's "Iberia" will be the second number and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will conclude the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 15 1956

Boston Symphon
Its Carnegie Ha

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Russia and various other lands since its last appearance here, gave the first concert of its seventy-first New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, where the admirable musicians under Charles Munch symphon point o Barber's major "Paris work sky's tique."

Mr. was fi ary in America yesterd perform orches to offe pected and co source in its cludes pressiv The first m the mo predec and i while The ac of wan quence tions and eff ventiona than th Here program its well perform sections tions a style a formance lectable straight The fi phony slightly close, can mu ing an disclos

Conductors have often liked to underline the m expressi emotions of T d Pathetic Symph and th highlights as possib and to darken t as to th utmost extent. But Mr. Munch avoided unnecessary exaggeration, and also excessive change of pace. But this external moderation made the music all the more revealing; expressive tension and contrast were convincing in an interpretation which showed the sincerity as well as the pathos of the music.

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000
NOV 15 1956

Nov. 15

Bostonians Open 76th N.Y. Season

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

Editor's Note: This week's column is by Allan Sly, noted composer and pianist, whose criticism often appears here.

THE BSO'S FIFTH PROGRAM

The BSO's fifth program last Saturday gave us a broad panorama of styles. Elgar's resplendent Introduction and Allegro for strings, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and Brahms' first symphony. This latter left a towering impression of Mr. Munch's ability to identify himself with the total German tradition. It was all there, from epic to lied, from Luther to Bismarck, from Bach, through Beethoven and Schumann, to the very threshold of our own century. It is almost picayune to mention merely musical matters when these were but the vehicle for a broader, deeper communication, but the tympani part had something to do with it. Brahms rarely sounds so universal as he did on this occasion.

Burrowing back through one's recollections leads to another acknowledgment of indebtedness—to Stravinsky. This indomitable original has paced our lives since about 1910 with his constant flow of creative effort, still happily unabated. The Jeu de Cartes, which signals the translation of Stravinsky to these shores, is still a piece of universal theatre. It embraces a fascinating dramatic theme, it abounds in wit, it moves on its toes throughout, it transports the listener from his fauteuil to an order of things where everyone is endowed with insight and nobility. The Boston Symphony has long been "broken" to Stravinsky, but I feel that for Mr. Munch it is still an acquired form of musical speech, notwithstanding the superb piloting he gives his colleagues throughout.

To refer now to the Elgar. Here is still another form of musical speech, one of great subjectivity, and the strings of the orchestra under Mr. Munch's guidance traversed the score faithfully, even affectionately. It is no fault of theirs if a certain bouquet was lacking, a certain afterglow that some people mistake for dusk. For Sir Osbert Sitwell this quality is already the darkness of the tomb; for others it is the radiant glory of the West. Elgar, like Bax, uses the apparatus of the metropolis to evoke the ethos of remote regions—Wales, Ireland, Atlantis, Tintern Abbey. What has this to do with the Introduction and Allegro? The riddle is still unsolved. But the BSO strings sounded magnificent, just the same.

* * *

This column has recently paid tribute to certain musical renaissances in our midst and the time has now come to indicate still another. To the resources of this fair city have recently been added some supremely fine examples of the organ builder's art, not all of which, however, are in the path of the concert goer. One that is, of course, is Walter Holtkamp's in Kresge Auditorium at MIT. Arthur Poister's recital on it on Tuesday, Nov. 20, at 8:30 p.m. (no tickets required), will be an event of major importance. A renaissance of organ building and playing is definitely in progress, as concert goers are nowadays eager to attest.

Conductor
upon first hearing, its effect nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,577
NOV 16 1956

Bostonians Open 76th N.Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the exciting Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings sing as seldom in dark, sombre tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time engages a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

Phila. Inquirer
Nov. 16.

Symphony Gives Annual Concert

By SAMUEL L. SINGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Charles Munch, gave their annual concert last night in the Academy of Music, and for the 24th time this city's music lovers are indebted to The Philadelphia Forum (a division of The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.) for a visit from "America's other orchestra."

For the Boston Symphony is indeed one of the few that brave—and deserve—comparison with our own Philadelphia Orchestra. Its virtuoso qualities were amply demonstrated in a program that consisted of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, No. 31 in D; Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's second set of "Images," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

MUSCULAR QUALITY

With the possible exception of the Debussy, this was not a performance that one could term fastidious or delicately enunciated, although finesse of nuance was present in proper measure. Rather the two symphonies, so disparate in nature, had in common the qualities of muscularity and excitement.

Perhaps not since the days of Stokowski and Koussevitzky (before his mellow later years) has a "Pathetique" of such fury been heard here. The work's intrinsic strong contrasts were intensified more in tempo and dynamics rather than over-all mood, particularly in the first movement where the conductor lashed the orchestra into musical frenzy. Yet the furor was always controlled; it never exceeded the bounds of good taste, as it well could have in the thrilling third movement which the audience involuntarily applauded.

FULL STRING COMPLEMENT

The second movement had its mood of graciousness, with the melodic filigree winningly enunciated, while the pathos of the finale was held in merciful restraint.

For the Mozart Symphony, the composer's first for what might be termed full orchestra, Munch employed the entire complement of strings. This added volume to a vigorous conception of the work in which Munch showed that an aristocratic bearing and virility in Mozart can team well. The strings, here as elsewhere, had brightness and sheen rather than warmth.

Munch likewise communicated the Spanish atmosphere of the Debussy work. Debussy wrote music evoking Spain without having been there, and sometimes his musical imagination has a Moorish tinge, too. In any event, the Bostonians portrayed Spain's "fragrance of the night" and "a festival day" as if they were natives.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502
NOV 16 1956

Student Rate For Symphony

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has set a special admission price of $1 for high school students who wish to attend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This will be applicable to half of seats for any one of the five concerts scheduled this season. The opening concert, tonight, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major, the "Eroica," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Phila. Evening Bulletin Nov. 16

Big Audience Thrilled By Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

Presented by the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony and its dynamic leader, Charles Munch, appeared at the Academy of Music, last night, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Boston Symphony, now in its 76th season, is one of America's most distinguished organizations, and has adhered to the highest possible standards since its founding many years ago. Last night, one was again conscious of such facts and the results that are obtained because of them.

Mr. Munch has absolute control over his orchestra, and with a minimum of gesture and outward stress commands a wide range of emotional color and an amazing set of legitimately achieved dynamic contrasts.

His Mozart, as exemplified by an exhilarating account of the "Paris" Symphony, was a delight. The lovely andantino never sounded better, and there was a straightforward, honest energy to the opening Allegro vivace and the closing Allegro, which must have reached the audience, judging from the applause.

Debussy's atmospheric "Iberia," from his "Images pour Orchestre," finds Mr. Munch and his men on ground that they know better than most. There was an authority, as the conductor evoked the teeming streets and the festivals, the evanescent fragrance of the night, the distant sevillana, and the Andalusian revels. The virtuoso qualities of the Bostonians, the clarity of the orchestra's texture was eloquently served by Debussy's music.

The program closed with a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Mr. Munch chose to state the implied tragedy as an inescapable and incomprehensible fact rather than to wallow in a slough of self-pity. The result was that the logic and pathos of the "Pathetique" was greatly heightened, and the symphony became invested with nobility. Particularly thrilling was Mr. Munch's superbly disciplined playing of the famous Allegro molto vivace. The audience was very enthusiastic.

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 14, E. W. The best performance of the evening, both from aesthetic and technical standpoints, was the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" Symphony. In conductor Munch's hands this familiar work glowed in the first movement, sparkled in the third, and the finale was a superb study of somber shadows.

The concert opened with a well-paced and effectively colored performance of Mozart's Symphony in D Major, although there were moments of faulty ensemble.

It was good to again hear Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5. This well-knit work seems built to withstand the ravages of time. There is a cold, dry lento at the beginning which builds to some magnificent brass passages, followed by a typically energetic American allegro. The second movement, adagio, is introspective and typically Piston. The third and final movement, again bears the unmistakable American stamp. As a whole, the music is warmer and more romantic than most of the composer's music. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a sturdy reading. MUSICAL COURIER - NYC G. W. DEC. 1. '56 ony

day ert of the the Boston will take direction of Tuesday eve-as Memorial present Mon D major,
ony whereby,
visiting Paris as a lad, the composer from Salzburg made his first bid for the attention of the French public. Debussy's "Iberia" will be the second number and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will conclude the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 15 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Its Carnegie Hall Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Russia and various other lands since its last appearance here, gave the first concert of its seventy-first New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, where the admirable musicians under Charles Munch's direction played three symphonies far separated in point of time. Thes ewere Mozart's Symphony No. 31, in D major (K. 297), known as the "Paris"; Walter Piston's fifth work in this form and Tchaikovsky's sixth and last, the "Pathetique."

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony was first played here in February in the Juilliard School's American music festival, but yesterday's was its first local performance by a professional orchestra. The work has more to offer than the composer's expected structural craftsmanship and command of orchestral resources. It does not mark time in its concise course, and includes variety of ideas and expressive atmosphere.

The second main theme of the first movement, contrasted with the more salient profile of its predecessor, is spaciously lyric and imaginatively appealing, while not retrospective in style. The adagio gave an impression of warmth as well as of consequence in its succession of variations. The finale was spirited and effective, while more conventional in contemporary terms than the other sections.

Here and in the rest of the program the orchestra showed its well-known high standard of performance in all its component sections, while the interpretations also realized differences of style and atmosphere. The performance of the brief and delectable Mozart work was straightforward and unaffected. The finale of the Piston symphony might have profited by slightly more élan towards the close, but as a whole the American music had a notably discerning and faithfully sympathetic disclosure.

Conductors have often liked to underline the music's expressed emotions of the Pathetic Symphony, picking the highlights as far as possible and to darken its shadows to the utmost extent. But Mr. Munch avoided unnecessary exaggeration, and also excessive change of pace. But this external moderation made the music all the more revealing; expressive tension and contrast were convincing in an interpretation which showed the sincerity as well as the pathos of the music.

Philo Inquirer Nov. 16.

Symphony Gives Annual Concert

By SAMUEL L. SINGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Charles Munch, gave their annual concert last night in the Academy of Music, and for the 24th time this city's music lovers are indebted to The Philadelphia Forum (a division of The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.) for a visit from "America's other orchestra."

For the Boston Symphony is indeed one of the few that brave—and deserve—comparison with our own Philadelphia Orchestra. Its virtuoso qualities were amply demonstrated in a program that consisted of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, No. 31 in D; Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's second set of "Images," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

MUSCULAR QUALITY

With the possible exception of the Debussy, this was not a performance that one could term fastidious or delicately enunciated, although finesse of nuance was present in proper measure. Rather the two symphonies, so disparate in nature, had in common the qualities of muscularity and excitement.

Perhaps not since the days of Stokowski and Koussevitzky (before his mellow later years) has a "Pathetique" of such fury been heard here. The work's intrinsic strong contrasts were intensified more in tempo and dynamics rather than over-all mood, particularly in the first movement where the conductor lashed the orchestra into musical frenzy. Yet the furor was always controlled; it never exceeded the bounds of good taste, as it well could have in the thrilling third movement which the audience involuntarily applauded.

FULL STRING COMPLEMENT

The second movement had its meed of graciousness, with the melodic filigree winningly enunciated, while the pathos of the finale was held in merciful restraint.

For the Mozart Symphony, the composer's first for what might be termed full orchestra, Munch employed the entire complement of strings. This added volume to a vigorous conception of the work in which Munch showed that an aristocratic bearing and virility in Mozart can team well. The strings, here as elsewhere, had brightness and sheen rather than warmth.

Munch likewise communicated the Spanish atmosphere of the Debussy work. Debussy wrote music evoking Spain without having been there, and sometimes his musical imagination had a Moorish tinge, too. In any event, the Bostonians portrayed Spain's "fragrance of the night" and "a festival day" as if they were natives.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502
NOV 16 1956

Student Rate For Symphony

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has set a special admission price of $1 for high school students who wish to attend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This will be applicable to balcony seats for any one of the five concerts scheduled this season. The opening concert, tonight, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major, the "Eroica," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Nov. 15

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,577
NOV 16 1956

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

Phila. Evening Bulletin Nov. 16

Big Audience Thrilled By Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

Presented by the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony and its dynamic leader, Charles Munch, appeared at the Academy of Music, last night, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Boston Symphony, now in its 76th season, is one of America's most distinguished organizations, and has adhered to the highest possible standards since its founding many years ago. Last night, one was again conscious of such facts and the results that are obtained because of them.

Mr. Munch has absolute control over his orchestra, and with a minimum of gesture and outward stress commands a wide range of emotional color and an amazing set of legitimately achieved dynamic contrasts.

His Mozart, as exemplified by an exhilarating account of the "Paris" Symphony, was a delight. The lovely andantino never sounded better, and there was a straightforward, honest energy to the opening Allegro assai and the closing Allegro that must have reached the audience, judging from the applause.

Debussy's atmospheric "Iberia," from his "Images pour Orchestre," finds Mr. Munch and his men on ground that they know better than most. There was an authority, as the conductor evoked the teeming streets and the festivals; the evanescent fragrance of the night, the distant sevillana, and the Andalusian revels. The virtuoso qualities of the Bostonians, the clarity of the orchestra's texture was eloquently served by Debussy's music.

The program closed with a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Mr. Munch chose to state the implied tragedy as an inescapable and incomprehensible fact rather than to wallow in a slough of self-pity. The result was that the logic and pathos of the "Pathetique" was greatly heightened, and the symphony became invested with nobility. Particularly thrilling was Mr. Munch's superbly disciplined playing of the famous Allegro molto vivace. The audience was very enthusiastic.

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 14, E — The best performance of the evening, both from aesthetic and technical standpoints, was the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" Symphony. In conductor Munch's hands this familiar work glowed in the first movement, sparkled in the third, and the finale was a superb study of somber shadows.

The concert opened with a well-paced and effectively colored performance of Mozart's Symphony in D Major, although there were moments of faulty ensemble.

It was good to again hear Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5. This well-knit work seems built to withstand the ravages of time. There is a cold, dry lento at the beginning which builds to some magnificent brass passages, followed by a typically energetic American allegro. The second movement, adagio, is introspective and typically Piston. The third and final movement, again bears the unmistakable American stamp. As a whole, the music is warmer and more romantic than most of the composer's music. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a sturdy reading. MUSICAL COURIER Nov. Dec. 1. '56 G. W.

ony
day ert of the the Boston
will take direction of Tuesday eve-
ns Memorial

present Mon D major,
ony whereby,
d
I.
visiting Paris as a lad, the composer from Salzburg made his first bid for the attention of the French public. Debussy's "Iberia" will be the second number and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will conclude the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 S. 528,253

NOV 15 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Its Carnegie Hall Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Russia and various other lands since its last appearance here, gave the first concert of its seventy-first New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, where the admirable musicians under Charles Munch's direction played three symphonies far separated in point of time. Thes ewere Mozart's Symphony No. 31, in D major (K. 297), known as the "Paris"; Walter Piston's fifth work in this form and Tchaikovsky's sixth and last, the "Pathetique."

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony was first played here in February in the Juilliard School's American music festival, but yesterday's was its first local performance by a professional orchestra. The work has more to offer than the composer's expected structural craftsmanship and command of orchestral resources. It does not mark time in its concise course, and includes variety of ideas and expressive atmosphere.

The second main theme of the first movement, contrasted with the more salient profile of its predecessor, is spaciously lyric and imaginatively appealing, while not retrospective in style. The adagio gave an impression of warmth as well as of consequence in its succession of variations. The finale was spirited and effective, while more conventional in contemporary terms than the other sections.

Here and in the rest of the program the orchestra showed its well known high standard of performance in all its compenent sections, while the interpretations also realized differences of style and atmosphere. The performance of the brief and delectable Mozart work was straightforward and unaffected. The finale of the Piston symphony might have profited by slightly more élan towards the close, but as a whole the American music had a notably discerning and faithfully sympathetic disclosure.

Conductors have often liked to underline the musical expressed emotions of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony [illegible] the highlights as [illegible] possible and to darken its shadows to the utmost extent. But Mr. Munch avoided unnecessary exaggeration, and also excessive change of pace. But this external moderation made the music all the more revealing; expressive tension and contrast were convincing in an interpretation which showed the sincerity as well as the pathos of the music.

Phila. Inquirer Nov. 16

Symphony Gives Annual Concert

By SAMUEL L. SINGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Charles Munch, gave their annual concert last night in the Academy of Music, and for the 24th time this city's music lovers are indebted to The Philadelphia Forum (a division of The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.) for a visit from "America's other orchestra."

For the Boston Symphony is indeed one of the few that brave—and deserve—comparison with our own Philadelphia Orchestra. Its virtuoso qualities were amply demonstrated in a program that consisted of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, No. 31 in D; Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's second set of "Images," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

MUSCULAR QUALITY

With the possible exception of the Debussy, this was not a performance that one could term fastidious or delicately enunciated, although finesse of nuance was present in proper measure. Rather the two symphonies, so disparate in nature, had in common the qualities of muscularity and excitement.

Perhaps not since the days of Stokowski and Koussevitzky (before his mellow later years) has a "Pathetique" of such fury been heard here. The work's intrinsic strong contrasts were intensified more in tempo and dynamics rather than over-all mood, particularly in the first movement where the conductor lashed the orchestra into musical frenzy. Yet the furor was always controlled; it never exceeded the bounds of good taste, as it well could have in the thrilling third movement which the audience involuntarily applauded.

FULL STRING COMPLEMENT

The second movement had its meed of graciousness, with the melodic filigree winningly enunciated, while the pathos of the finale was held in merciful restraint.

For the Mozart Symphony, the composer's first for what might be termed full orchestra, Munch employed the entire complement of strings. This added volume to a vigorous conception of the work in which Munch showed that an aristocratic bearing and virility in Mozart can team well. The strings, here as elsewhere, had brightness and sheen rather than warmth.

Munch likewise communicated the Spanish atmosphere of the Debussy work. Debussy wrote music evoking Spain without having been there, and sometimes his musical imagination had a Moorish tinge, too. In any event, the Bostonians portrayed Spain's "fragrance of the night" and "a festival day" as if they were natives.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502

Student Rate For Symphony

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has set a special admission price of $1 for high school students who wish to attend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The rate will be applicable to balcony seats for any one of the five concerts scheduled this season. The opening concert, tonight, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major, the "Eroica," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Nov. 15

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,577

NOV 16 1956

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which it then repeats in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

Phila. Evening Bulletin Nov. 16

Big Audience Thrilled By Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

Presented by the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony and its dynamic leader, Charles Munch, appeared at the Academy of Music, last night, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Boston Symphony, now in its 76th season, is one of America's most distinguished organizations, and has adhered to the highest possible standards since its founding many years ago. Last night, one was again conscious of such facts and the results that are obtained because of them.

Mr. Munch has absolute control over his orchestra, and with a minimum of gesture and outward stress commands a wide range of emotional color and an amazing set of legitimately achieved dynamic contrasts.

His Mozart, as exemplified by an exhilarating account of the "Paris" Symphony, was a delight. The lovely andantino never sounded better, and there was a straightforward, honest energy to the opening Allegro assaf and the closing Allegro that must have reached the audience, judging from the applause.

Debussy's atmospheric "Iberia," from his "Images pour Orchestre," finds Mr. Munch and his men on ground that they know better than most. There was an authority, as the conductor evoked the teeming streets and the festivals; the evanescent fragrance of the night, the distant sevillana, and the Andalusian revels. The virtuoso qualities of the Bostonians, the clarity of the orchestra's texture was eloquently served by Debussy's music.

The program closed with a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Mr. Munch chose to state the implied tragedy as an inescapable and incomprehensible fact rather than to wallow in a slough of self-pity. The result was that the logic and pathos of the "Pathetique" was greatly heightened, and the symphony became invested with nobility. Particularly thrilling was Mr. Munch's superbly disciplined playing of the famous Allegro molto vivace. The audience was very enthusiastic.

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 14, E—The best performance of the evening, both from aesthetic and technical standpoints, was the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" Symphony. In conductor Munch's hands this familiar work glowed in the first movement, sparkled in the third, and the finale was a superb study of somber shadows.

The concert opened with a well-paced and effectively colored performance of Mozart's Symphony in D Major, although there were moments of faulty ensemble.

It was good to again hear Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5. This well-knit work seems built to withstand the ravages of time. There is a cold, dry lento at the beginning which builds to some magnificent brass passages, followed by a typically energetic American allegro. The second movement, adagio, is introspective and typically Piston. The third and final movement again bears the unmistakable American stamp. As a whole, the music is warmer and more romantic than most of the composer's music. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a sturdy reading. G. W.

d
I.

ony
day ert of the the Boston

will take direction of Tuesday eve-
ns Memorial

present Mon D major,
ony whereby,
visiting Paris as a lad, the composer from Salzburg made his first bid for the attention of the French public. Debussy's "Iberia" will be the second number and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will conclude the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253

NOV 15 1956

Boston Symphony Opens Its Carnegie Hall Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Russia and various other lands since its last appearance here, gave the first concert of its seventy-first New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, where the admirable musicians under Charles Munch's direction played three symphonies far separated in point of time. Thes ewere Mozart's Symphony No. 31, in D major (K. 297), known as the "Paris"; Walter Piston's fifth work in this form and Tchaikovsky's sixth and last, the "Pathetique."

Mr. Piston's Fifth Symphony was first played here in February in the Juilliard School's American music festival, but yesterday's was its first local performance by a professional orchestra. The work has more to offer than the composer's expected structural craftsmanship and command of orchestral resources. It does not mark time in its concise course, and includes variety of ideas and expressive atmosphere.

The second main theme of the first movement, contrasted with the more salient profile of its predecessor, is spaciously lyric and imaginatively appealing, while not retrospective in style. The adagio gave an impression of warmth as well as of consequence in its succession of variations. The finale was spirited and effective, while more conventional in contemporary terms than the other sections.

Here and in the rest of the program the orchestra showed its well known high standard of performance in all its compenent sections, while the interpretations also realized differences of style and atmosphere. The performance of the brief and delectable Mozart work was straightforward and unaffected. The finale of the Piston symphony might have profited by slightly more zeal towards the close, but as a whole the American music had a notably discerning and faithfully sympathetic disclosure.

Conductors have often liked to underline the musical expressed emotions of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, seeing the highlights as [illegible] possible and to darken its shadows to the utmost extent. But Mr. Munch avoided unnecessary exaggeration, and also excessive change of pace. But this external moderation made the music all the more revealing; expressive tension and contrast were convincing in an interpretation which showed the sincerity as well as the pathos of the music.

Nov. 15

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Munch and the Bostonians performed the symphony with painstaking care and with appreciation for its contemplative introspection.

In Brooklyn Tomorrow

Tomorrow night the orchestra plays the following program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, in which it then repeats its in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; "Iberia" Images for Orchestra by Debussy; Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major by Beethoven.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,577

NOV 16 1956

Bostonians Open 76th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th New York season at Carnegie Hall last night found the illustrious ensemble glowing with the brilliance and sheen which are characteristic of its tone at best. And in the brooding Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which closed the program, Charles Munch conducted with an inspiration which made the strings speak as eloquently in dark, somber tones.

More than one observer spoke of the extraordinary intensity, especially in the first and last movements, which conductor and ensemble expressed in the superb performance of this melancholy work. Tchaikovsky, himself, once wrote that he frequently shed tears while composing the music, and it is generally granted that this is one work in which his innermost nature expressed itself.

After the contrasting buoyancy of the opening Mozart Paris Symphony in D Major, K. 297, the concert proceeded to the novelty of the occasion, Walter Piston's Fifth Symphony, first performed here last spring by the Juilliard Orchestra under the direction of Jean Morel.

This, a 25-minute piece in three movements, not offering undue harmonic or melodic complexities, should, nonetheless, be listened to more than once for a mature judgment as to its significance. Predominantly lyrical and reflective in mood, it turns in the first movement to sudden, dramatic contrasts, and in the final "allegro" to syncopated gaiety. The long middle "adagio" gives one the mood of a long walk, circulating around within a restricted area. Its melodies weave a tenuous network that expands little and reiterates its ideas, but which at the same time expresses a tension that is mysterious and almost foreboding.

The initial movement, which contains the most breadth and contrast, appeared disjointed upon first hearing. Its effect, nonetheless, suggested that further acquaintance might temper this feeling in the direction of structural validity.

Bostonians
hony with with apntemplative ow e orchestra program at y of Music,
ts in Car-
afternoon:
anthe" by mages for ssy; Symat Major by

SAMUEL MARGOLIS
PAULINE NESSI
CONTRALTO — Voice Training — Relaxation — Breath Contr
CARLO M
LEADING C
Cincinnati · San Francisco · Philadelphia · Bo
Ansonia Hotel, 73rd St. & Broadway, New York
RUDOLPH GAN
19 East 94th Street, New York 28, N. Y.

This Inquirer Nov. 16.

Symphony Gives Annual Concert

By SAMUEL L. SINGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Charles Munch, gave their annual concert last night in the Academy of Music, and for the 24th time this city's music lovers are indebted to The Philadelphia Forum (a division of The Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.) for a visit from "America's other orchestra."

For the Boston Symphony is indeed one of the few that brave—and deserve—comparison with our own Philadelphia Orchestra. Its virtuoso qualities were amply demonstrated in a program that consisted of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, No. 31 in D; Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's second set of "Images," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

MUSCULAR QUALITY

With the possible exception of the Debussy, this was not a performance that one could term fastidious or delicately enunciated, although finesse of nuance was present in proper measure. Rather the two symphonies, so disparate in nature, had in common the qualities of muscularity and excitement.

Perhaps not since the days of Stokowski and Koussevitzky (before his mellow later years) has a "Pathetique" of such fury been heard here. The work's intrinsic strong contrasts were intensified more in tempo and dynamics rather than over-all mood, particularly in the first movement where the conductor lashed the orchestra into musical frenzy. Yet the furor was always controlled; it never exceeded the bounds of good taste, as it well could have in the thrilling third movement which the audience involuntarily applauded.

FULL STRING COMPLEMENT

The second movement had its meed of graciousness, with the melodic filigree winningly enunciated, while the pathos of the finale was held in merciful restraint.

For the Mozart Symphony, the composer's first for what might be termed full orchestra, Munch employed the entire complement of strings. This added volume to a vigorous conception of the work in which Munch showed that an aristocratic bearing and virility in Mozart can team well. The strings, here as elsewhere, had brightness and sheen rather than warmth.

Munch likewise communicated the Spanish atmosphere of the Debussy work. Debussy wrote music evoking Spain without having been there, and sometimes his musical imagination had a Moorish tinge, too. In any event, the Bostonians portrayed Spain's "fragrance of the night" and "a festival day" as if they were natives.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & Sun
Circ. D. 518,809 - S. 172,502

Student Rate For Symphony

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has set a special admission price of $1 for high school students who wish to attend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The rate will be applicable to balcony seats for any one of the five concerts scheduled this season. The opening concert, tonight, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major, the "Eroica," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Phila. Evening Bulletin Nov. 16

Big Audience Thrilled By Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

Presented by the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony and its dynamic leader, Charles Munch, appeared at the Academy of Music, last night, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Boston Symphony, now in its 76th season, is one of America's most distinguished organizations, and has adhered to the highest possible standards since its founding many years ago. Last night, one was again conscious of such facts and the results that are obtained because of them.

Mr. Munch has absolute control over his orchestra, and with a minimum of gesture and outward stress commands a wide range of emotional color and an amazing set of legitimately achieved dynamic contrasts.

His Mozart, as exemplified by an exhilarating account of the "Paris" Symphony, was a delight. The lovely andantino never sounded better, and there was a straightforward, honest energy to the opening Allegro assai and the closing Allegro that must have reached the audience, judging from the applause.

Debussy's atmospheric "Iberia," from his "Images pour Orchestre," finds Mr. Munch and his men on ground that they know better than most. There was an authority, as the conductor evoked the teeming streets and the festivals; the evanescent fragrance of the night, the distant sevillana, and the Andalusian revels. The virtuoso qualities of the Bostonians, the clarity of the orchestra's texture was eloquently served by Debussy's music.

The program closed with a splendid performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Mr. Munch chose to state the implied tragedy as an inescapable and incomprehensible fact rather than to wallow in a slough of self-pity. The result was that the logic and pathos of the "Pathetique" was greatly heightened, and the symphony became invested with nobility. Particularly thrilling was Mr. Munch's superbly disciplined playing of the famous Allegro molto vivace. The audience was very enthusiastic.

The Jewish Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly
Circ. 12,111

NOV 16 1956

Boston Symphony Here on Tuesday

The opening concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place under the direction of Charles Munch next Tuesday evening in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Dr. Munch will present Mozart's Symphony in D major, K. 297, the Symphony whereby, visiting Paris as a lad, the composer from Salzburg made his first bid for the attention of the French public. Debussy's "Iberia" will be the second number and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will conclude the program.

TIGHT BINDING

158

PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Boston Symphony Pleasing in Concert

By J. CARTIN McKINNEY

There were visitors from Boston at the Academy of Music last night. They call themselves collectively as the Boston Symphony. And by [illegible] they're good!

Philadelphia Forum director Bill Huff, [illegible] them too. Each year he has them in for a one-night stand. And each year he has a capacity audience to show for it.

CONDUCTOR Charles Munch opened his program with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony.

Some people hereabouts consider themselves experts on Mozart because they've heard so much of him lately.

These were the people who found fault with Munch because his account sounded "overblown." To be sure, the corner movements did sound "overblown." But for good reason. That happens to be the way Mozart (not Munch) wrote them.

Incidentally, the slow movement played last night was the 98-bar version Mozart intended for the work originally. It was not the 50-bar version from the Paris Edition as the misleadingly worded program notes seemed to imply.

LEAVING MOZART with clean conscience, Munch went on to Debussy's "Iberia." Here is music cut to the measure of the band from Germantown. And the performance showed it. [illegible]

With this [illegible] conductor's concern [illegible] with the tonal [illegible] Munch managed to be [illegible] places at the same time.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "Pathetique Symphony was the capper. The Bostonians played it [illegible] only two years ago. But that was under Monteux.

Munch's conception is more virtuosic and—to this listener—more compelling.

His mastery with Berlioz gives him a key to Tchaikovsky. It was expressive but not over-emotional, vigorous but not bombastic. Just the [illegible] to send everyone home happy.

Nov 19, 1956

Staats-Herold Corporation
60-20 BROADWAY WOODSIDE 77, N. Y.
PUBLISHERS OF NEW YORKER STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD

Bostoner spielen neues Piston-Werk

Das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Charles Munch sah die Carnegie-Hall bis auf den letzten Platz besetzt, und die Hörer begeisterten sich an den meisterhaft ausgeführten Symphonien von Mozart, Walter Piston und der "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky.

Die Mozart-Symphonie war wie aus einem Guß in Zusammenspiel, Klangfarben und Lieblichkeit.

Die "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky ist so oft erstklassig wiedergegeben worden, und dennoch brachte Munch mit seinen Musikern immer wieder neue Nuancen der so widerspruchsvollen Symphonie. Meisterhaft waren die Bläser im ersten Satz, die die volle Dämonie des russischen Komponisten herausbringen, bis dann die hervorragenden Streicher die versöhnende Melodie in vollster Schönheit hervorzauberten. Unvergleichlich war der dritte Satz, und Munch in seiner mitreißenden, packenden Art, mit ewig jugendlichen Feuer versetzte die Hörer in Begeisterung.

Die Symphonie von Walter Piston, dem bekannten amerikanischen Komponisten, ist im Auftrag der Juilliard-School komponiert, sie war für die Festaufführung 1955 bestimmt, ist jedoch erst verspätet im Februar 1956 zum ersten Male aufgeführt worden. Die drei Sätze sind durchaus fachmännisch aufgebaut. Die Themen in den verschiedenen Instrumenten, besonders Bläsern, sind meist traurig, düster und schwer aufnehmbar für das Ohr. Es waren viele Anklänge an Sybelius, Strauß und Tschaikowsky. Gefallen hat dem Publikum offenbar das Rondo des dritten Satzes im lustigen Polkatempo mit Synkopen. Der anwesende Komponist wurde herzlich applaudiert.

Der große Beifall jedoch galt wohl Charles Munch und seinem Orchester, der zum Auftakt seines diesjährigen New Yorker Besuches in der Carnegie-Hall das erste wirklich elektrisierende Ereignis der Saison brachte.

A. L.

NEWARK, N. J. NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
NOV 20 1956

Featured in S[illegible]

CHARLES MUNCH

MICHAEL TREE

CARL SCHURICHT

JOHN PENNINK

THE PEMBROKE RECORD, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1956

Symphony Will Deliver First Prov. Concert

The Boston Symphony will arrive in Providence tonight for its first performance here of the year. They will be at the Veteran's Memorial auditorium at 8:15 p.m.

The program will include Mozart's Symphony in D Major, Debussy's Iberia, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony #6 in B Minor. The conductor of the first concert will be Charles Munch.

Special Student Tickets

Tickets for the Boston Symphony performances are available at a special rate for students. There are twelve tickets for each performance at 80 cents each. Since there are so few, one student is allowed only one for the season.

Those interested may sign up in the Office of Student Activities for all of the concerts during the coming week. The first twelve for each date will receive tickets for that date; however, there will be room for a few reserve names on each list.

The other dates of the appearances of the Boston Symphony this season are: Tuesday, December 4; Tuesday, January 29; Tuesday, February 26; Tuesday, April 16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4206

Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758

NOV 28 1956

Symphony Concert Program Announced

The program is announced for the season's first concert of the Portland Symphony Orchestra to be presented at 8:15 p.m. today in the City Hall Auditorium.

Samuel Seiniger, Boston, will conduct. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist.

The orchestra will play three selections: "Toccata and Fugue," Bach-Seiniger; "Preludium," Philip E. Bach, arranged by Seiniger, and "Preludio" from "Sonata No. VI," J. S. Bach-Seiniger; "Overture" from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky and "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 5, Op. 9) "From the New World," Dvorak; Adagio, Largo, Scherzo, and Allegro con fuoco.

Silverstein will play "Concerto in E minor," Mendelssohn, Allegro molto appassionata, Andante, and Allegro molto vivace.

NEW YORK, N. Y. HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 19 1956

Bostonians Heard At Carnegie Hall

The program offered by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," "Iberia" from Debussy's "Images for Orchestra" and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. Charles Munch conducted, and the musical results were to the satisfaction of a large audience.

The Bostonians, whose string tone seems to keep remarkably free of impurity in damp weather, were their perfectly assured selves in the works of the afternoon. If ever there was a piece made to order for the delicate and ultra-sensitive organism that this orchestra is, that piece would certainly be "Iberia." The music was played accurately and with flourish, spirit, color and remarkable variety.

Mr. Munch, whose Beethoven is most palatable when he performs it as he did yesterday, took pains with the first movement of the "Eroica." He seemed to have chosen especially happy tempos for the various sections, and the naturalness of the reading, the comfortableness, certainly were aided immensely by that.

R. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860
NOV 18 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Offers Tried-and-True Program in Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with a tried-and-true program, one that it has played many times in the past and will play many times in the future. It could hardly be called an adventurous one, but it did contain three masterpieces — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Debussy's "Iberia" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Charles Munch conducted.

Just as the music was familiar, so were the interpretations. Mr. Munch led his brilliant orchestra through smooth-sounding performances. The Weber was supple and lyric; the Debussy all color, virtuosity and subtlety; the Beethoven forthright and vigorous.

In short, a typical set of Boston Symphony interpretations. But one did wish for something just a little more stimulating in the way of program-making.

H. C. S.

— MORE ON PAGE 164

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 17, A—The first program in the Saturday matinee series offered three works which would offend neither suburban matrons nor nice old ladies who renew their subscriptions loyally every year. There was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica," in that order (so the audience would sit through that modern music until a reliable classic came up). Mr. Munch and the Bostonians are old hands at Debussy, and one couldn't ask for a more sultry, sensuous, or sumptuous "Iberia." We used to consider that this orchestra's chief distinction was its strings. The horns, though, were the idols of this matinee. They blazed in Debussy and glowed in the "Eroica." Mr. Munch imposed his own personality on Beethoven: the tempos lagged and veered, then, startled, leapt like a skittish horse. The curious thing was that everything Munch did was tenable and convincing, probably because of his own conviction; at times, he achieved a remarkable tonal splendor and pulsating aliveness. But it seemed to us that Herr Beethoven didn't need quite so much expressive working over. The strength and the brilliance are in the music itself, and are reasonably effective, we think, without being souped up. Nonetheless, it's always a pleasure to hear the Bostonians again, and we're glad they've found their way back from Huntington Avenue to 57th Street.

K. H.

MUSICAL AMERICA-N.Y. 1956

Munch Conducts Familiar Works

Boston Symphony, [illegible] conductor, Carnegie Hall, Nov. 17, 2:30.

Overture to "Euryanthe" [illegible]
Iberia [illegible]
Symphony [illegible]

Although the [illegible] noon was about [illegible] York audiences [illegible] Munch made the [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] His interpretation [illegible] intoxicating [illegible] a memorable [illegible]

The Beethoven [illegible] folded with a [illegible] ness, marvelous [illegible] Bostonians were [illegible] recent Russian [illegible] thoven symphony [illegible] zied response from [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

158

PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Boston Symphony Pleasing in Concert

By J. CARTIN McKINNEY

There were visitors from Boston at the Academy of Music last night. They [illegible] themselves collectively as the Boston Symphony. And by [illegible] they're good!

Philadelphia Forum director Bill Huff thinks [illegible] them too. Each year he brings them in for a one-night stand. And each year he has a capacity audience to show for it.

CONDUCTOR Charles Munch opened his program with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony.

Some people hereabouts consider themselves experts on Mozart because they've heard so much of him lately.

These were the people who found fault with Munch because his account sounded "overblown." To be sure, the corner movements did sound "overblown." But for good reason. That happens to be the way Mozart (not Munch) wrote them.

Incidentally, the slow movement played last night was the 98-bar version Mozart intended for the work originally. It was not the 58-bar version from the Paris Edition as the misleadingly worded program notes seemed to imply.

LEAVING MOZART with clean conscience, Munch went on to Debussy's "Iberia." Here is music cut to the measure of the band from Beantown. And the performance showed it.

With [illegible] conductor's concern [illegible] with the tonal [illegible] Munch managed to [illegible] places in the same time.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "Pathetique Symphony was the capper. The Bostonians played it here only two years ago. But that was under Monteux.

Munch's conception is more virtuosic and, to this listener—more compelling.

His mastery with Berlioz gives him a key to Tchaikovsky. It was expressive but not over-emotional, vigorous but not bombastic. Just the thing to send everyone home happy.

Nov 19, 1956

Staats-Herold Corporation
60-20 BROADWAY WOODSIDE 77, N. Y.
PUBLISHERS OF NEW YORKER STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD

Bostoner spielen neues Piston-Werk

Das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Charles Munch sah die Carnegie-Hall bis auf den letzten Platz besetzt, und die Hörer begeisterten sich an den meisterhaft ausgeführten Symphonien von Mozart, Walter Piston und der "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky.

Die Mozart-Symphonie war wie aus einem Guß in Zusammenspiel, Klangfarben und Lieblichkeit.

Die "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky ist so oft erstklassig wiedergegeben worden, und dennoch brachte Munch mit seinen Musikern immer wieder neue Nuancen der so widerspruchsvollen Symphonie. Meisterhaft waren die Bläser im ersten Satz, die die volle Dämonie des russischen Komponisten herausbringen, bis dann die hervorragenden Streicher die versöhnende Melodie in vollster Schönheit hervorzauberten. Unvergleichlich war der dritte Satz, und Munch in seiner mitreißenden, packenden Art, mit ewig jugendlichen Feuer versetzte die Hörer in Begeisterung.

Die Symphonie von Walter Piston, dem bekannten amerikanischen Komponisten, ist im Auftrag der Juilliard-School komponiert, sie war für die Festaufführung 1955 bestimmt, ist jedoch erst verspätet im Februar 1956 zum ersten Male aufgeführt worden. Die drei Sätze sind durchaus fachmännisch aufgebaut. Die Themen in den verschiedenen Instrumenten, besonders Bläsern, sind meist traurig, düster und schwer aufnehmbar für das Ohr. Es waren viele Anklänge an Sybelius, Strauß und Tschaikowsky. Gefallen hat dem Publikum offenbar das Rondo des dritten Satzes im lustigen Polkatempo mit Synkopen. Der anwesende Komponist wurde herzlich applaudiert.

Der große Beifall jedoch galt wohl Charles Munch und seinem Orchester, der zum Auftakt seines diesjährigen New Yorker Besuches in der Carnegie-Hall das erste wirklich elektrisierende Ereignis der Saison brachte.

A. L.

NEWARK, N. J. NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 S. 285,182
NOV 20 1956

Featured in S[illegible]

CHARLES MUNCH

MICHAEL TREE

CARL SCHURICHT

[illegible] ANDY

JOHN PENNINK

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, on its first American tour, with Carl Schuricht conducting, will open the Griffith Music Foundation symphony series at the Mosque Tuesday evening, Dec. 4. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, will follow Thursday evening, Jan. 10. Two concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, are also listed in the series. The first, Monday evening, March 4, will have Michael Tree Newark violinist, as featured soloist. John Pennink, young Dutch pianist, will be piano soloist at the second, Tuesday evening, April 9.

THE PEMBROKE RECORD, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1956

Symphony Will Deliver First Prov. Concert

The Boston Symphony will arrive in Providence tonight for its first performance here of the year. They will be at the Veteran's Memorial auditorium at 8:15 p.m.

The program will include Mozart's Symphony in D Major, Debussy's Iberia, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony #6 in B Minor. The conductor of the first concert will be Charles Munch.

Special Student Tickets

Tickets for the Boston Symphony performances are available at a special rate for students. There are twelve tickets for each performance at 80 cents each. Since there are so few, one student is allowed only one for the season.

Those interested may sign up in the Office of Student Activities for all of the concerts during the coming week. The first twelve for each date will receive tickets for that date: however, there will be room for a few reserve names on each list.

The other dates of the appearances of the Boston Symphony this season are: Tuesday, December 4; Tuesday, January 29; Tuesday, February 26; Tuesday, April 16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758
NOV 28 1956

Symphony Concert Program Announced

The program is announced for the season's first concert of the Portland Symphony Orchestra to be presented at 8:15 p.m. today in the City Hall Auditorium.

Samuel Seiniger, Boston, will conduct. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist.

The orchestra will play these selections: "Toccata and Fugue," Bach-Seiniger; "Preludium," Philip E. Bach, arranged by Seiniger, and "Preludio" from "Sonata No. VI," J. S. Bach-Seiniger; "Overture" from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky and "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 5, Op. 9) "From the New World." Dvorak, Adagio, Largo, Scherzo, and Allegro con fuoco.

Silverstein will play "Concerto in E minor," Mendelssohn, Allegro molto appassionata, Andante, and Allegro molto vivace.

NEW YORK, N. Y. HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 19 1956

Bostonians Heard At Carnegie Hall

The program offered by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," "Iberia" from Debussy's "Images for Orchestra" and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. Charles Munch conducted, and the musical results were to the satisfaction of a large audience.

The Bostonians, whose string tone seems to keep remarkably free of impurity in damp weather, were their perfectly assured selves in the works of the afternoon. If ever there was a piece made to order for the delicate and ultra-sensitive organism that this orchestra is, that piece would certainly be "Iberia." The music was played accurately and with flourish, spirit, color and remarkable variety.

Mr. Munch, whose Beethoven is most palatable when he performs it as he did yesterday, took pains with the first movement of the "Eroica." He seemed to have chosen especially happy tempos for the various sections, and the naturalness of the reading, the comfortableness, certainly were aided immensely by that.

R. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860
NOV 18 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Offers Tried-and-True Program in Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with a tried-and-true program, one that it has played many times in the past and will play many times in the future. It could hardly be called an adventurous one, but it did contain three masterpieces — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Debussy's "Iberia" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Charles Munch conducted.

Just as the music was familiar, so were the interpretations. Mr. Munch led his brilliant orchestra through smooth-sounding performances. The Weber was supple and lyric; the Debussy all color, virtuosity and subtlety; the Beethoven forthright and vigorous.

In short, a typical set of Boston Symphony interpretations. But one did wish for something just a little more stimulating in the way of program-making.

H. C. S.

— MORE PAGE 104

[illegible] CRIER
[illegible] RK CITY)
[illegible] 1956

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 17, A—The first program in the Saturday matinee series offered three works which would offend neither suburban matrons nor nice old ladies who renew their subscriptions loyally every year. There was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica," in that order (so the audience would sit through that modern music until a reliable classic came up). Mr. Munch and the Bostonians are old hands at Debussy, and one couldn't ask for a more sultry, sensuous, or sumptuous "Iberia." We used to consider that this orchestra's chief distinction was its strings. The horns, though, were the idols of this matinee. They blazed in Debussy and glowed in the "Eroica." Mr. Munch imposed his own personality on Beethoven: the tempos lagged and veered, then, startled, leapt like a skittish horse. The curious thing was that everything Munch did was tenable and convincing, probably because of his own conviction; at times, he achieved a remarkable tonal splendor and pulsating aliveness. But it seemed to us that Herr Beethoven didn't need quite so much expressive working over. The strength and the brilliance are in the music itself, and are reasonably effective, we think, without being souped up. Nonetheless, it's always a pleasure to hear the Bostonians again, and we're glad they've found their way back from Huntington Avenue to 57th Street.

K. H.

MUSICAL AMERICA-NY
NOV 1956

Munch Conducts Familiar Works

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, conductor, Carnegie Hall, Nov. 17, 2:30.

Overture to "Euryanthe" [illegible]
"Iberia" [illegible]
Symphony [illegible]

Although the [illegible] noon was about [illegible] York audiences [illegible] Munch made the [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] His interpretation [illegible] intoxicating [illegible] a memorable [illegible]

The Beethoven [illegible] folded with a [illegible] ness, marvelous [illegible] Bostonians were in Moscow [illegible] recent Russian tour [illegible] thoven symphony [illegible] zied response from audiences [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

158

PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Boston Symphony Pleasing in Concert

By J. CARTIN McKINNEY

There were visitors from Boston at the Academy of Music last night. They call themselves collectively as the Boston Symphony. And by [illegible], they're good!

Philadelphia Forum director, Bill Huff, thinks well of them, too. Each year he brings them in for a one-night stand. And each year he has a capacity audience to show for it.

CONDUCTOR Charles Munch opened his program with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony.

Some people hereabouts consider themselves experts on Mozart because they've heard so much of him lately.

These were the people who found fault with Munch because his account sounded "overblown." To be sure, the corner movements did sound "overblown." But for good reason. That happens to be the way Mozart (not Munch) wrote them.

Incidentally, the slow movement played last night was the 98-bar version Mozart intended for the work originally. It was not the 58-bar version from the Paris Edition as the misleadingly worded program notes seemed to imply.

LEAVING MOZART with clean conscience, Munch went on to Debussy's "Iberia." Here is music cut to the measure of the band from Beantown. And the performance showed it.

With this work some conductors concern themselves with the tonal inwards. Munch managed to be in both places at the same time.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "Pathetique Symphony was the capper. The Bostonians played it here only two years ago. But that was under Monteux.

Munch's conception is more virtuosic and—to this listener—more compelling.

His mastery with Berlioz gives him a key to Tchaikovsky. It was expressive but not over-emotional, vigorous but not bombastic. Just the thing to send everyone home happy.

Staats-Herold Corporation
60-20 BROADWAY WOODSIDE 77, N. Y.
PUBLISHERS OF NEW YORKER STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD

Bostoner spielen neues Piston-Werk

Das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Charles Munch sah die Carnegie-Hall bis auf den letzten Platz besetzt, und die Hörer begeisterten sich an den meisterhaft ausgeführten Symphonien von Mozart, Walter Piston und der "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky.

Die Mozart-Symphonie war wie aus einem Guß in Zusammenspiel, Klangfarben und Lieblichkeit.

Die "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky ist so oft erstklassig wiedergegeben worden, und dennoch brachte Munch mit seinen Musikern immer wieder neue Nuancen der so widerspruchsvollen Symphonie. Meisterhaft waren die Bläser im ersten Satz, die die volle Dämonie des russischen Komponisten herausbringen, bis dann die hervorragenden Streicher die versöhnende Melodie in vollster Schönheit hervorzauberten. Unvergleichlich war der dritte Satz, und Munch in seiner mitreißenden, packenden Art, mit ewig jugendlichen Feuer versetzte die Hörer in Begeisterung.

Die Symphonie von Walter Piston, dem bekannten amerikanischen Komponisten, ist im Auftrag der Juilliard-School komponiert, sie war für die Festaufführung 1955 bestimmt, ist jedoch erst verspätet im Februar 1956 zum ersten Male aufgeführt worden. Die drei Sätze sind durchaus fachmännisch aufgebaut. Die Themen in den verschiedenen Instrumenten, besonders Bläsern, sind meist traurig, düster und schwer aufaufnehmbar für das Ohr. Es waren viele Anklänge an Sybelius, Strauß und Tschaikowsky Gefallen hat dem Publikum offenbar das Rondo des dritten Satzes im lustigen Polkatempo mit Synkopen. Der anwesende Komponist wurde herzlich applaudiert.

Der große Beifall jedoch galt wohl Charles Munch und seinem Orchester, der zum Auftakt seines diesjährigen New Yorker Besuches in der Carnegie-Hall das erste wirklich elektrisierende Ereignis der Saison brachte.

A. L.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
NOV 20 1956

THE PEMBROKE RECORD, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1956

Featured in S[illegible]s

CHARLES MUNCH

MICHAEL TREE

CARL SCHURICHT

[illegible]ANDY

JOHN PENNINK

Symphony Will Deliver First Prov. Concert

The Boston Symphony will arrive in Providence tonight for its first performance here of the year. They will be at the Veteran's Memorial auditorium at 8:15 p.m.

The program will include Mozart's Symphony in D Major, Debussy's Iberia, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony #6 in B Minor. The conductor of the first concert will be Charles Munch.

Special Student Tickets

Tickets for the Boston Symphony performances are available at a special rate for students. There are twelve tickets for each performance at 80 cents each. Since there are so few, one student is allowed only one for the season.

Those interested may sign up in the Office of Student Activities for all of the concerts during the coming week. The first twelve for each date will receive tickets for that date: however, there will be room for a few reserve names on each list.

The other dates of the appearances of the Boston Symphony this season are: Tuesday, December 4; Tuesday, January 29; Tuesday, February 26; Tuesday, April 16.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, on its first American tour, with Carl Schuricht conducting, will open the Griffith Music Foundation symphony series at the Mosque Tuesday evening, Dec. 4. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, will follow Thursday evening, Jan. 10. Two concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, are also listed in the series. The first, Monday evening, March 4, will have Michael Tree Newark violinist, as featured soloist. John Pennink, young Dutch pianist, will be piano soloist at the second, Tuesday evening, April 9.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758
NOV 28 1956

Symphony Concert Program Announced

The program is announced for the season's first concert of the Portland Symphony Orchestra to be presented at 8:15 p.m. today in the City Hall Auditorium.

Samuel Seiniger, Boston, will conduct. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist.

The orchestra will play these selections: "Toccata and Fugue," Bach-Seiniger; "Preludium," Philip E. Bach, arranged by Seiniger, and "Preludio" from "Sonata No. VI," J. S. Bach-Seiniger; "Overture" from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky and "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 5, Op. 9) "From the New World." Dvorak, Adagio, Largo, Scherzo, and Allegro con fuoco.

Silverstein will play "Concerto in E minor," Mendelssohn, Allegro molto appassionata, Andante, and Allegro molto vivace.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860
NOV 18 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Offers Tried-and-True Program in Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with a tried-and-true program, one that it has played many times in the past and will play many times in the future. It could hardly be called an adventurous one, but it did contain three masterpieces — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Debussy's "Iberia" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Charles Munch conducted.

Just as the music was familiar, so were the interpretations. Mr. Munch led his brilliant orchestra through smooth-sounding performances. The Weber was supple and lyric; the Debussy all color, virtuosity and subtlety; the Beethoven forthright and vigorous.

In short, a typical set of Boston Symphony interpretations. But one did wish for something just a little more stimulating in the way of program-making.

H. C. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 19 1956

Bostonians Heard At Carnegie Hall

The program offered by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," "Iberia" from Debussy's "Images for Orchestra" and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. Charles Munch conducted, and the musical results were to the satisfaction of a large audience.

The Bostonians, whose string tone seems to keep remarkably free of impurity in damp weather, were their perfectly assured selves in the works of the afternoon. If ever there was a piece made to order for the delicate and ultra-sensitive organism that this orchestra is, that piece would certainly be "Iberia." The music was played accurately and with flourish, spirit, color and remarkable variety.

Mr. Munch, whose Beethoven is most palatable when he performs it as he did yesterday, took pains with the first movement of the "Eroica." He seemed to have chosen especially happy tempos for the various sections, and the naturalness of the reading, the comfortableness, certainly were aided immensely by that.

R. B.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)
DEC 1 1956

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 17, A—The first program in the Saturday matinee series offered three works which would offend neither suburban matrons nor nice old ladies who renew their subscriptions loyally every year. There was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica," in that order (so the audience would sit through that modern music until a reliable classic came up). Mr. Munch and the Bostonians are old hands at Debussy, and one couldn't ask for a more sultry, sensuous, or sumptuous "Iberia." We used to consider that this orchestra's chief distinction was its strings. The horns, though, were the idols of this matinee. They blazed in Debussy and glowed in the "Eroica." Mr. Munch imposed his own personality on Beethoven: the tempos lagged and veered, then, startled, leapt like a skittish horse. The curious thing was that everything Munch did was tenable and convincing, probably because of his own conviction; at times, he achieved a remarkable tonal splendor and pulsating aliveness. But it seemed to us that Herr Beethoven didn't need quite so much expressive working over. The strength and the brilliance are in the music itself, and are reasonably effective, we think, without being souped up. Nonetheless, it's always a pleasure to hear the Bostonians again, and we're glad they've found their way back from Huntington Avenue to 57th Street.

K. H.

Munch Conducts Familiar Works

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conductor. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 17, 2:30:

Overture to "Euryanthe" [illegible] Weber
"Iberia" [illegible] Debussy
Symphony No. 6 ("Eroica") [illegible] Beethoven

Although the program for the afternoon was about as familiar to New York audiences as possible, Mr. Munch made the Weber, Debussy and Beethoven much more than merely [illegible]. His interpretation of the exotic and intoxicating Debussy score was a memorable experience.

The Beethoven "Eroica" was unfolded with a grandeur and coherence marvelously to hear. When the Bostonians were in Moscow on their recent Russian tour, it was this Beethoven symphony which drew the [illegible]zied response from audiences.

TIGHT BINDING

158

PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Boston Symphony Pleasing in Conc

By J. CARTIN McKINNEY

There were visitors from Boston at the Academy of Music last night. They [illegible] themselves collectively as the Boston Symphony. And by [illegible], they're good!

Philadelphia Forum director, Bill Huff, thinks [illegible] them, too. Each year he brings them in for a one-night stand. And each year he has a capacity audience to show for it.

CONDUCTOR Charles Munch opened his program with Mozart's "Paris" Symphony.

Some people hereabouts consider themselves experts on Mozart because they've heard so much of him lately.

These were the people who found fault with Munch because his account sounded "overblown." To be sure, the corner movements did sound "overblown." But for good reason. That happens to be the way Mozart (not Munch) wrote them.

Incidentally, the slow movement played last night was the 98-bar version Mozart intended for the work originally. It was not the 58-bar version from the Paris Edition as the misleadingly worded program notes seemed to imply.

LEAVING MOZART with clean conscience, Munch went on to Debussy's "Iberia." Here is music cut to the measure of the band from Beantown. And the performance showed it.

With this work some conductors concern themselves with the tonal inwards. Munch managed to be in [illegible] places at the same time.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "Pathetique Symphony was the capper. The Bostonians played it here only two years ago. But t[illegible] under Monteux.

Munch's conception [illegible] virtuosic and—to this [illegible] more compelling.

His mastery with Be[illegible] him a key to Tchaikovs[illegible] expressive but not over[illegible]al, vigorous but not [illegible] Just the thing to sen[illegible] home happy.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 S. 288,382
NOV 20 1956

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758
NOV 28 1956

Symphony Concert Program Announced

The program is announced for the season's first concert of the Portland Symphony Orchestra to be presented at 8:15 p.m. today in the City Hall Auditorium.

Samuel Seiniger, Boston, will conduct. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist.

The orchestra will play these selections: "Toccata and Fugue," Bach-Seiniger; "Preludium," Philip E. Bach, arranged by Seiniger, and "Preludio" from "Sonata No. VI," J. S. Bach-Seiniger; "Overture" from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky and "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 5, Op. 9) "From the New World." Dvorak, Adagio, Largo, Scherzo, and Allegro con fuoco.

Silverstein will play "Concerto in E minor," Mendelssohn, Allegro molto appassionata, Andante, and Allegro molto vivace.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 526,215 - S. 1,146,860
NOV 18 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Offers Tried-and-True Program in Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with a tried-and-true program, one that it has played many times in the past and will play many times in the future. It could hardly be called an adventurous one, but it did contain three masterpieces — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Debussy's "Iberia" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Charles Munch conducted.

Just as the music was familiar, so were the interpretations. Mr. Munch led his brilliant orchestra through smooth-sounding performances. The Weber was supple and lyric; the Debussy all color, virtuosity and subtlety; the Beethoven forthright and vigorous.

In short, a typical set of Boston Symphony interpretations. But one did wish for something just a little more stimulating in the way of program-making.

H. C. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
NOV 19 1956

Bostonians Heard At Carnegie Hall

The program offered by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," "Iberia" from Debussy's "Images for Orchestra" and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. Charles Munch conducted, and the musical results were to the satisfaction of a large audience.

The Bostonians, whose string tone seems to keep remarkably free of impurity in damp weather, were their perfectly assured selves in the works of the afternoon. If ever there was a piece made to order for the delicate and ultra-sensitive organism that this orchestra is, that piece would certainly be "Iberia." The music was played accurately and with flourish, spirit, color and remarkable variety.

Mr. Munch, whose Beethoven is most palatable when he performs it as he did yesterday, took pains with the first movement of the "Eroica." He seemed to have chosen especially happy tempos for the various sections, and the naturalness of the reading, the comfortableness, certainly were aided immensely by that.

R. B.

Featured in Symphony Series

CHARLES MUNCH

CARL SCHURICHT

EUGENE ORMANDY

MICHAEL TREE

JOHN PENNINK

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, on its first American tour, with Carl Schuricht conducting, will open the Griffith Music Foundation symphony series at the Mosque Tuesday evening, Dec. 4. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, will follow Thursday evening, Jan. 10. Two concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, are also listed in the series. The first, Monday evening, March 4, will have Michael Tree Newark violinist, as featured soloist. John Pennink, young Dutch pianist, will be piano soloist at the second, Tuesday evening, April 9.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)
1956

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, Nov. 17, A—The first program in the Saturday matinee series offered three works which would offend neither suburban matrons nor nice old ladies who renew their subscriptions loyally every year. There was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Iberia," and Beethoven's "Eroica," in that order (so the audience would sit through that modern music until a reliable classic came up). Mr. Munch and the Bostonians are old hands at Debussy, and one couldn't ask for a more sultry, sensuous, or sumptuous "Iberia." We used to consider that this orchestra's chief distinction was its strings. The horns, though, were the idols of this matinee. They blazed in Debussy and glowed in the "Eroica." Mr. Munch imposed his own personality on Beethoven: the tempos lagged and veered, then, startled, leapt like a skittish horse. The curious thing was that everything Munch did was tenable and convincing, probably because of his own conviction; at times, he achieved a remarkable tonal splendor and pulsating aliveness. But it seemed to us that Herr Beethoven didn't need quite so much expressive working over. The strength and the brilliance are in the music itself, and are reasonably effective, we think, without being souped up. Nonetheless, it's always a pleasure to hear the Bostonians again, and we're glad they've found their way back from Huntington Avenue to 57th Street.

K. H.

Munch Conducts Familiar Works

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conductor, Carnegie Hall, Nov. [illegible] 2:30: [illegible]

Overture to "Euryanthe" [illegible]
"Iberia" [illegible]
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) [illegible]

Although the [illegible] for the afternoon was about [illegible] possible, [illegible] York audience [illegible] Munch made the Weber, Debussy and Beethoven [illegible] His interpretation of the [illegible] intoxicating Debussy score [illegible] a memorable experience. [illegible] Eroica [illegible]

The Beethoven [illegible] folded with a grandeur and [illegible] ness marvelous to hear. [illegible] Bostonians were in Moscow on [illegible] recent Russian tour, it was [illegible] thoven symphony which drew [illegible] zied response from audiences [illegible]

Staats-Herold Corporation
0 BROADWAY WOODSIDE 77, N. Y.
LISHERS OF NEW YORKER STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD
BER 20, 1956

Dr. I. Frazer Will Propound French Views

"Les Etats-Unis Devant L'Opinion Française," i.e. "The French Opinion of the United States", will be the topic of the Albert Bushnell Johnson Lecture to be delivered Thursday, November 29, by Dr. Ian Forbes Frazier. The lecture will be held in Upper Manning from 8:15 to 10:30 p.m.

Born in Aberdeen Scotland, Dr. Frazer attended Columbia University during the years 1925-1938, when, as an education major, he obtained his B.A., M.A., and Ph.D. Having been an instructor in French and assistant to the dean at Columbia, he also held the title of Director of the Maison Francaise there from 1930-1947.

From 1942-1946 Dr. Frazer was a member of the Armed Forces. As A Lieutenant-Colonel in the Air Force he partook in the Normandy landing and was with the Ninth Army at the Battle of the Bulge. A recipient of the Bronze Star and six campaign [illegible] ETO [illegible]

Bostoner spielen neues Piston-Werk

Das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Charles Munch sah die Carnegie-Hall bis auf den letzten Platz besetzt, und die Hörer begeisterten sich an den meisterhaft ausgeführten Symphonien von Mozart, Walter Piston und der "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky.

Die Mozart-Symphonie war wie aus einem Guß in Zusammenspiel, Klangfarben und Lieblichkeit.

Die "Pathétique" von Tschaikowsky ist so oft erstklassig wiedergegeben worden, und dennoch brachte Munch mit seinen Musikern immer wieder neue Nuancen der so widerspruchsvollen Symphonie. Meisterhaft waren die Bläser im ersten Satz, die die volle Dämonie des russischen Komponisten herausbringen, bis dann die hervorragenden Streicher die versöhnende Melodie in vollster Schönheit hervorzauberten. Unvergleichlich war der dritte Satz, und Munch in seiner mitreißenden, packenden Art, mit ewig jugendlichen Feuer versetzte die Hörer in Begeisterung.

Die Symphonie von Walter Piston, dem bekannten amerikanischen Komponisten, ist im Auftrag der Juilliard-School komponiert, sie war für die Festaufführung 1955 bestimmt, ist jedoch erst verspätet im Februar 1956 zum ersten Male aufgeführt worden. Die drei Sätze sind durchaus fachmännisch aufgebaut. Die Themen in den verschiedenen Instrumenten, besonders Bläsern, sind meist traurig, düster und schwer aufaufnehmbar für das Ohr. Es waren viele Anklänge an Sybelius, Strauß und Tschaikowsky Gefallen hat dem Publikum offenbar das Rondo des dritten Satzes im lustigen Polkatempo mit Synkopen. Der anwesende Komponist wurde herzlich applaudiert.

Der große Beifall jedoch galt wohl Charles Munch und seinem Orchester, der zum Auftakt seines diesjährigen New Yorker Besuches in der Carnegie-Hall das erste wirklich elektrisierende Ereignis der Saison brachte.

A. L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
NOV 24 1956

Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

Early Arrivals Sit Out for Lunch

Among those who gained the 60-cent rush seats at Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday were these youngsters who had brought along their lunches. They began showing up at 10:30 a.m.

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 39,259
NOV 21 1956

Music In Review

Boston Symph Opens Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was given an enthusiastic greeting at the opening concert of the current Providence series last night in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Charles Munch conducted with apparent enjoyment and the musicians reflected his mood.

The opening work was Mozart's "Symphony in D-Major, Paris, K. 297." The first movement, allegro assai, was played with vigor and abandon, and the artistic contrasts of expression, now delicate, now boisterous, gave it a delightful lilt.

The andantino, second movement, was blithe and legarto with a fine flute solo. The finale was swift and almost riotous, with some whirlwind tempos in the closing bars that brought whirlwind applause from the audience.

Debussy's "Iberia" (Images for Orchestra, No. 2) comprised three scenes, streets, fragrance of the night, and festival day. The first was lyric with the click of castanets and the ruffles of the tambourine and evoked images of snapping heels and swirling skirts.

The second was "blue" with muted strings and brasses, and was remindful of the wierd thoughts and imagined voices of the darkness.

The last was the brilliant dawn and hurrying tumult of morning preparations for a carnival. The orchestra never was better.

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B-Minor, Pathetique, opus 74" completed the program. This well-known work was played with the expert touch that brings out the depth of melancholy of the Slavic race, filled with storm and sadness and rising hope.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 58,259
NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297), which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Symphony Performs Tues. Night

On Tuesday evening, November 20, at 8:15, the first of a series of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts is to be held at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium.

The program will include Mozart's Symphony in D Major. Debussy's Iberia, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony #6 in B Minor. The conductor of the first concert will be Charles Munch.

Special Student Tickets

Tickets for the Boston Symphony performances are available at a special rate for students. There are twelve tickets for each performance at 80 cents each. Since there are so few, one student is allowed only one for the season.

Those interested may sign up in the Office of Student Activities for all of the concerts during the coming week. The first twelve for each date will receive tickets for that date; however, there will be room for a few reserve names on each list. Signing up will begin at 9:00 a.m. Monday morning, November 19.

The other dates of the appearances of the Boston Symphony this season are: Tuesday, December 4; Tuesday, January 29; Tuesday, February 26; Tuesday, April 16.

turn of Boston Symphony

TEXT BY JOAN BAXTER—PICTURES BY J. DAVID LAMONTAGNE

RHODE ISLAND music lovers were not to be outdone by those of Cork or Copenhagen as they eagerly turned out Tuesday to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back from its European tour, in the group's first concert of the season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Now as much a part of local tradition as Rhode Island johnnycakes or the wooden carollers on the Mall, the series this season as in the past, continues to be a highlight in the cultural life of the city.

For the statistically minded, Tuesday evening marked the orchestra's 336th appearance here. They will be back three times before the final concert on April 16.

Faithful patron of Boston Symphony is the conductor of Rhode Island's own Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira.

Meeting the maestro: Backstage with Dr. Munch are first nighters, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Thomas of Mathewson Road, Barrington. They were among a capacity audience.

By chartered bus came students from Hatch Preparatory School, Newport. J. Walter Ferguson, a master, distributes tickets to Alex Gundry (l), Bruce Parrish, Silas Basham.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
24 1956

Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

Early Arrivals Sit Out for Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

Among those who gained the 60-cent rush seats at Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday were these youngsters who had brought along their lunches. They began showing up at 10:30 a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1956

Symphony Performs Tues. Night

On Tuesday evening, November 20, at 8:15, the first of a series of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts is to be held at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium.

The program will include Mozart's Symphony in D Major. Debussy's Iberia, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony #6 in B Minor. The conductor of the first concert will be Charles Munch.

Special Student Tickets

Tickets for the Boston Symphony performances are available at a special rate for students. There are twelve tickets for each performance at 80 cents each. Since there are so few, one student is allowed only one for the season.

Those interested may sign up in the Office of Student Activities for all of the concerts during the coming week. The first twelve for each date will receive tickets for that date; however, there will be room for a few reserve names on each list. Signing up will begin at 9:00 a.m. Monday morning, November 19.

The other dates of the appearances of the Boston Symphony this season are: Tuesday, December 4; Tuesday, January 29; Tuesday, February 26; Tuesday, April 16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

turn of Boston Symphony

TEXT BY JOAN BAXTER—PICTURES BY J. DAVID LAMONTAGNE

RHODE ISLAND music lovers were not to be outdone by those of Cork or Copenhagen as they eagerly turned out Tuesday to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back from its European tour, in the group's first concert of the season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Now as much a part of local tradition as Rhode Island johnnycakes or the wooden carollers on the Mall, the series this season as in the past, continues to be a highlight in the cultural life of the city.

For the statistically minded, Tuesday evening marked the orchestra's 336th appearance here. They will be back three times before the final concert on April 16.

Faithful patron of Boston Symphony is the conductor of Rhode Island's own Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira.

Meeting the maestro: Backstage with Dr. Munch are first nighters, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Thomas of Mathewson Road, Barrington. They were among a capacity audience.

By chartered bus came students from Hatch Preparatory School, Newport. J. Walter Ferguson, a master, distributes tickets to Alex Gundry (l), Bruce Parrish, Silas Basham.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
24 1956

unch at Boston Symphony Concert

a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

1956

NSA Conference

Judith Griswold and Margerie Ellman, SGA President and Vice President respectively reported on their recent trip to the NSA Conference at Mt. Holyoke. The girls learned at the conference of the action being taken by other schools about the Hungarian situation, and this gave rise to the current drive on the Pembroke Campus.

Margie Ellman asked that students signing up for committees realize that they have a responsibility to the heads of these committees. It was felt that recently students have been signing up for committees and not attending meetings.

After discussion of the alternatives, the council finally decided that it would be best to combine certain features of "Sincerely Yours," such as the information about various organizations, with the more formal manual. A separate pamphlet would be printed for the freshmen containing more of the informal information contained in the "Sincerely Yours" letter.

A report of the International Committee Dance was given by Janet Glen, chairman. According to the report, the dance was a social and monetary success. The money will be placed in a fund to aid another foreign student to come to Pembroke.

year.

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 181,704

NOV 25 1956

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

Return of Boston Symphony

TEXT BY JOAN BAXTER—PICTURES BY J. DAVID LAMONTAGNE

Faithful patron of Boston Symphony is the conductor of Rhode Island's own Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira.

RHODE ISLAND music lovers were not to be outdone by those of Cork or Copenhagen as they eagerly turned out Tuesday to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back from its European tour, in the group's first concert of the season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Now as much a part of local tradition as Rhode Island johnnycakes or the wooden carollers on the Mall, the series this season as in the past, continues to be a highlight in the cultural life of the city.

For the statistically minded, Tuesday evening marked the orchestra's 336th appearance here. They will be back three times before the final concert on April 16.

Meeting the maestro: Backstage with Dr. Munch are first nighters, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Thomas of Mathewson Road, Barrington. They were among a capacity audience.

By chartered bus came students from Hatch Preparatory School, Newport. J. Walter Ferguson, a master, distributes tickets to Alex Gundry (l), Bruce Parrish, Silas Basham.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences ities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

Faithful patron of Boston Symphony is the conductor of Rhode Island's own Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira.

Meeting the maestro: Backstage with Dr. Munch are first nighters, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Thomas of Mathewson Road, Barrington. They were among a capacity audience.

By chartered bus came students from Hatch Preparatory School, Newport. J. Walter Ferguson, a master, distributes tickets to Alex Gundry (l), Bruce Parrish, Silas Basham.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences [illegible] cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

ans Christmas Bazaar

chairman and Mrs. Elmer J. Wil- with Mr. and Mrs. F. Bradley

McGlynn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Earl V. McGlynn of Capron Street, West Warwick, and Mr. William Curtis Eccleston, son of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Eccleston of South Main Street, Coventry.

The Rev. Joseph T. Hughes officiated at the 10 o'clock ceremony, and a reception followed at the West Warwick Country Club.

The bride was escorted to the altar by her father. She wore an empire gown of pure silk with a portrait neckline and bodice of reembroidered Alencon lace trimmed with seed pearls. Her finger-tip French illusion veil was held in place by a coronet of lace and mums, stephanotis and ivy.

A gold princess gown of velvet and an ivy wreath were worn by Miss Marcia J. McGlynn, who attended her sister as maid of honor. Similar gowns and wreaths were worn by the bridesmaids, Miss Mary N. McGlynn, another sister, and Mrs. Robert Carpenter of Coventry. All carried crescent-shaped bouquets of gold and bronze chrysanthemums and ivy.

Donna Schraege of Providence, a cousin of the bride, was flower girl. She was attired in a white velvet gown and an ivy wreath and carried a basket of mums and ivy.

bride, was the best man. Mr. Curtis Potter and Mr. Robert Carpenter of Coventry ushered, and Dale Bate, a cousin of the bridegroom, was ring bearer.

Mr. Eccleston and his bride left on a wedding trip to the Laurentian Mountains in Canada. They will reside at 128 So. Main St., Coventry.

Hitchen-Blair

Engagement Announced

Mr. and Mrs. John Williams Blair of Auburn Street, Cranston, announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Winifred Frances Blair, to Mr. Harold Hitchen Jr., son of Mrs. Sigrid E. Hitchen of Redland Avenue, Rumford.

Miss Blair is an alumna of Endicott Junior College, Beverly, Mass., and Mr. Hitchen was graduated from St. Andrew's School, Barrington.

Anne Fletcher Is Engaged

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

By chartered bus came students from Hatch Preparatory School, Newport. J. Walter Ferguson, a master, distributes tickets to Alex Gundry (l), Bruce Parrish, Silas Basham.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in other cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

e Dale (l) and Mrs. I. Peace Hazard of Saunderstown, subscribers.

Mrs. Edgar L. Clark of Pearse Road, Swansea, has returned to her home after a visit with her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. William Clark in Cheshire, Conn., who announced the birth of their second child, a son, Thomas, on Nov. 4. The mother of the baby is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Dennis of Riverside, R. I.

Mr. Harry B. Ellis will speak at the Woman's Club tomorrow afternoon at 3:15 o'clock on "The Middle East Today." Mr. Ellis was a correspondent in that area for two and one-half years.

Burgess—Dunn

Announcement is made of the marriage of Miss Sherrill Dunn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Dunn Jr. of Tucker Avenue, Cranston, and Mr. Raymond R. Burgess Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond R. Burgess of Columbia Avenue, Warwick.

The ceremony was performed Nov. 10 at 11:30 o'clock in St. Peter's Church, Warwick, by the Rev. Raymond Beaulieu. A luncheon was held at The Drift-wood, Pawtuxet.

The couple will make their home at 38 Farragut Ave.

FLORAS
ANTIQUES
An Exquisite Collection of Antique Silver, Jewelry, China, Furniture and Bric-a-Brac.
CHRISTMAS GIFTS
Reasonably Priced
201 WAYLAND AVENUE
(Wayland Square)

Sorority Shop

OPEN MONDAYS
Ann Gerber
303 WAYLAND AVENUE • WAYLAND SQUARE
Formal Fashion in the News

. . . By Cothe', in carbon blue . . . 149.95

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

Full house which welcomed orchestra "home" included Mrs. Wallace Campbell of Peace Dale (l) and Mrs. I. Peace Hazard of Saunderstown, subscribers.

Meeting during intermission are (l-r) Mrs. Kenneth D. MacColl of Cooke Street, Mrs. Richard E. Wheeler of Prospect Street and Mrs. C. Richard Steedman of Angell Street.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in 19 European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

Time is running short for selecting personalized Tilden-Thurber
CHRISTMAS CARDS
Tilden-Thurber offers one of the largest and most varied collections of Christmas cards in its long history:

SALLY'S, YOUR DOWNTOWN
TALL SHOP
OPEN EVERY EVENING
'TILL XMAS
AFTER-THANKSGIVING

Burgess—Dunn

Announcement is made of the marriage of Miss Sherrill Dunn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Dunn Jr. of Tucker Avenue, Cranston, and Mr. Raymond R. Burgess Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond R. Burgess of Columbia Avenue, Warwick.

The ceremony was performed Nov. 10 at 11:30 o'clock in St. Peter's Church, Warwick, by the Rev. Raymond Beaulieu. A luncheon was held at The Drift-wood, Pawtuxet.

The couple will make their

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

rush erday along 10:30

a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., and because of the cold weather were permitted inside. There were 261 rush seats available out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

Meeting during intermission are (l-r) Mrs. Kenneth D. MacColl of Cooke Street, Mrs. Richard E. Wheeler of Prospect Street and Mrs. C. Richard Steedman of Angell Street.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in 19 European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

Portrait of a lovely Christmas
Our Furred Cashmeres
. . . the gift supreme!
All full-fashioned . . .

This formal gown is one of a select group of outstanding styles . . . they are being featured priced from fifteen to fifty dollars . . .
Now at two great stores . . .
SORORITY SHOP . . . 211 Union St., Providence . . . open both Monday and Thursday evenings 'til 9 . . . one hour free

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
,675

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

rush a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., erday and because of the cold weather were permit- along ted inside. There were 261 rush seats available 10:30 out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

16, 1956

Two on the aisle this season for Mr. and Mrs. Stuart C. Sherman of Angell Street.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in 19 European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

Portrait of a lovely Christmas
Our Furred Cashme
. . . the gift supreme!
We Have DEDICATED Ourselves to YOUR service and

FALL RIVER
Church Pl

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 21 1956

Music Reviewed

Ovations Mark R.I. Opening Of the Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. It is safe to say that Charles Munch has never conducted a program here which had, for his listeners, such power of communication yet which left them so bereft of words to say so. It was a virtuoso performance of the first order which ran the gamut of musical expression.

Musicians and conductor were given an ovation three times during the program and the applause literally stopped the show after the stirring third movement of the "Pathetique." The players were directed to rise to accept the applause. Was there ever before such an orchestra? And had Providence ever applauded so spontaneously?

There is no question but that the recent trip through Europe has brought something to the playing of these musicians which speaks with authority. They made the finale of the Tchaikovsky "Sixth" a dramatic summing up of human misery. To be sure it was known and written down by Tchaikovsky. It has been mirrored a hundred times in history since his day. Yet there was something immediate about the repeated lament, the five note theme which seems to chant, "Why must it be so." The orchestra did not give us the answer and there was no choice but to go back to the lighter moments of the symphony, the beauty of the singing themes of the first Allegro, the lilting bits of the Scherzo and the stirring march theme of the Vivace. We do not need to hear this work ever again. We have heard it in a superlative interpretation.

We also heard a performance of Mozart's Symphony in D major, "Paris," (K297) which was the ultimate in grace and refinement. The string section of the orchestra outdid anything which would normally be expected of them. The passage work was of the utmost clarity, as if played by one musician. Flute tones were of purest quality and a vibrant and sensitive awareness to the beauty of the music made this a thrilling thing to hear.

Debussy's "Iberia," a picturesque travel poster in sound, played us a tempting invitation to visit the colorful peninsula. The castanets were as eloquent as those of any Spanish dancer. Dr. Munch gave us a brilliant display of Debussy's skill at orchestration. This work took on a truly continental flavor and its moods were subtly expressed.

This program will be hard to match, in its appeal to all groups of listeners. It will also be talked of for days to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
61,675

1956

Lunch at Boston Symphony Concert

rush a.m. for the concert which began at 2:15 p.m., erday and because of the cold weather were permit-along ted inside. There were 261 rush seats available 10:30 out of a seating capacity of 2,631.

Onstage again in Providence Tuesday after playing for audiences in 19 European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first concert of the season.

TIGHT BINDING

16

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

NOV 24 1956

Golschmann Guest at Symphony

Tansman Concerto in American Première

By Harold Rogers

An orchestra such as the Boston Symphony is a sensitive, responsive instrument, much like a mirror in that it reflects the personality of the conductor standing before it.

It is, in another sense, like a superb grand piano that stands waiting for a performer's touch. If played by a beginner, this piano can annoy the neighborhood; but if played by a master, the heavens open.

In a different way, however, an orchestra is not like [illegible]. The Boston Symphony [illegible] ent is composed [illegible] cians, most of whom [illegible] played together for many [illegible]. They have attained a [illegible] basic style that a succession of guest conductors could not impair over night.

It is nevertheless astonishing what a change can take place when a guest conductor mounts the podium. These 103 men surrender their individualities in order to function as one under the guidance of the conductor, whoever he may be. They fuse into a gigantic musical mirror, and they give a reflection of the musical mind in command.

The basic style of the Boston Symphony was still in evidence yesterday afternoon when Vladimir Golschmann appeared in Symphony Hall as guest conductor. By and large, however, it sounded like another orchestra—an ensemble almost devoid of nuance, scintillation, and refinement.

In such a case there is but one conclusion to be drawn. The fault was Dr. Golschmann's. Music must first be submitted to a refining process in the conductor's heart, if it is to come forth as refinement in sound—even if the orchestra itself is among the most polished ensembles in the world.

Dr. Golschmann chose a program that had its winning aspects, however, in spite of certain crudities of sound. The opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon"—frenetic, jovial and virtuosic in its appeal—was struck off in a dashing manner that was entertaining and stimulating.

So, too, was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, heard in its United States première. Its five short movements—played with pause but without distinct interruption—contain brilliant patches of tonal display recalling at least in technique—the Bartók Concerto for Orchestra.

But the emotional effect is not the same. There are shimmering subtleties—in the Presto, especially, filled with insect rustlings and bird calls—but Tansman's are not rarefied to the degree of Bartók's.

In Debussy's "La Mer" Dr. Golschmann [illegible] unfortunately placed himself in competition with the Boston Symphony's regular conductor. We have heard "La Mer" many times during Charles Munch's tenure, and it is one of the best things he does. The difference, again, comes under the main point of this discussion. Yesterday's "La Mer" needed more subtlety.

Dr. Golschmann closed with a performance of the Brahms Fourth that reduced this listener to a state of righteous indignation. With the exception of several pleasing passages in the Andante, the symphony was aggressively bombastic.

At one point the violins rode off in two separate paths, owing to the uncertainty of the conductor's directions. A more embarrassing faux pas occurred at the end. Perhaps Dr. Golschmann thought he had an extra beat or two in the final chord. Whatever the lapse, the music came to a shy conclusion while his arms were still raised. His cut-off signal followed, but silence already prevailed.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

NOV 29 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

Editor's Note: The review below is by Uri Haber-Schaim. Mr. Haber-Schaim, an accomplished musician, is at present a member of the faculty at MIT.

GOLSCHMANN CONDUCTS BSO

The sixth subscription concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Saturday, November 24, with Vladimir Golschmann conducting. The program consisted of the Overture to "Colas Breugnon" by Kabalevsky, Concerto for Tausman, "La Mer" by Debussy and after the intermission, Brahms fourth symphony.

The combination of the first three compositions seemed to me somewhat unfortunate, particularly in view of the fact that they were played with pauses barely long enough for the applause to die out. It is true that it said on the program that the concert would end at 10:20 p.m., but this could be changed to 10 [illegible], thus giving the audience a chance to prepare itself [illegible] for each composition.

[illegible] is well known for its tradition of bringing to the public [illegible] music of contemporary composers; in this case—Tausman [illegible] Concerto for Orchestra which was composed about a year ago. This is the first time that I heard a composition by Mr. Tausman and I shall, therefore, limit myself to some general impressions. The Concerto opens in dark and quiet colors which lead to a rather strange second movement. The sounds of this movement reminded me of the noise of an assembly line, but if listened to with some humor were more funny than unpleasant. From there on, the third, fourth and fifth movements were quite beautiful, showing clearly that Mr. Tausman is not only a master of orchestration but a composer with a distinct sense for rhythm and color.

In Tansman's Concerto Mr. Golschmann did very well with a few tentative [illegible]. For Debussy he needed the full spectrum. With the [illegible] at his service he could have obtained anything he wanted. Apparently he did not ask for it and the result was a rather dull and pale "La Mer."

Brahms's fourth symphony is undoubtedly one of the greatest symphonies in the entire literature. We may ask ourselves why is this so? It seems to me that one can answer this question by observing that the symphony consists of several motifs, each of which is not only beautiful by itself, but developed and woven into one great structure. Hence when one comes to perform this symphony, attention has to be paid to the presentation (or phrasing in more professional language) of the individual motifs and to their relations to each other. This was almost lacking last Saturday in the first three movements. They sounded like the recitation of a drama without paying attention to stops, exclamation marks and sometimes even the contents. The last movement was much better in this respect and so the concert ended on a more satisfying note.

* * *

Editor's Note: The review below is by Dr. Ezra Lambdin.

SECOND EARLY MUSIC CONCERT

For those loyal supporters of the Cambridge Society for Early Music who perhaps felt their musical sensibilities bludgeoned into dullness by a surfeit of Telemann offered at the first concert, the variety afforded by the program on Monday evening must have been especially welcome. One is grateful to Erwin Bodky, admiration for whose musicianship steadily grows, for so broad a definition of the Baroque that permitted inclusion of Monteverdi's "Zefiro Torna," a duet for tenors employing the "ciacona" form and a splendid example of early Italian bel-canto.

Samuel Mayes, who was regrettably relegated to the role of continuo for most of the program, provided the treat of the evening in a superbly tasteful performance of the Marcello Sonata in E minor for cello. Miss Posselt was heard in rather spirited renditions of the D major violin sonata of Corelli and the E major sonata of Tartini. She was also joined by Mr. Burgin in sonatas by Vivaldi and Albinoni. [illegible] Oberlin, billed as a counter-tenor, sang, in addition to Monteverdi numbers (with Charles Bressler, listed [illegible] a tenor), Alessandro Scarlatti's solo cantata "Pensieri," displayed a vocal quality strange, lovely and all-too-rarely heard.

The program of music by masters of the Italian Baroque presented relatively unknown works by these relatively well-known composers; but conditioned by the steady stream of visits here of a host of Italian string chamber groups, repertories bulging with the Baroque, even the unfamiliar succeeds in stimulating a welcome sort of auditory "deja vue" phenomenon, rendering listening and appreciation that much easier.

If one be permitted to cavil, it is only at Mr. Bodky's harpsichord, which looks so impressive, but yields a tone disturbingly dull, damped and dead.

MUSIC [illegible]
NEW YORK, [illegible]
NOV [illegible]

Leslie J. Rogers

Leslie J. Rogers, 63, of Brookline, Mass., music librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 44 years, died at the United States Army Hospital Oct. 11 in Stuttgart, Germany. He was stricken with pneumonia Sept. 13, near the close of the orchestra's recent European tour. Mr. Rogers joined the Boston Symphony in 1912 and was the senior member in point of service, as well as the dean of music librarians among the major symphonies in the United States. He served under five conductors: Dr. Karl Muck, Henri Rapaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, and incumbent Dr. Charles Munch.

Survivors include his wife, Mrs. Helen Bond Stenger Rogers; a daughter, Mrs. Phyllis McCleary; and his mother, Mrs. Cora P. Howe.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 24 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Golschmann Guest Conductor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the sixth program of the Friday-Saturday series. Vladimir Golschmann, as guest, conducted: Kabalevsky: Overture to "Colas Breugnon"; Alexandre Tansman: Concerto for Orchestra (first time in the United States); Debussy: "La Mer"; Brahms: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, No. 4.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, is guest leader of the Boston Symphony concerts this week, his first such visit since 1944. Although become a little grayer since then—along with all the rest of us—Mr. Golschmann impressed yesterday much as I remembered him to have done a dozen years ago.

That is to say, he is a conductor of a certain competence, modest in manner, elegant of gestures, at his best in such a light and bubbling short score as Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon" Overture. It takes a while to make headway in commanding a strange orchestra unless the conductor is possessed of enormous authority of presence and temperament. While he is a sincere and conscientious musician, Mr. Golschmann does not give evidence of such authority.

In general, the orchestra played well for him, but it did not seem that he was often in firm control of the players. Indeed, the final chords of Overture and Brahms' Fourth Symphony had ended while his right hand still was in the air. There were some uneasy places, notably at bar 88 in the slow movement of Brahms, where string matters went perilously bad for a few moments. The orchestral sonority ranged from rich and velvety to piercing intensity of strings and brass.

In both "La Mer" and the Symphony, only the outer design, the leading voices, the general mood were perceptible. Many details, rhythmic and of subsidiary instrumental parts, were lost. Now, "La Mer," while beguiling enough on the surface, have that powerful ground swell which is the music. To be candid, the program came off with an [illegible] able impression of superficiality.

Mr. Golschmann [illegible] him a score new to the United States, Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra. The five movements are an alternation of slow and fast, soft and loud, with a fascinating harmonic scheme. There is some conservatism in the respect, but a good deal more piquant and finely-calculated sonance, with a little strange distilled from the 12-tone [illegible]. It would be helpful to hear the score again; this performance not establish it, even though of decided individuality.

The Friday subscribers gave Mr. Golschmann, the Orchestra and the music-making warm courteous applause.

Next week Charles Munch [illegible] return. He will present Honegger's Second Symphony, for strings; the solo Cantata of Bach, "Now, Ye Winter Shadows," better known as the "Wedding Cantata," three songs from Hindemith's "The Marienleben," and the "Daphnis and Ariane" Suite No. 2 of Ravel. Irmgard Seefried, soprano, will be soloist.

Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758

NOV 27 1956

Symphony Officials Discover Coincidence

BOSTON, Nov. 26 (AP) Boston Symphony officials discovered an odd coincidence today in the program for the orchestra's Dec. 4 concert at Providence, R. I.

Music director Charles Munch arranged the program at least a week before last Friday's airliner crash near Paris in which conductor Guido Cantelli, protege of Arturo Toscanini, was killed.

But two of the three numbers on the program are works that Cantelli conducted at Providence during [illegible] and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1955, while making his debut with the Boston orchestra. The following season, on March 30, 1954 he played Brahms' First Symphony.

A Symphony spokesman said the coincidence would make the Dec. 4 concert in a sense a memorial to Cantelli though it was not so intended.

TIGHT BINDING

160

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

NOV 24 1956

Golschmann Guest at Symphony

Tansman Concerto in American Première

By Harold Rogers

An orchestra such as the Boston Symphony is a sensitive, responsive instrument, much like a mirror in that it reflects the personality of the conductor standing before it.

It is, in another sense, like a superb grand piano that stands waiting for a performer's touch. If played by a beginner, this piano can annoy the neighborhood; but if played by a master, the heavens open.

In a different way, however, an orchestra is not like a piano. The Boston Symphony at present is composed of 103 musicians, most of whom have played together for many years. They have attained a certain basic style that a succession of guest conductors could not impair over night.

It is nevertheless astonishing what a change can take place when a guest conductor mounts the podium. These 103 men surrender their individualities in order to function as one under the guidance of the conductor, whoever he may be. They fuse into a gigantic musical mirror, and they give a reflection of the musical mind in command.

* * *

The basic style of the Boston Symphony was still in evidence yesterday afternoon when Vladimir Golschmann appeared in Symphony Hall as guest conductor. By and large, however, it sounded like another orchestra—an ensemble almost devoid of nuance, scintillation, and refinement.

In such a case there is but one conclusion to be drawn. The fault was Dr. Golschmann's. Music must first be submitted to a refining process in the conductor's heart, if it is to come forth as refinement in sound—even if the orchestra itself is among the most polished ensembles in the world.

Dr. Golschmann chose a program that had its winning aspects, however, in spite of certain crudities of sound. The opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon"—frenetic, jovial, and virtuosic in its appeal—was struck off in a dashing manner that was entertaining and stimulating.

So, too, was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, heard in its United States première. Its five short movements—played with pause but without distinct interruption — contain brilliant patches of tonal display recalling—at least in technique—the Bartók Concerto for Orchestra.

But the emotional effect is not the same. There are shimmering subtleties—in the Presto, especially, filled with insect rustlings and bird calls—but Tansman's are not rarefied to the degree of Bartók's.

* * *

In Debussy's "La Mer" Dr. Golschmann unfortunately placed himself in competition with the Boston Symphony's regular conductor. We have heard "La Mer" many times during Charles Munch's tenure, and it is one of the best things he does. The difference, again, comes under the main point of this discussion. Yesterday's "La Mer" needed more subtlety.

Dr. Golschmann closed with a performance of the Brahms Fourth that reduced this listener to a state of righteous indignation. With the exception of several pleasing passages in the Andante, the symphony was aggressively bombastic.

At one point the violins rode off in two separate paths, owing to the uncertainty of the conductor's directions. A more embarrassing faux pas occurred at the end. Perhaps Dr. Golschmann thought he had an extra beat or two in the final chord. Whatever the lapse, the music came to a shy conclusion while his arms were still raised. His cut-off signal followed, but silence already prevailed.

MUSIC TRADE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 1956

Leslie J. Rogers

Leslie J. Rogers, 63, of Brookline, Mass., music librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 44 years, died at the United States Army Hospital Oct. 11 in Stuttgart, Germany. He was stricken with pneumonia Sept. 13, near the close of the orchestra's recent European tour. Mr. Rogers joined the Boston Symphony in 1912 and was the senior member in point of service, as well as the dean of music librarians among the major symphonies in the United States. He served under five conductors: Dr. Karl Muck, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, and incumbent Dr. Charles Munch.

Survivors include his wife, Mrs. Helen Bond Stenger Rogers; a daughter, Mrs. Phyllis McCleary; and his mother, Mrs. Cora P. Howe.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

NOV 29 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

Editor's Note: The review below is by Uri Haber-Schaim. Mr. Haber-Schaim, an accomplished musician, is at present a member of the faculty at MIT.

GOLSCHMANN CONDUCTS BSO

The sixth subscription concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Saturday, November 24, with Vladimir Golschmann conducting. The program consisted of the Overture to "Colas Breugnon" by Kabalevsky, Concerto for Tausman, "La Mer" by Debussy and after the intermission, Brahms fourth symphony.

The combination of the first three compositions seemed to me somewhat unfortunate, particularly in view of the fact that they were played with pauses barely long enough for the applause to die out. It is true that it said on the program that the concert would end at 10:20 p.m., but this could be changed to 10:30 p.m. thus giving the audience a chance to prepare itself mentally for each composition.

The BSO is well known for its tradition of bringing to the public the music of contemporary composers; in this case—Tausman's Concerto for Orchestra which was composed about a year ago. This is the first time that I heard a composition by Mr. Tausman and I shall, therefore, limit myself to some general impressions. The Concerto opens in dark and quiet colors which lead to a rather strange second movement. The sounds of this movement reminded me of the noise of an assembly line, but if listened to with some humor were more funny than unpleasant. From there on, the third, fourth and fifth movements were quite beautiful, showing clearly that Mr. Tausman is not only a master of orchestration but a composer with a distinct sense for rhythm and color.

In Tausman's Concerto Mr. Golschmann did very well with a few tone colors. For Debussy he needed the full spectrum. With the BSO at his service he could have obtained anything he wanted. Apparently he did not ask for it and the result was a rather dull and pale 'La Mer."

Brahm's fourth symphony is undoubtedly one of the greatest symphonies in the entire literature. We may ask ourselves why is this so? It seems to me that one can answer this question by observing that the symphony consists of several motifs, each of which is not only beautiful by itself, but developed and woven into one great structure. Hence when one comes to perform this symphony, attention has to be paid to the presentation (or phrasing in more professional language) of the individual motifs and to their relations to each other. This was almost lacking last Saturday in the first three movements. They sounded like the recitation of a drama without paying attention to stops, exclamation marks and sometimes even the contents. The last movement was much better in this respect and so the concert ended on a more satisfying note.

* * *

Editor's Note: The review below is by Dr. Ezra Lambdin.

SECOND EARLY MUSIC CONCERT

For those loyal supporters of the Cambridge Society for Early Music who perhaps felt their musical sensibilities bludgeoned into dullness by a surfeit of Telemann offered at the first concert, the variety afforded by the program on Monday evening must have been especially welcome. One is grateful to Erwin Bodky, admiration for whose musicianship steadily grows, for so broad a definition of the Baroque that permitted inclusion of Monteverdi's "Zefiro Torna," a duet for tenors employing the "ciacona" form and a splendid example of early Italian bel-canto.

Samuel Mayes, who was regrettably relegated to the role of continuo for most of the program, provided the treat of the evening in a superbly tasteful performance of the Marcello Sonata in G minor for cello. Miss Posselt was heard in rather spirited renditions of the D major violin sonata of Corelli and the E major sonata of Tartini. She was also joined by Mr. Burgin in sonatas by Vivaldi and Albinoni. Russell Oberlin, billed as a counter-tenor, sang, in addition to the Monteverdi numbers (with Charles Bressler, listed merely as a tenor), Alessandro Scarlatti's solo cantata "Pensieri" and displayed a vocal quality strange, lovely and all-too-rarely heard.

The program of music by masters of the Italian Baroque presented relatively unknown works by these relatively well-known composers; but conditioned by the steady stream of visits here of a host of Italian string-chamber groups, repertories bulging with the Baroque, even the unfamiliar succeeds in stimulating a welcome sort of auditory "deje vue" phenomenon, rendering listening and appreciation that much easier.

If one be permitted to cavil, it is only at Mr. Bodky's harpsichord, which looks so impressive, but yields a tone disturbingly dull, damped and dead.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 24 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Golschmann Guest Conductor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the sixth program of the Friday-Saturday series. Vladimir Golschmann, as guest, conducted: Kabalevsky: Overture to "Colas Breugnon"; Alexandre Tansman: Concerto for Orchestra (first time in the United States); Debussy: "La Mer"; Brahms: Symphony in E minor, No. 4.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, is guest leader of the Boston Symphony concerts this week, his first such visit since 1944. Although become a little grayer since then—along with all the rest of us—Mr. Golschmann impressed yesterday much as I remembered him to have done a dozen years ago.

That is to say, he is a conductor of a certain competence, modest in manner, elegant of gestures, at his best in such a light and bubbling short score as Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon" Overture. It takes a while to make headway in commanding a strange orchestra unless the conductor is possessed of enormous authority of presence and temperament. While he is a sincere and conscientious musician, Mr. Golschmann does not give evidence of such authority.

In general, the orchestra played well for him, but it did not seem that he was often in firm control of the players. Indeed, the final chords of Overture and Brahms' Fourth Symphony had ended while his right hand still was in the air. There were some uneasy places notably at bar 88 in the slow movement of Brahms, where string matters went perilously bad for a few moments. The orchestral sonority ranged from rich and velvety to piercing intensity of strings and brass.

In both "La Mer" and the Symphony, only the outer design, the leading voices, the general mood were perceptible. Many details, rhythmic and of subsidiary instrumental parts, were lost. Nor did "La Mer," while beguiling enough on the surface, have that powerful ground swell which is in the music. To be candid, the whole program came off with an unmistakable impression of superficiality.

Mr. Golschmann brought with him a score new to the United States, Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra. The five movements are an alternation of slow and fast, soft and loud, all in a fascinating harmonic scheme. There is some conservatism in this respect, but a good deal more of elegant and finely-calculated nuance, with a little strong meat distilled from the 12-tone system. It would be helpful to hear the score again; this performance did not establish it, even roughly, as of decided individuality.

The Friday subscribers greeted Mr. Golschmann, the Orchestra and the music-making with enough applause.

Next week Charles Munch will conduct. He will present Honegger's Second Symphony, for strings; the solo Cantata of Bach, "Tarnish Now, Ye Winter Shadows," better known as the "Wedding Cantata"; three songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben," and the "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 of Roussel. [illegible] Seefried, soprano, will be the [illegible].

Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Independent Republican
Circ. 49,758

NOV 27 1956

Symphony Officials Discover Coincidence

BOSTON, Nov. 26 (AP) Boston Symphony officials discovered an odd coincidence today in the program for the orchestra's Dec. 4 concert at Providence, R. I.

Music director Charles Munch arranged the program at least a week before last Friday's airliner crash near Paris in which conductor Guido Cantelli, protege of Arturo Toscanini, was killed.

But two of the three numbers on the program are works that Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953, while making his debut with the Boston orchestra. The following season, on March 30, 1954 he played Brahms' First Symphony.

A Symphony spokesman said the coincidence would make the Dec. 4 concert in a sense a memorial to Cantelli though it was not so intended.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 24 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann [illegible] gave its sixth program of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Overture to "Colas Breugnon" ..... Kabalevsky
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok
La Mer ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Vladimir Golschmann, not having appeared to change at all save in the direction of more distinction, returned to Boston to lead the orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was his first visit in some 12 years, during which his authority as a leader of the most incisive gesture and clarity of beat obviously has developed to a high degree of perfection.

Mr. Golschmann, for 25 years conductor of the St. Louis Symphony, conducts crisply and in a straightforward style. His mannerisms are inclined to be angular, but he seeks out nuance in every phrase and achieves balance at all times in a masterly fashion. What he may want as a virtuoso conductor in incandescence, so to speak: the orchestra follows him with security and responds in solid musical craftsmanship, and all is neat and tdy and often forceful (though it must be reported there was a shaky moment in the Brahms and, curiously enough, the conductor signalled for a nonexistent chord at the very end). But for some reason or other it didn't soar as it might have. To be sure it is not easy for an orchestra to soar in such endlessly repeated works as "La Mer" and Brahms' Fourth, but it did seem the works might have made more contact than they did.

First Performance

This was the occasion of the first American performance of what seemed to me the most interesting new score of the season. It was Alexander Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, a work informed with enormous musical ingenuity without eccentricity, lyrical intensity without emotional excess and a very powerful harmonic idiom without extravagant dissonance for its own sake. In seven contrasted movements played without interruption, its scheme is slow, fast, slow, fast and so on and it seems to have been conceived largely for strings. That is to say while the other instruments do have essential roles and contribute to the interesting sounds and textures displayed throughout, the strings in a wide variety of divisions made the musical fabric.

The first lento sets the mood at once in a strongly personal utterance touched with melancholy. There follows a wild, turbulent and exciting allegro, again a lento in long-flowing lines of beautiful texture largely involving the strings, then a whirring scherzo-like section as light and as supple as the Queen Mab scherzo of Berlioz. All in all, I found it absorbing from beginning to end as it exploited, in concerto fashion, the individuality of the players almost from man to man rather than as a body. Curiously enough, it wasn't terribly well received. Not that new music often attains an ovation at these concerts, but infinitely less attractive new pieces have attained more popular support than this work, which clearly reveals the presence of a bold, original and highly musical mind.

Brassy, Exuberant

Just as it is 12 years since Mr. Golschmann has led this orchestra, it is 12 since we have heard Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon." It is a bright, brassy, exuberant essay of no great quality as a concert piece but entertaining and certainly worthy of an occasional dusting off. It might be interesting some day to hear the other three concert numbers the composer derived from the opera score, their titles alone picquing the curiosity. They are: "People's Rebellion," "People's Calamity" and "People's Festival." Since the opera, whose central figure approaches all of life's problems with laughter, is laid in 16th century Burgundy, it would be amusing to see how Mr. Kabalevsky hews to the party line.

Save for a couple of minor matters the Brahms went very well in the conductor's straightforward conception of the work, while the Debussy was equally well played, though neither, as indicated above, took flight. Conceding, of course, that there are always new members of the audience who may not know these works in in-person performance, it does seem ill advised, to say the least, to continue these top-flight repetitions, often less than a year apart.

Mr. Munch returns next week with Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist in Bach's Wedding Cantata and songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben," Honegger's Second Symphony and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" round out the program.

Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628

NOV 30 1956

Hub Christmas Festival Will Be Opened Today

The seventh annual City of Boston Christmas Festival will be opened today at City Hall Plaza at 4 p.m. with ceremonies to be climaxed by the lighting of the city's Advent Wreath by Mayor Hynes, while Christmas lights will be lit on the Common and Public Garden at 7 p. m.

The Advent Wreath ceremonies will include a concert of hymns and carols by several hundred voices of the armed forces. Directing will be Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A prayer for world peace will be given by the Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., of Budapest, Hungary. Also [illegible] will be a tribute by Mayor Hynes for the aspirations of the United Nations.

Chairman Harry J. Blake of the Christmas Festival Committee will preside at the Common-Public Garden features.

Festival Director Paul Hines said there would be a number of new features in this year's celebration.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 27 1956

Memorial to Cantelli Is Seen In Boston Symphony Concert

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on Dec. 4 will, in a sense, be a memorial to Guido Cantelli, who was to have conducted it, but who was killed in last Friday's airliner crash near Paris.

Although the program was arranged a week before the crash, it will include two numbers Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953 while making his debut with the Boston Symphony. The following season, on March 30, 1954, he played Brahm's First Symphony.

Both of these numbers were selected by Director Charles Munch for the Providence concert a week before the crash.

Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 146,283

NOV 27 1956

Cantelli to Have Led Hub Symphony Here

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence on Dec. 4 will include two numbers directed here on past occasions by Guido Cantelli.

Mr. Cantelli, who was killed in the crash of an Italian airliner last week, was to have conducted the orchestra in the December concert. The numbers to be played again are the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" and Brahm's First Symphony.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 30 1956

Hub Opens Christmas Fete Today

Boston's seventh annual Christmas Festival, more resplendent than ever, will start at 4 p.m. today with Advent Wreath ceremonies at City Hall Plaza.

Mayor Hynes will light the first candle on the huge wreath above the main door. At 7 o'clock, he will throw another switch and thousands of Yule lights will blaze brilliantly on Boston Common and the Public Garden heralding the inaugural of the holy joyous season.

At the City Hall festivities, Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct a choir of several hundred members of the Armed Forces in a program of Christmas carols with John Kiley, organ accompanist. Festival chairman Harry J. Blake will be master of ceremonies.

FESTIVAL

Page Ten

Today's Festival Events

4 P.M.—Advent Wreath ceremonies, City Hall Plaza. Dr. Charles Munch conducting the choir.

7 P.M.—Lighting of Nativity Scene, Boston Common. Proparvulis Glee Club.

[illegible] ene on Boston Common. [illegible] scores of others, live and [illegible] remonies at 9 tonight.

A note of solemnity will be given the occasion by Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., lately of Budapest, in a prayer for peace and safe refuge for the thousands of oppressed Hungarians fleeing the Russians.

A number of new features have been added to the displays on the Common, among them a heroic sized figure of "Christ on the Mount."

The Madonna and Child display will be seen on a lighted [illegible] and in the Public Garden pool [illegible] characters from Dickens in [illegible] er parts of the Garden.

Featured on the Common will be an 84-foot Christmas tree adorned with 4000 lights and surrounded by the Nativity scene, Santa's Workshop with eight live, white reindeer, a flock of sheep, rabbits, raccoons, goats, donkeys and other native animals.

An organ recital at the Christmas Chapel on the Common and a program of carols by the Proparvulis Glee Club is scheduled for 7 o'clock tonight.

Afternoon and evening concerts will be given daily on the Common. Weekday programs will be from noon to 2 p.m. and from 7 to 9 p.m. Sunday programs will be presented from 2 to 4 and 7 to 9 p.m.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 3,048

NOV 27 1956

Concert Program Like Memorial To Cantelli

BOSTON, Nov. 26 (AP)—Boston Symphony officials discovered an odd coincidence today in the program for the orchestra's Dec. 4 concert at Providence, R. I.

Music director Charles Munch arranged the program at least a week before last Friday's airliner crash near Paris in which conductor Guido Cantelli, protege of Arturo Toscanini, was killed.

But two of the three numbers on the program are works that Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953, while making his debut with the Boston Orchestra. The following season, on March 30, 1954, he played Brahms' First Symphony.

A symphony spokesman said the coincidence would make the Dec. 4 concert in a sense a memorial to Cantelli though it was not so intended.

International Press-Cutting Bureau
184, Strand, London, W.C.2.

Extract from
Daily Telegraph, London
1956 24 NOV 195

Wagner for the Wagnerite

THE committee of the Wagner Society has circularised its members with a questionnaire in order to discover something of the state of public opinion on the policy pursued with regard to Wagner at Covent Garden.

The questions asked relate to the coming performance of "The Mastersingers," and are therefore of academic rather than immediate practical interest. A large majority voted as a matter of principle for a "star" cast (at increased prices), singing in German. Perhaps a Wagner Society could hardly do less.

The result of the poll was sent to the General Administrator. He replied that he "very much doubted if the cast that we shall put up for 'Meistersinger' will be in any way inferior to a cast that would consist of a certain number of well-known names." Stars, he added, were sometimes no more than singers who "had the luck to be born in Germany," and "Meistersinger" is in fact "not a star opera, but an ensemble work which needs the kind of rehearsal that can in fact only come from the conditions that surround resident artists."

* * *

Sir William Walton's new cello concerto will have its first performance on Dec. 7 at Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch. The soloist will be Piatigorsky, who commissioned the work and will also play it at the Royal Philharmonic Society's Festival Hall concert on Feb. 13, with the B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra under Sir Malcolm Sargent.

* * *

In Brief: President Eisenhower sent a letter to the Boston Symphony congratulating the orchestra on its fulfillment of a successful mission in Europe. Bravo for our musical ambassadors-at-large! The tour, from Aug. 23 to Sept. 28, included 19 cities in 13 countries. The Symphony opened its 76th season in Boston on Oct. 5. . . . The Brooklyn Philharmonia opens its third season at the Academy of Music,

MUSICAL LEADER November

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 24 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann conducting, gave its sixth program of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Overture to "Colas Breugnon" ..... Kabalevsky
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok
La Mer ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 28 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Vladimir Golschmann, not having appeared to change at all save in the direction of more distinction, returned to Boston to lead the orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was his first visit in some 12 years, during which his authority as a leader of the most incisive gesture and clarity of beat obviously has developed to a high degree of perfection.

Mr. Golschmann, for 25 years conductor of the St. Louis Symphony, conducts crisply and in a straightforward style. His mannerisms are inclined to be angular, but he seeks out nuance in every phrase and achieves balance at all times in a masterly fashion. What he may want as a virtuoso conductor is incandescence, so to speak: the orchestra follows him with security and responds in solid musical craftsmanship, and all is neat and tdy and often forceful (though it must be reported there was a shaky moment in the Brahms and, curiously enough, the conductor signalled for a nonexistent chord at the very end). But for some reason or other it didn't soar as it might have. To be sure it is not easy for an orchestra to soar in such endlessly repeated works as "La Mer" and Brahms' Fourth, but it did seem the works might have made more contact than they did.

First Performance

This was the occasion of the first American performance of what seemed to me the most interesting new score of the season. It was Alexander Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, a work informed with enormous musical ingenuity without eccentricity, lyrical intensity without emotional excess and a very powerful harmonic idiom without extravagant dissonance for its own sake. In seven contrasted movements played without interruption, its scheme is slow, fast, slow, fast and so on and it seems to have been conceived largely for strings. That is to say while the other instruments do have essential roles and contribute to the interesting sounds and textures displayed throughout, the strings in a wide variety of divisions made the musical fabric.

The first lento sets the mood at once in a strongly personal utterance touched with melancholy. There follows a wild, turbulent and exciting allegro. Again a lento in long-flowing lines of beautiful texture largely involving the strings, then a whirring scherzo-like section as light and as supple as the Queen Mab scherzo of Berlioz. All in all, I found it absorbing from beginning to end as it exploited, in concerto fashion, the individuality of the players almost from man to man rather than as a body. Curiously enough, it wasn't terribly well received. Not that new music often attains an ovation at these concerts, but infinitely less attractive new pieces have attained more popular support than this work, which clearly reveals the presence of a bold, original and highly musical mind.

Brassy, Exuberant

Just as it is 12 years since Mr. Golschmann has led this orchestra, it is 12 since we have heard Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon." It is a bright, brassy, exuberant essay of no great quality as a concert piece but entertaining and certainly worthy of an occasional dusting off. It might be interesting some day to hear the other three concert numbers the composer derived from the opera score, their titles alone picquing the curiosity. They are: "People's Rebellion," "People's Calamity" and "People's Festival." Since the opera, whose central figure approaches all of life's problems with laughter, is laid in 16th century Burgundy, it would be amusing to see how Mr. Kabalevsky hews to the party line.

Save for a couple of minor matters, the Brahms went very well in the conductor's straightforward conception of the work, while the Debussy was equally well played, though neither, as indicated above, took flight. Conceding, of course, that there are always new members of the audience who may not know these works in in-person performance, it does seem ill advised, to say the least, to continue these top-flight repetitions, often less than a year apart.

Mr. Munch returns next week with Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist in Bach's Wedding Cantata and songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben." Honegger's Second Symphony and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" round out the program.

Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628

NOV 30 1956

Hub Christmas Festival Will Be Opened Today

The seventh annual City of Boston Christmas Festival will be opened today at City Hall Plaza at 4 p. m. with ceremonies to be climaxed by the lighting of the city's Advent Wreath by Mayor Hynes, while Christmas lights will be lit on the Common and Public Garden at 7 p. m.

The Advent Wreath ceremonies will include a concert of hymns and carols by several hundred voices of the armed forces. Directing will be Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A prayer for world peace will be given by the Rev. Zeho Vendler, S. J., of Budapest, Hungary. Also there will be a tribute by Mayor Hynes for the aspirations of the United Nations.

Chairman Harry J. Blake of the Christmas Festival Committee will preside at the Common-Public Garden features.

Festival Director Paul Hines said there would be a number of new features in this year's celebration.

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 27 1956

Memorial to Cantelli Is Seen In Boston Symphony Concert

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on Dec. 4 will, in a sense, be a memorial to Guido Cantelli, who was to have conducted it, but who was killed in last Friday's airliner crash near Paris.

Although the program was arranged a week before the crash, it will include two numbers Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953 while making his debut with the Boston Symphony. The following season, on March 30, 1954, he played Brahm's First Symphony.

Both of these numbers were selected by Director Charles Munch for the Providence concert a week before the crash.

Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 146,283

NOV 27 1956

Cantelli to Have Led Hub Symphony Here

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence on Dec. 4 will include two numbers directed here on past occasions by Guido Cantelli.

Mr. Cantelli, who was killed in the crash of an Italian airliner last week, was to have conducted the orchestra in the December concert. The numbers to be played again are the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" and Brahm's First Symphony.

Eagle (m)
LAWRENCE, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 3,048

NOV 27 1956

Concert Program Like Memorial To Cantelli

BOSTON, Nov. 26 (AP)—Boston Symphony officials discovered an odd coincidence today in the program for the orchestra's Dec. 4 concert at Providence, R. I.

Music director Charles Munch arranged the program at least a week before last Friday's airliner crash near Paris in which conductor Guido Cantelli, protege of Arturo Toscanini, was killed.

But two of the three numbers on the program are works that Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953, while making his debut with the Boston Orchestra. The following season, on March 30, 1954, he played Brahms' First Symphony.

A symphony spokesman said the coincidence would make the Dec. 4 concert in a sense a memorial to Cantelli though it was not so intended.

INTERNATIONAL PRESS-CUTTING BUREAU
184, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.2.

Extract from
Daily Telegraph, London

1956 24 NOV 1956

Wagner for the Wagnerite

THE committee of the Wagner Society has circularised its members with a questionnaire in order to discover something of the state of public opinion on the policy pursued with regard to Wagner at Covent Garden.

The questions asked relate to the coming performance of "The Mastersingers," and are therefore of academic rather than immediate practical interest. A large majority voted as a matter of principle for a "star" cast (at increased prices), singing in German. Perhaps a Wagner Society could hardly do less.

The result of the poll was sent to the General Administrator. He replied that he "very much doubted if the cast that we shall put up for 'Meistersinger' will be in any way inferior to a cast that would consist of a certain number of well-known names." Stars, he added, were sometimes no more than singers who "had the luck to be born in Germany," and "Meistersinger" is in fact "not a star opera, but an ensemble work which needs the kind of rehearsal that can in fact only come from the conditions that surround resident artists."

* * *

Sir William Walton's new cello concerto will have its first performance on Dec. 7 at Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch. The soloist will be Piatigorsky, who commissioned the work and will also play it at the Royal Philharmonic Society's Festival Hall concert on Feb. 13, with the B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, under Sir Malcolm Sargent.

* * *

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

NOV 30 1956

Hub Opens Christmas Fete Today

Boston's seventh annual Christmas Festival, more resplendent than ever, will start at 4 p.m. today with Advent Wreath ceremonies at City Hall Plaza.

Mayor Hynes will light the first candle on the huge wreath above the main door. At 7 o'clock, he will throw another switch and thousands of Yule lights will blaze brilliantly on Boston Common and the Public Garden heralding the inaugural of the holy joyous season.

At the City Hall festivities, Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct a choir of several hundred members of the Armed Forces in a program of Christmas carols with John Kiley, organ accompanist. Festival chairman Harry J. Blake will be master of ceremonies.

FESTIVAL
Page Ten

Today's Festival Events

4 P.M.—Advent Wreath ceremonies, City Hall Plaza. Dr. Charles Munch conducting the choir.

7 P.M.—Lighting of Nativity Scene, Boston Common. Proparvulis Glee Club.

A note of solemnity will be given the occasion by Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., lately of Budapest, in a prayer for peace and safe refuge for the thousands of oppressed Hungarians fleeing the Russians.

A number of new features have been added to the displays on the Common, among them a heroic sized figure of "Christ on the Mount."

The Madonna and Child display will be seen on a lighted scene on Boston Common. [illegible] scores of others, live and [illegible] ceremonies at 7 tonight.

[illegible] and in the Public Garden pool [illegible] characters from Dickens in [illegible] parts of the Garden.

Featured on the Common will be an 84-foot Christmas tree adorned with 4000 lights and surrounded by the Nativity scene, Santa's Workshop with eight live, white reindeer, a flock of sheep, rabbits, raccoons, goats, donkeys and other native animals.

An organ recital at the Christmas Chapel on the Common and a program of carols by the Proparvulis Glee Club is scheduled for 7 o'clock tonight.

Afternoon and evening concerts will be given daily on the Common. Weekday programs will be from noon to 2 p.m. and from 7 to 9 p.m. Sunday programs will be presented from 2 to 4 and 7 to 9 p.m.

In Brief: President Eisenhower sent a letter to the Boston Symphony congratulating the orchestra on its fulfillment of a successful mission in Europe. Bravo for our musical ambassadors-at-large! The tour, from Aug. 23 to Sept. 28, included 19 cities in 13 countries. The Symphony opened its 76th season in Boston on Oct. 5. . . . The Brooklyn Philharmonia opens its third season at the Academy of Music,

MUSICAL LEADER November

New England Newspaper Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

NOV 24 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann conducting, gave its sixth program of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Overture to "Colas Breugnon" ..... Kabalevsky
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok
La Mer ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Vladimir Golschmann, not having appeared to change at all save in the direction of more distinction, returned to Boston to lead the orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was his first visit in some 12 years, during which his authority as a leader of the most incisive gesture and clarity of beat obviously has developed to a high degree of perfection.

Mr. Golschmann, for 25 years conductor of the St. Louis Symphony, conducts crisply and in a straightforward style. His mannerisms are inclined to be angular, but he seeks out nuance in every phrase and achieves balance at all times in a masterly fashion. What he may want as a virtuoso conductor is incandescence, so to speak: the orchestra follows him with security and responds in solid musical craftsmanship, and all is neat and tdy and often forceful (though it must be reported there was a shaky moment in the Brahms and, curiously enough, the conductor signalled for a nonexistent chord at the very end). But for some reason or other it didn't soar as it might have. To be sure it is not easy for an orchestra to soar in such endlessly repeated works as "La Mer" and Brahms' Fourth, but it did seem the works might have made more contact than they did.

First Performance

This was the occasion of the first American performance of what seemed to me the most interesting new score of the season. It was Alexander Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, a work informed with enormous musical ingenuity without eccentricity, lyrical intensity without emotional excess and a very powerful harmonic idiom without extravagant dissonance for its own sake. In seven contrasted movements played without interruption, its scheme is slow, fast, slow, fast and so on and it seems to have been conceived largely for strings. That is to say while the other instruments do have essential roles and contribute to the interesting sounds and textures displayed throughout, the strings in a wide variety of divisions made the musical fabric.

The first lento sets the mood at once in a strongly personal utterance touched with melancholy. There follows a wild, turbulent and exciting allegro. Again a lento in long-flowing lines of beautiful texture largely involving the strings, then a whirring scherzo-like section as light and as supple as the Queen Mab scherzo of Berlioz. All in all, I found it absorbing from beginning to end as it exploited, in concerto fashion, the individuality of the players almost from man to man rather than as a body. Curiously enough, it wasn't terribly well received. Not that new music often attains an ovation at these concerts, but infinitely less attractive new pieces have attained more popular support than this work, which clearly reveals the presence of a bold, original and highly musical mind.

Brassy, Exuberant

Just as it is 12 years since Mr. Golschmann has led this orchestra, it is 12 since we have heard Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon." It is a bright, brassy, exuberant essay of no great quality as a concert piece but entertaining and certainly worthy of an occasional dusting off. It might be interesting some day to hear the other three concert numbers the composer derived from the opera score, their titles alone picquing the curiosity. They are: "People's Rebellion," "People's Calamity" and "People's Festival." Since the opera, whose central figure approaches all of life's problems with laughter, is laid in 16th century Burgundy, it would be amusing to see how Mr. Kabalevsky hews to the party line.

Save for a couple of minor matters, the Brahms went very well in the conductor's straightforward conception of the work, while the Debussy was equally well played, though neither, as indicated above, took flight. Conceding, of course, that there are always new members of the audience who may not know these works in in-person performance, it does seem ill advised, to say the least, to continue these top-flight repetitions, often less than a year apart.

Mr. Munch returns next week with Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist in Bach's Wedding Cantata and songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben." Honegger's Second Symphony and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" round out the program.

Record (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 405,628

NOV 30 1956

Hub Christmas Festival Will Be Opened Today

The seventh annual City of Boston Christmas Festival will be opened today at City Hall Plaza at 4 p. m. with ceremonies to be climaxed by the lighting of the city's Advent Wreath by Mayor Hynes, while Christmas lights will be lit on the Common and Public Garden at 7 p. m.

The Advent Wreath ceremonies will include a concert of hymns and carols by several hundred voices of the armed forces. Directing will be Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A prayer for world peace will be given by the Rev. Zeho Vendler, S. J., of Budapest, Hungary. Also there will be a tribute by Mayor Hynes for the aspirations of the United Nations.

Chairman Harry J. Blake of the Christmas Festival Committee will preside at the Common-Public Garden features.

Festival Director Paul Hines said there would be a number of new features in this year's celebration.

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

NOV 27 1956

Memorial to Cantelli Is Seen In Boston Symphony Concert

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on Dec. 4 will, in a sense, be a memorial to Guido Cantelli, who was to have conducted it, but who was killed in last Friday's airliner crash near Paris.

Although the program was arranged a week before the crash, it will include two numbers [illegible] for the Providence con[illegible] week before the crash.

[illegible] past occasions by Guido [illegible]li.

Cantelli, who was killed [illegible] crash of an Italian air[illegible] last week, was to have [illegible]cted the orchestra in the [illegible]nber concert. The numbers [illegible] played again are the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" and Brahm's First Symphony.

Eagle (m)
LAWRENCE, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 3,048

NOV 27 1956

Concert Program Like Memorial To Cantelli

BOSTON, Nov. 26 (AP)—Boston Symphony officials discovered an odd coincidence today in the program for the orchestra's Dec. 4 concert at Providence, R. I.

Music director Charles Munch arranged the program at least a week before last Friday's airliner crash near Paris in which conductor Guido Cantelli, protege of Arturo Toscanini, was killed.

But two of the three numbers on the program are works that Cantelli conducted at Providence during 1953 and 1954 guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Cantelli played the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game" on Feb. 3, 1953, while making his debut with the Boston Orchestra. The following season, on March 30, 1954, he played Brahms' First Symphony.

A symphony spokesman said the coincidence would make the Dec. 4 concert in a sense a memorial to Cantelli though it was not so intended.

INTERNATIONAL PRESS-CUTTING BUREAU
184, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.2.

Extract from
Daily Telegraph, London

1956 24 NOV

Wagner for the Wagnerite

THE committee of the Wagner Society has circularised its members with a questionnaire in order to discover something of the state of public opinion on the policy pursued with regard to Wagner at Covent Garden.

The questions asked relate to the coming performance of "The Mastersingers," and are therefore of academic rather than immediate practical interest. A large majority voted as a matter of principle for a "star" cast (at increased prices), singing in German. Perhaps a Wagner Society could hardly do less.

The result of the poll was sent to the General Administrator. He replied that he "very much doubted if the cast that we shall put up for 'Meistersinger' will be in any way inferior to a cast that would consist of a certain number of well-known names." Stars, he added, were sometimes no more than singers who "had the luck to be born in Germany," and "Meistersinger" is in fact "not a star opera, but an ensemble work which needs the kind of rehearsal that can in fact only come from the conditions that surround resident artists."

* * *

Sir William Walton's new cello concerto will have its first performance on Dec. 7 at Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch. The soloist will be Piatigorsky, who commissioned the work and will also play it at the Royal Philharmonic Society's Festival Hall concert on Feb. 13, with the B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, under Sir Malcolm Sargent.

* * *

CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL scene on Boston Common. "Joy to the World" tableau and scores of others, live and portrayed, will be lighted at ceremonies at 7 tonight.

FESTIVAL

Continued from the First Page

A note of solemnity will be given the occasion by Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., lately of Budapest, in a prayer for peace and safe refuge for the thousands of oppressed Hungarians fleeing the Russians.

A number of new features have been added to the displays on the Common, among them a heroic sized figure of "Christ on the Mount."

The Madonna and Child display will be seen on a lighted island in the Public Garden pool and characters from Dickens in other parts of the Garden.

Featured on the Common will be an 84-foot Christmas tree adorned with 4000 lights and surrounded by the Nativity scene, Santa's Workshop with eight live, white reindeer, a flock of sheep, rabbits, raccoons, goats, donkeys and other native animals.

An organ recital at the Christmas Chapel on the Common and a program of carols by the Proparvulis Glee Club is scheduled for 7 o'clock tonight.

Afternoon and evening concerts will be given daily on the Common. Weekday programs will be from noon to 2 p.m. and from 7 to 9 p.m. Sunday programs will be presented from 2 to 4 and 7 to 9 p.m.

In Brief: President Eisenhower sent a letter to the Boston Symphony congratulating the orchestra on its fulfillment of a successful mission in Europe. Bravo for our musical ambassadors-at-large! The tour, from Aug. 23 to Sept. 28, included 19 cities in 13 countries. The Symphony opened its 76th season in Boston on Oct. 5. . . . The Brooklyn Philharmonia opens its third season at the Academy of Music,

MUSICAL LEADER
November

TIGHT BINDING

162

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 1 1956

Boston Opens Yule Festival

Advent Wreath, Tree On Common Lighted

Ceremonies marking the opening of the seventh annual Boston Christmas Festival were held at 4:30 p.m. yesterday in front of City Hall before a throng of several hundred persons.

At 7 p.m. Mayor John B. Hynes and festival chairman Harry J. Blake threw a switch to turn on thousands of lights on trees and Christmas scenes on the Common.

Carols Sung

Servicemen from ships and shore installations in Greater Boston sang the traditional carols as the mayor lit the candle in the Advent Wreath.

A special invocation for world

(Continued on Page Three)

val was to help bring the "real message of Christmas—peace on earth to men of good will."

"Even today," he said, "it does bring peace to the hearts of many during the holy Christmas season."

More than 1,000,000 persons are expected to visit th Common displays during the festival. More tahn 100 choral groups and about 4000 vocalists will provide music during the festival season.

Displays include a nativity scene, an enlarged Christmas Chapel, Santa's Playland, lighted trees, and several kinds o animals, including reindeer.

Christmas Festival

l Ceremonies, Tree Lighting Open Boston's

CROWD AT CEREMONIES opening Boston's seventh Christmas Festival included large contingents from the armed forces, at right. John Kiley is at the organ with Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor.

BOSTON'S CHRISTMAS TREE—A giant and gai decorated Christmas tree was lighted on Bos Common yesterday in ceremonies launching th seventh annual Boston Christmas Festival.

RARE HARMONY was heard at the opening of the Christmas Festival yesterday afternoon at City Hall. Mayor Hynes, at left, sings a carol, accompanied by massed bandsmen of armed forces units under the direction of Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 1 1956

Hub Christmas Festival Opened By Carol Singers

The first carol notes of Boston's Christmas Festival were sung yesterday in City Hall Plaza by a massed choir of sailors, airmen and Army gunners from nearby Nike sites.

In the opening ceremony, Mayor Hynes lit the first candle as more than 500 watched. He told them:

"We are trying to bring to people the real message of Christmas — peace on earth, good will toward men."

There was a Christmas zip in the cold air, but a young Hungarian priest, standing before festooned City Hall, reminded the gay cro·vd that Christmas will be different elsewhere.

"Two thousand years after the arrival of Thy Son," prayed Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., recently come from Budapest, "His message is unknown to many, or is wilfully ignored by uncounted millions."

"Large parts of the world are still under the iron rule of the enemies of His Gospel. Let us hope this spirit shall disappear, and His prevail," he said.

FESTIVAL

Page Eleven

Today's Festival Events

Boston Common

Noon—Holy Cross Academy Glee Club.

12:30—John Kiley at the organ.

7 P.M.—Frances Farrell at the organ.

(Globe Photo by Paul J. Connell)

"O COM[illegible] ALL YE FAITHFUL": Mayor Hynes, left, sings [illegible] of Christmas Festival while Dr. Charles Munch, [illegible] Symphony conductor, leads the crowd.

Holy Night Sung

Lt (jg) Robert Detwiler, U.S.N., rendered a solo of "O Holy Night," while sailors from the destroyers Purdy and Beatty and the cruiser Albany, [illegible] background music.

The Air Force personnel came from Hanscom Field, Bedford. The soldiers were from Ft. Banks headquarters and the dozen or more missile [illegible] in the Greater Boston [illegible]

The audience stood quietly as Fr. Vendler gave his invocation for world peace.

The 30-year-old priest referred to the Mid-East crisis when he said:

"Around the very land of His life on earth, peoples face each other in bitter strife and hatred, danger of war, destruction, nay, utter annihilation threatens the nations all over the world.

"We see that the dynasty of tyrants did not die out with Herod. Mass murders did not end with the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem, as we see that day by day more men, women and children are driven by persecution out of their native land to follow the path of the Holy Family to exile and banishment."

Fr. Vendler, who was the last clergyman legally to leave Hungary, comes fom Budapest and is presently studying here.

Light Still Shines

Speaking of the Yuletide spirit, hile thinking of his own coun-y, he said:

"The light of the first Christmas still shining, brighter than ever, m the hearts of the youth of a e people, defying a decade of nwashing and a month of r.

nd, at this light, all nations ood will became united at in sympathy and moral in-ion," he said.

the Festival inaugurated, 0 singing organizations will n from the Christmas on the Common during t three weeks.

will be daily concerts of d sacred music from noon ., and in the evening, 7 day concerts will be from m., and from 7 to 9 p.m. isplays on the Common a heroic-sized figure, the Mount, and in the rden, a Madonna and lay will be seen on a nd in the lagoon.

the youngsters' atten-ta's workshop on the mplete with eight live, eer, a flock of sheep, coon, goats, donkeys native animals.

FESTIVAL

Continued from the First Page

Beside these sober thoughts, the brightness of Boston's Christmas Festival was even stronger.

Dr. Charles Munch, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the carol singing in front of the floodlit Nativity scene.

Hundreds of passersby in the rush hour crowd about 5 o'clock stopped to catch the season's spirit.

The floodlights were dimmed as Mayor Hynes officially launched the great city festival by lighting the candle in an Advent wreath over the front door of City Hall.

Elm Comes Ablaze

Later, at 7 p. m. the large Nativity scene on the Common was unveiled by Festival Chairman Harry J. Blake; Paul H. Hines, director ad Arthur E. English, superintendent of parks.

A large gathering, including many youngsters, was thrilled as the holy drama was lighted.

Then they trooped with the Festival officials to watch the tall and stately elm beside the Frog Pond, covered with blue lights, come ablaze.

Finally the giant 64-foot Christmas tree on the Common, near Tremont and Boylston sts., was lighted, while the Proparvulis Glee Club sang the first hymns from the white chapel.

At the afternoon exercise, John Kiley, noted organist and choirmaster, accompanied the carols on a portable organ.

Mayor Hynes told the gathering that "the Christmas Festival is something that helps make Boston the great home-loving, God-loving city it is."

TIGHT BINDING

162

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 1 1956

Christmas Festival

Ceremonies, Tree Lighting Open Boston's

Boston Opens Yule Festival

Advent Wreath, Tree On Common Lighted

Ceremonies marking the opening of the seventh annual Boston Christmas Festival were held at 4:30 p.m. yesterday in front of City Hall before a throng of several hundred persons.

At 7 p.m. Mayor John B. Hynes and festival chairman Harry J. Blake threw a switch to turn on thousands of lights on trees and Christmas scenes on the Common.

Carols Sung

Servicemen from ships and shore installations in Greater Boston sang the traditional carols as the mayor lit the candle in the Advent Wreath.

A special invocation for world

(Continued on Page Three)

[illegible] parts the purpose of the festival was to help bring the "real message of Christmas—'peace on earth to men of good will.'"

"Even today," he said, "it does bring peace to the hearts of many during the holy Christmas season."

More than 1,000,000 persons are expected to visit th Common displays during the festival. More tahn 100 choral groups and about 4000 vocalists will provide music during the festival season.

Displays include a nativity scene, an enlarged Christmas Chapel, Santa's Playland, lighted trees, and several kinds of animals, including reindeer.

CROWD AT CEREMONIES opening Boston's seventh Christmas Festival included large contingents from the armed forces, at right. John Kiley is at the organ with Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor.

BOSTON'S CHRISTMAS TREE—A giant and gai[illegible] decorated Christmas tree was lighted on [illegible] Common yesterday in ceremonies launching the seventh annual Boston Christmas Festival.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 1 1956

Hub Christmas Festival Opened By Carol Singers

The first carol notes of Boston's Christmas Festival were sung yesterday in City Hall Plaza by a massed choir of sailors, airmen and Army gunners from nearby Nike sites.

In the opening ceremony, Mayor Hynes lit the first candle as more than 500 watched. He told them:

"We are trying to bring to people the real message of Christmas — peace on earth, good will toward men."

There was a Christmas zip in the cold air, but a young Hungarian priest, standing before festooned City Hall, reminded the gay crowd that Christmas will be different elsewhere.

"Two thousand years after the arrival of Thy Son," prayed Rev. Zeho Vendler, S.J., recently come from Budapest, "His message is unknown to many, or is wilfully ignored by uncounted millions."

"Large parts of the world are still under the iron rule of the enemies of His Gospel. Let us hope this spirit shall disappear, and His prevail," he said.

FESTIVAL
Page Eleven

Today's Festival Events

Boston Common

Noon—Holy Cross Academy Glee Club.

12:30—John Kiley at the organ.

7 P.M.—Frances Farrell at the organ.

(Globe Photo by Paul J. Connell)

"O COME, ALL YE FAITHFUL"—Mayor Hynes, left, sings first carol at Christmas Festival while Dr. Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor, leads the crowd.

Holy Night Sung

Lt (jg) Robert Detwiler, U. S. N., rendered a solo of "O Holy Night," while sailors from the destroyers Purdy and Beatty and the cruiser Albany, hummed background music.

The Air Force personnel came from Hanscom Field, Bedford. The soldiers were from Ft. Banks headquarters and the dozen or more missile installations in the Greater Boston area.

The audience stood quietly as Fr. Vendler gave the invocation for world peace.

The 30-year-old priest referred to the Mid-East crisis when he said:

"Around the very land of His life on earth, peoples face each other in bitter strife and hatred, danger of war, destruction, nay, utter annihilation threatens the nations all over the world.

"We see that the dynasty of tyrants did not die out with Herod. Mass murders did not end with the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem, as we see that day by day more men, women and children are driven by persecution out of their native land to follow the path of the Holy Family to exile and banishment."

Fr. Vendler, who was the last clergyman legally to leave Hungary, comes fom Budapest and is presently studying here.

Light Still Shines

Speaking of the Yuletide spirit, while thinking of his own country, he said:

"The light of the first Christmas still shining, brighter than ever in the hearts of the youth of a free people, defying a decade of brainwashing and a month of terror.

And, at this light, all nations of good will became united at [illegible] in sympathy and moral intuition," he said.

[illegible] the Festival inaugurated, [illegible] singing organizations will [illegible] from the Christmas [illegible] on the Common during [illegible] three weeks.

[illegible] will be daily concerts of [illegible] sacred music from noon [illegible], and in the evening, 7 [illegible] day concerts will be from [illegible] m., and from 7 to 9 p.m. [illegible] displays on the Common [illegible] a heroic-sized figure, [illegible] the Mount, and in the [illegible] Garden, a Madonna and [illegible] display will be seen on a [illegible] and in the lagoon.

[illegible] the youngsters' attention [illegible] Santa's workshop on the [illegible] complete with eight live, [illegible] reindeer, a flock of sheep, [illegible] raccoon, goats, donkeys [illegible] native animals.

RARE HARMONY was heard at the opening of the Christmas Festival yesterday afternoon at City Hall. Mayor Hynes, at left, sings a carol, accompanied by massed bandsmen of armed forces units under the direction of Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony.

FESTIVAL

Continued from the First Page

Beside these sober thoughts, the brightness of Boston's Christmas Festival was even stronger.

Dr. Charles Munch, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the carol singing in front of the floodlit Nativity scene.

Hundreds of passersby in the rush hour crowd about 5 o'clock stopped to catch the season's spirit.

The floodlights were dimmed as Mayor Hynes officially launched the great city festival by lighting the candle in an Advent wreath over the front door of City Hall.

Elm Comes Ablaze

Later, at 7 p. m. the large Nativity scene on the Common was unveiled by Festival Chairman Harry J. Blake; Paul H. Hines, director ad Arthur E. English, superintendent of parks.

A large gathering, including many youngsters, was thrilled as the holy drama was lighted.

Then they trooped with the Festival officials to watch the tall and stately elm beside the Frog Pond, covered with blue lights, come ablaze.

Finally the giant 64-foot Christmas tree on the Common, near Tremont and Boylston sts., was lighted, while the Proparvulis Glee Club sang the first hymns from the white chapel.

At the afternoon exercise, John Kiley, noted organist and choirmaster, accompanied the carols on a portable organ.

Mayor Hynes told the gathering that "the Christmas Festival is something that helps make Boston the great home-loving, God-loving city it is."

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 1 1956

BOSTON SYMP[illegible]

Seefried S[illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, music d[illegible] gave yesterday afternoon, an[illegible] repeat tonight in Symphony Ha[illegible] seventh program in the Friday [illegible] urday series. Irmgard Seefried [illegible] soprano soloist. Vivaldi: Largo [illegible] the Concerto in D minor, Op. [illegible] 11 (in memory of Guido Ca[illegible]); Honegger: Symphony No. 202[illegible] "Wedding" Cantata; Bloch: [illegible] time at these concerts, the cycle [illegible] Three Suites from the [illegible] Life of Mary (first time at [illegible] concerts); Roussel: Suite No. 2, "Bacchus [illegible] Ariane."

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned [illegible] conductor's stand of the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra yest[illegible] and all is now well with [illegible] institution. Since he is a [illegible] master, both of his art and [illegible] musicians (unlike last [illegible] guest!), everything yesterday [illegible] a marvel of tonal richness, [illegible] tant finesse and interpretiv[illegible] quence.

Very properly Mr. Munch [illegible] orialized the recent and [illegible] death of his young col[illegible] Guido Cantelli, by insertin[illegible] Vivaldi Largo at the beg[illegible] of the concert. It was a [illegible] and moving performance [illegible] under the circumstances [illegible] perceptibly increased pat[illegible] fitting tribute to the youn[illegible] ductor who had made ma[illegible] mirers in Boston by his [illegible] appearances with the Orc[illegible] Luckily, too, there were [illegible] thoughtless people who bu[illegible] applause when the numb[illegible] finished.

What a joy it was to hea[illegible] the beautiful voice and sup[illegible] of Irmgard Seefried! He[illegible] true musician with a s[illegible] instrument. In Bach and in [illegible] mith she sang with sherri[illegible] and style, and in the [illegible] especially, she sang with [illegible] markable freshness and [illegible] sive appeal that, I do

TIGHT BINDING

162

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
DEC 1 1956

Christmas Festival

City Hall Ceremonies, Tree Lighting Open Boston's

(Continued from First Page)

peace was read by Father Zeho Vendler, S.J., the last clergyman to leave Hungary legally.

He told the crowd that the dynasty of tyrants did not die with Herod nor mass murder end with the slaughter of the infants of Bethlehem.

The priest said the spirit of Christmas "still shines forth from the hearts of the youth of a little people defying a decade of brainwashing and a month of terror."

He said the actions of the people of Hungary had united all nations of good will in sympathy and moral indignation.

MUNCH CONDUCTOR

The armed forces units were conducted by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Organist John Kiley was accompanist.

Mayor Hynes told participants the purpose of the festival was to help bring the "real message of Christmas—'peace on earth to men of good will.'"

"Even today," he said, "it does bring peace to the hearts of many during the holy Christmas season."

More than 1,000,000 persons are expected to visit th Common displays during the festival. More tahn 100 choral groups and about 4000 vocalists will provide music during the festival season.

Displays include a nativity scene, an enlarged Christmas Chapel, Santa's Playland, lighted trees, and several kinds of animals, including reindeer.

CROWD AT CEREMONIES opening Boston's seventh Christmas Festival included large contingents from the armed forces, at right. John Kiley is at the organ with Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor.

BOSTON'S CHRISTMAS TREE—A giant and gaily decorated Christmas tree was lighted on Boston Common yesterday in ceremonies launching the seventh annual Boston Christmas Festival.

RARE HARMONY was heard at the opening of the Christmas Festival yesterday afternoon at City Hall. Mayor Hynes, at left, sings a carol, accompanied by massed bandsmen of armed forces units under the direction of Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony.

Odd Items From Everywhere building and state and county office buildings.

Joseph W. Lund, Boston realtor and past president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, endorsing the plan, told an M.I.T. clinic that urban renewal projects were the only hope for Boston's economic salvation.

Jerry McNamara, a freshman at Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., celebrating and mounting

Week-End Dalhousie Visit By N. E. Students Planned

HALIFAX, N. S., Nov. 30 (UP)—A plan to have 25 to 30 New England university students visit Dalhousie University on an invitation week-end is being worked out by the Dalhousie branch of the in Hungary.

The Irish appeal came as alarm grew among Western U.N. diplomats that Moscow may be plotting to gain control over Syria through a pro-Russian Syrian army leadership.

(Globe Photo by Paul S. Connell)

"O COME, ALL YE FAITHFUL"—Mayor Hynes, left, sings first song of Christmas Festival while Dr. Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor, leads the crowd.

Holy Night Sung

Lt (jg) Robert Detwiller, U. S. N., rendered a solo of "O Holy Night," while sailors from the destroyers Purdy and Beatty and the cruiser Albany, hummed background music.

The Air Force personnel came from Hanscom Field, Bedford. The soldiers were from Ft. Banks headquarters and the dozen or more missile installations in the Greater Boston area.

The audience stood quietly as Fr. Vendler gave the invocation for world peace.

The 30-year-old priest referred to the Mid-East crisis when he said:

"Around the very land of His life on earth, peoples face each other in bitter strife and hatred, danger of war, destruction, nay, utter annihilation threatens the nations all over the world.

"We see that the dynasty of tyrants did not die out with Herod. Mass murders did not end with the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem, as we see that day by day more men, women and children are driven by persecution out of their native land to follow the path of the Holy Family to exile and banishment."

Fr. Vendler, who was the last clergyman legally to leave Hungary, comes fom Budapest and is presently studying here.

Light Still Shines

Speaking of the Yuletide spirit, while thinking of his own country, he said:

"The light of the first Christmas still shining, brighter than ever in the hearts of the youth of a little people, defying a decade of brainwashing and a month of terror.

"And, at this light, all nations of good will became united as one in sympathy and moral indignation," he said.

With the Festival inaugurated, 100 singing organizations will sing from the Christmas Chapel on the Common during the next three weeks.

There will be daily concerts of sacred music from noon to 1, and in the evening, 7 to 9. Friday concerts will be from 12 to 1 p.m., and from 7 to 9 p.m. Displays on the Common include a heroic-sized figure, on the Mount, and in the Garden, a Madonna and Child may be seen on a pond in the lagoon.

For the youngsters' attention, Santa's workshop on the Common, complete with eight live reindeer, a flock of sheep, raccoon, goats, donkeys and native animals.

FESTIVAL

Continued from the First Page

Beside these sober thoughts, the brightness of Boston's Christmas Festival was even stronger.

Dr. Charles Munch, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the carol singing in front of the floodlighted nativity scene.

Hundreds of passersby in the rush hour crowd about 5 o'clock stopped to catch the season's spirit.

The floodlights were dimmed as Mayor Hynes officially launched the great city festival by lighting the candle in an Advent wreath over the front door of City Hall.

Elm Comes Ablaze

Later, at 7 p. m. the large Nativity scene on the Common was unveiled by Festival Chairman Harry J. Blake; Paul H. Hines, director ad Arthur E. English, superintendent of parks.

A large gathering, including many youngsters, was thrilled as the holy drama was lighted.

Then they trooped with the Festival officials to watch the tall and stately elm beside the Frog Pond, covered with blue lights, come ablaze.

Finally the giant 64-foot Christmas tree on the Common, near Tremont and Boylston sts., was lighted, while the Proparvulis Glee Club sang the first hymns from the white chapel.

At the afternoon exercise, John Kiley, noted organist and choirmaster, accompanied the carols on a portable organ.

Mayor Hynes told the gathering that "the Christmas Festival is something that helps make Boston the great home-loving, God-loving city it is."

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 1 1956

BOSTON SYMP

Seefried S

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORC TRA, Charles Munch, music dir gave yesterday afternoon, and repeat tonight in Symphony Ha seventh program in the Friday urday series. Irmgard Seefrie soprano soloist. Vivaldi: Largo the Concerto in D minor, Op. 11 (in memory of Guido Can Honegger: Second Symphony: "Wedding Cantata, No. 202 time at these concerts) Hindem Three Songs from the cycle, Life of Mary" (first time at concerts); Roussel: "Bacchus Ariane," Suite No. 2.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned t conductor's stand of the B Symphony Orchestra yeste and all is now well with institution. Since he is a master, both of his art and musicians (unlike last guest!), everything yesterday a marvel of tonal richness, c tant finesse and interpretive quence.

Very properly Mr. Munch orialized the recent and death of his young coll Guido Cantelli, by insertin Vivaldi Largo at the begi of the concert. It was a and moving performance under the circumstances perceptibly increased pati fitting tribute to the young ductor who had made mar mirers in Boston by his appearances with Ore Luckily, too, there were thoughtless people who bur applause when the numbe finished.

What a joy it was to hea the beautiful voice and sup of Irmgard Seefried! Here true musician with a s instrument. In Bach and in mith she sang with unerrin and style, and in the C especially, she sang with markable freshness and sive appeal that, I do

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 1 1956

163

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 1 1956

Irmgard Seefried Soloist at Symphony

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seefried Soprano Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight in Symphony Hall, the seventh program in the Friday-Saturday series. Irmgard Seefried was soprano soloist. Vivaldi: Largo, from the Concerto in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11 (in memory of Guido Cantelli); Honegger: Second Symphony; Bach: "Wedding Cantata," No. 202 (first time at these concerts); Hindemith: Three Songs from the cycle, "The Life of Mary" (first time at these concerts); Roussel: "Bacchus and Ariane," Suite No. 2.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, and all is now well with that institution. Since he is a true master, both of his art and of the musicians (unlike last week's guest!), everything yesterday was a marvel of tonal richness, executant finesse and interpretive eloquence.

Very properly Mr. Munch memorialized the recent and tragic death of his young colleague, Guido Cantelli, by inserting the Vivaldi Largo at the beginning of the concert. It was a noble and moving performance, and under the circumstances, one of perceptibly increased pathos, a fitting tribute to the young conductor who had made many admirers in Boston by his guest appearances with Orchestra. Luckily, too, there were few thoughtless people who burst into applause when the number was finished.

What a joy it was to hear again the beautiful voice and superb art of Irmgard Seefried! Here is a true musician with a splendid instrument. In Bach and in Hindemith she sang with unerring taste and style, and in the Cantata, especially, she sang with a remarkable freshness and expressive appeal that, I do believe would have pleased Johann Sebastian himself.

There likely will be some complaint that for the duration of this "solo" Cantata, the large part of the Boston Symphony should be waiting backstage for the next number. To be sure, performance of "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten" temporarily changed a symphonic concert into chamber music, and at that the small orchestra used was long silent while harpsichord and oboe, or cello continuo accompanied the voice.

But on the other hand, what a marvelous performance! Mr. Munch used only eight each of first and second violins, six violas, four cellos and a single double-bass. The proportion was perfect. Let deserved praise be given, also, to Daniel Pinkham's harpsichord playing, the noble work of Ralph Gomberg, first oboe, and Mr. Maye's silken sonority.

A Beautiful Work

A Bach Cantata now and again is desirable at the Symphony concerts, though perhaps some of those with chorus and several vocal solosits would be preferable in general terms. But this Cantata, popularly known as "the" Wedding Cantata, though it is the second of two such, is a most beautiful work.

Hindemith's songs chosen for these concerts were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ," three of the four out of the cycle of 15 composed in 1922-23, which the composer revised and set for orchestra in 1938. They have undeniable power, but to my taste, the essentially instrumental genius of Hindemith did not catch, as an essentially "vocal" composer might, the essence of the poems.

As with the vocal writing of Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler," power and weight take the place of lyricism. It is possible, I think, to respect the technic and the substance of these songs without being able to take them to one's heart.

Still, Miss Seefried did them beautifully. But I could not help thinking how fine it would be if Mr. Munch were more cordial to Mahler, for the singer would make a great soloist in that composer's Fourth Symphony.

Honegger's brooding and darksome Symphony, with the relief of the hopeful chorale at the end, was more than ever before revealed as remarkable and perhaps even great music. As for "Bacchus and Ariane," that was completely stunning.

There has had to be a revision of next week's program because Gregor Piatigorsky, to have been soloist in the world premiere of Sir William Walton's Cello Concerto, is sick. It is hoped he will be able to play it here in January. Mr. Munch, accordingly, will present Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Escales" and the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven.

Boston Symphony Presents Impressively Varied List

Boston.—An impressively varied list which, in one way or another, could hardly have failed to satisfy everyone, was offered by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall on Nov. 30 and Dec. 1. Honegger's Second Symphony, which wears well and becomes more attractive upon every hearing, was solid fare for the modernist segment of the public; the Second Suite from Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane", now become a real Munch war horse, for he conducts it stunningly, was another such.

For those of conservative tastes, Bach's "Wedding Cantata" (really the second of the two he composed), "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten", was ideal, not least so because soprano Irmgard Seefried was soloist and sang Bach celestially. Mr. Munch used a genuine chamber-sized orchestra for the cantata: eight each of first and second violins; six violas, four cellos and one double bass, plus harpsichord (Daniel Pinkham) for continuo and recitative accompaniment, and solo oboe (the orchestra's excellent Ralph Gomberg.) This was a most chaste and delicate performance.

Four "Marienleben" Songs

Miss Seefried further was heard in three of the four "Marienleben" songs which Hindemith set for orchestra (in revised version) in 1938. They were "The Birth of Mary", "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ". They are impressive, though it still strikes me that the genius of Hindemith is essentially instrumental and not vocal.

The symphony program a week later was a most comfortable one, with much to ease the spirit and nothing to tax the mind. It consisted of Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge; Ibert's "Escales", and the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven. (One should add that the list was a compromise between original plan and later necessity; Mr. Munch had intended to give the premiere of Sir William Walton's Cello Concerto, but the illness of Gregor Piatigorsky has deferred that event until January.) Apart from a lack of precise balance between sections in the symphony, which added a little surface coarseness to the texture, everything went well, indeed.

Musical America
Jan. 1, 1957

MacDonald

Alice Farnsworth Boffoli, soprano soloist in Handel's "Messiah," to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall, Sunday and Monday evenings, Dec. 9 and 10.

...into his sacred works, ... purity of Mme See-... soprano, reaching the ears ... heart like a balm, was ... conveyor of his graceful ...s.

... was a sense of sheerest ...he sang the familiar aria, ...ben im lieben," with ... Gomberg providing an ... counterpoint on his ...fterward, while her list-... now ...ed her with ap-... she graciously thanked ...nch and Mr. Gomberg, ... with Daniel Pinkham, ... excellent harpsichord ... authenticity, and of ...he concertmaster, Rich-...gin.

...he Hindemith "Marien-... songs Mme Seefried ... a more serious manner ...ing with Rainer Maria ... verses on the life of ... The three items heard ...ay—"The Birth of Mary," ...'s Doubt," and "The ...t. Christ"—represent the ...er at his best. The ex-... melodies are supported ...criptive harmonies that ... to some extent Hinde-...interest in the medieval. ...oods alternate between ...der and the triumphant, ...Mme Seefried a full emo-...range for her glorious ...

...Munch closed with a fa-...hat he introduced to Bos-...946 while appearing here ...t. It is Roussel's Second ...rom his ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," a late-impressionist score (1930) that turns its back on some of the enervated writing of its predecessors.

Roussel took his impressionism out of the clouds, planted it firmly on the ground, and it is there that one responds to his ranging melodies, his pungent harmonies, his vigorous rhythms. Dr. Munch gave it a stunning performance.

...s it reveal her capabilities ... was a joy to hear her—...e work itself—just the ... Richard Burgin supplied ...o obbligato in one num-...alph Gomberg in another, ...Daniel Pinkham played the ...chord continuo.

...was in Hindemith's three ... from his "Das Marien-... cycle that Miss Seefried ...into her own as an inter-...pretative artist. She was in splendid voice, and captured the sense of awe and mystery these songs reflect. In contrast to much contemporary vocal music for the voice, these are truly vocal in character despite the difficult idiom, and they communicate directly, the orchestral background, generally sparing in texture but rising in "Joseph's Doubt" to high tension, adding to the special atmosphere of these powerful songs.

SIR CEDRIC HARDWICKE as King Edward IV in Sir Laurence Olivier's "Richard III," now playing at the Exeter.

...music in the last half-century ... one of the most delightful in the discovery that great beauty and great voices in women are not necessarily inseparable. Consider for example, Irmgaard Seefried, who yesterday returned as soprano soloist with the orchestra: surely, a more stunning woman with a more stunning voice could hardly be imagined.

Appearing in a blue gown with a filmy stole in a light contrasted blue, Miss Seefried first gave us an enchanting performance—the first at these concerts to—of Bach's Wedding Cantata. Composed of five arias of the gentlest lyric vien separated by brief recitatives in the secco style, the Cantata is a little gem illustrating the poetic secular warmth the musical public geenrally denies this exceedingly human composer. The legend of formidability, indeed, could hardly be better dispelled than in this delightful paen to spring, to romance and to connubial felicity.

Great Delicacy

Using but a handful of strings with harpsichord and the solo oboe (exquisitely played by Ralph Gomberg), Mr. Munch provided an accompaniment of great delicacy and refinement, flawed in only one section by an overly heavy bass continuo line. For her part, Miss Seefried sang the role with an appealing simplicity and with a graciousness of attitude additionally effective for its lack of mannerism. Actually, the part does not really suit her particular voice,

Cantelli Tribute

On this occasion it was our melancholy lot to note the tragic death of Guido Cantelli in a lane crash last week. In memory of this 36-year old genuis, the most promising young conductor of the generation, Mr. Munch played the largo from Vivaldi's "L'Estro armonico," a beautiful gesture beautifully accomplished. The ensuing Honegger Symphony, itself one of the most strikingly tragic utterances in contemporary music, took on an additional feeling of brooding, haunting sorrow in the light of the memorial performance on the death of an inspired, inspiring and dedicated musician.

Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite brought the concert to an end on anything of little consequence, but it remains an enjoyable tour de force recalling Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in theme and construction. I think Mr. Munch occasionally overdoes the fortissimos in it, but he certainly gives it a whop, so to speak, and all ends in an atmosphere of the bacchanale of bacchanales.

Due to illness, Gregor Piatigorsky will not appear next week in the new Walton Concerto for cello. It will be given later in the season, still as a world premiere. The new program, then, offers Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Ports of Call" and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

DEC 1 1956

163

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

266

-Irmgard Seefried Soloist at Symphony

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seefried Soprano Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight in Symphony Hall, the seventh program in the Friday–Saturday series. Irmgard Seefried was soprano soloist. Vivaldi: Largo, from the Concerto in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11 (in memory of Guido Cantelli); Honegger: Second Symphony; Bach: "Wedding Cantata," No. 202 (first time at these concerts); Hindemith: Three Songs from the cycle, "The Life of Mary" (first time at these concerts); Roussel: "Bacchus and Ariane," Suite No. 2.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, and all is now well with that institution. Since he is a true master, both of his art and of the musicians (unlike last week's guest), everything yesterday was a marvel of tonal richness, executant finesse and interpretive eloquence.

Very properly Mr. Munch memorialized the recent and tragic death of his young colleague, Guido Cantelli, by inserting the Vivaldi Largo at the beginning of the concert. It was a noble and moving performance, and under the circumstances one of perceptibly increased pathos, a fitting tribute to the young conductor who had made many admirers in Boston by his guest appearances with Orchestra. Luckily, too, there were few thoughtless people who burst into applause when the number was finished.

What a joy it was to hear again the beautiful voice and superb art of Irmgard Seefried! Here is a true musician with a splendid instrument. In Bach and in Hindemith she sang with unerring taste and style, and in the Cantata, especially, she sang with a remarkable freshness and expressive appeal that, I do believe, would have pleased Johann Sebastian himself.

There likely will be some complaint that for the duration of this "solo" Cantata, the large part of the Boston Symphony should be waiting backstage for the next number. To be sure, performance of "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten" temporarily changed a symphonic concert into chamber music, and at that the small orchestra used was long silent while harpsichord and oboe, or cello continuo accompanied the voice.

But on the other hand, what a marvelous performance! Mr. Munch used only eight each of first and second violins, six violas, four cellos and a single double-bass. The proportion was perfect. Let deserved praise be given, also, to Daniel Pinkham's harpsichord playing, the noble work of Ralph Gomberg, first oboe, and Mr. Maye's silken sonority.

A Beautiful Work

A Bach Cantata now and again is desirable at the Symphony concerts, though perhaps some of those with chorus and several vocal solosits would be preferable, in general terms. But this Cantata, popularly known as "the" Wedding Cantata, though it is the second of two such, is a most beautiful work.

Hindemith's songs chosen for these concerts were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ," three of the four, out of the cycle of 15 composed in 1922-23, which the composer revised and set for orchestra in 1938. They have undeniable power, but to my taste, the essentially instrumental genius of Hindesmith did not catch, as an essentially "vocal" composer might, the essence of the poems.

As with the vocal writing of Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler," power and weight take the place of lyricism. It is possible, I think, to respect the technic and the substance of these songs without being able to take them to one's heart.

Still, Miss Seefried did them beautifully. But I could not help thinking how fine it would be if Mr. Munch were more cordial to Mahler, for the singer would make a great soloist in that composer's Fourth Symphony.

Honegger's brooding and darksome Symphony, with the relief of the hopeful chorale at the end, was more than ever before revealed as remarkable and perhaps even great music. As for "Bacchus and Ariane," that was completely stunning.

There has had to be a revision of next week's program because Gregor Piatigorsky, to have been soloist in the world premiere of Sir William Walton's Cello Concerto, is sick. It is hoped he will be able to play it here in January. Mr. Munch, accordingly, will present Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Escales" and the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven.

Soprano Sings Bach Cantata And Three Hindemith Songs

By Harold Rogers

There are times when the various elements that make up a program fuse in a way that produces an inspiring event, and such was the case yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Charles Munch has chosen selections for the weekend concerts that represent the aspects of intense drama, sacred fervor, secular joy, and idyllic abandon. Irmgard Seefried—the beautiful and gracious soprano from Vienna—joined the Boston Symphony in two of these works—Bach's "Wedding" Cantata, No. 202, and three songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben" cycle. Since both selections were heard for the first time at these concerts, the element of novelty was added to the admirable qualities already listed.

Prior to the formal program, however, Dr. Munch opened with the Largo from Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra in D minor, played in memory of Guido Cantelli, who conducted this work with the Boston Symphony when last in Boston in December, 1954. It was a fitting tribute, intoned in sincere contemplation of a great talent. One could not help recalling Grillparzer's epitaph for Schubert: "The art of music here entombed a rich possession, but even far fairer hopes."

It will be recalled that Honegger's intensely personal Symphony No. 2 was composed in Paris during the German occupation. Scored for strings (with trumpet obbligato in the last movement), the three movements epitomize, respectively, the terror of aggression, the restlessness of waiting, and the final paean of triumph sounded in an affirmative chorale by the trumpets. Yesterday, however, the trumpets were muffled. In the past Dr. Munch has let them sing out full voice in a manner that is justifiably dramatic.

Mme Seefried, handsomely gowned in dark blue with a sky-blue stole over her shoulders, gave us a rapturous performance of Bach's wedding cantata, singing with a countenance as radiant as her voice. Here we find Bach employing a secular text with all the purity that he poured into his sacred works, and the purity of Mme Seefried's soprano, reaching the ears and the heart like a balm, was the apt conveyor of his graceful melodies.

There was a sense of shecrest joy as she sang the familiar aria, "Sich üben im lieben," with Ralph Gomberg providing an eloquent counterpoint on his oboe. Afterward, while her listeners showered her with applause, she graciously thanked Dr. Munch and Mr. Gomberg, together with Daniel Pinkham, whose excellent harpsichord added authenticity, and of course the concertmaster, Richard Burgin.

For the Hindemith "Marienleben" songs Mme Seefried adopted a more serious manner in keeping with Rainer Maria Rilke's verses on the life of Mary. The three items heard yesterday—"The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt," and "The Birth of Christ"—represent the composer at his best. The expressive melodies are supported by descriptive harmonies that reflect to some extent Hindemith's interest in the medieval. The moods alternate between the tender and the triumphant, giving Mme Seefried a full emotional range for her glorious voice.

Dr. Munch closed with a favorite that he introduced to Boston in 1946 while appearing here as guest. It is Roussel's Second Suite from his ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," a late-impressionist score (1930) that turns its back on some of the enervated writing of its predecessors.

Roussel took his impressionism out of the clouds, planted it firmly on the ground, and it is there that one responds to his ranging melodies, his pungent harmonies, his vigorous rhythms. Dr. Munch gave it a stunning performance.

MacDonald

Alice Farnsworth Boffetti, soprano soloist in Handel's "Messiah," to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall, Sunday and Monday evenings, Dec. 9 and 10.

Songs from "Das Marienleben" ..... Hindemith
"Bacchus et Arianne" ..... Rousseel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Of all the developments in music in the last half-century, one of the most delightful in the discovery that great beauty and great voices in women are not necessarily inseparable. Consider for example, Irmgaard Seefried, who yesterday returned as soprano soloist with the orchestra: surely, a more stunning woman with a more stunning voice could hardly be imagined.

Appearing in a blue gown with a filmy stole in a light contrasted blue, Miss Seefried first gave us an enchanting performance—the first at these concerts to—of Bach's Wedding Cantata. Composed of five arias of the gentlest lyric vien separated by brief recitatives in the secco style, the Cantata is a little gem illustrating the poetic secular warmth the musical public geenrally denies this exceedingly human composer. The legend of formidability, indeed, could hardly be better dispelled than in this delightful paen to spring, to romance and to connubial felicity.

Great Delicacy

Using but a handful of strings with harpsichord and the solo oboe (exquisitely played by Ralph Gomberg), Mr. Munch provided an accompaniment of great delicacy and refinement, flawed in only one section by an overly heavy bass continuo line. For her part, Miss Seefried sang the role with an appealing simplicity and with a graciousness of attitude additionally effective for its lack of mannerism. Actually, the part does not really suit her particular voice, nor does it reveal her capabilities but it was a joy to hear her—and the work itself—just the same. Richard Burgin supplied the solo obbligato in one number, Ralph Gomberg in another, while Daniel Pinkham played the harpsichord continuo.

It was in Hindemith's three songs from his "Das Marienleben" cycle that Miss Seefried came into her own as an interpretative artist. She was in splendid voice, and captured the sense of awe and mystery these songs reflect. In contrast to much contemporary vocal music for the voice, these are truly vocal in character despite the difficult idiom, and they communicate directly, the orchestral background, generally sparing in texture but rising in "Joseph's Doubt" to high tension, adding to the special atmosphere of these powerful songs.

Cantelli Tribute

On this occasion it was our melancholy lot to note the tragic death of Guido Cantelli in a lane crash last week. In memory of this 36-year old genuis, the most promising young conductor of the generation, Mr. Munch played the largo from Vivaldi's "L'Estro armonico," a beautiful gesture beautifully accomplished. The ensuing Honegger Symphony, itself one of the most strikingly tragic utterances in contemporary music, took on an additional feeling of brooding, haunting sorrow in the light of the memorial performance on the death of an inspired, inspiring and dedicated musician.

Roussel's "Bacchus et Arianne" Suite brought the concert to an end on anything of little consequence, but it remains an enjoyable tour de force recalling Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in theme and construction. I think Mr. Munch occasionally overdoes the fortissimos in it, but he certainly gives it a whop, so to speak, and all ends in an atmosphere of the bacchanale of bacchanales.

Due to illness, Gregor Piatigorsky will not appear next week in the new Walton Concerto for cello. It will be given later in the season, still as a world premiere. The new program, then, offers Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Ports of Call" and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony.

SIC

SIR CEDRIC HARDWICKE as King Edward IV in Sir Laurence Olivier's "Richard III," now playing at the Exeter.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

DEC 1 1956

163

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 1 1956

-Irmgard Seefried Soloist at Symphony

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seefried Soprano Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, music director, gave yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight in Symphony Hall, the seventh program of the Friday-Saturday series. Irmgard Seefried was soprano soloist. Vivaldi: Largo, from the Concerto in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11 (in memory of Guido Cantelli); Honegger: Second Symphony; Bach: "Wedding Cantata," No. 202 (first time at these concerts); Hindemith: Three Songs from the cycle, "The Life of Mary" (first time at these concerts); Roussel: "Bacchus and Ariane," Suite No. 2.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, and all is now well with that institution. Since he is a true master, both of his art and of the musicians (unlike last week's guest), everything yesterday was a marvel of tonal richness, executant finesse and interpretive eloquence.

Very properly Mr. Munch memorialized the recent and tragic death of his young colleague, Guido Cantelli, by inserting the Vivaldi Largo at the beginning of the concert. It was a noble and moving performance, and under the circumstances one of perceptibly increased pathos, a fitting tribute to the young conductor who had made many admirers in Boston by his guest appearances with Orchestra. Luckily, too, there were few thoughtless people who burst into applause when the number was finished.

What a joy it was to hear again the beautiful voice and superb art of Irmgard Seefried! Here is a true musician with a splendid instrument. In Bach and in Hindemith she sang with unerring taste and style, and in the Cantata, especially, she sang with a remarkable freshness and expressive appeal that, I do believe, would have pleased Johann Sebastian himself.

There likely will be some complaint that for the duration of this "solo" Cantata, the large part of the Boston Symphony should be waiting backstage for the next number. To be sure, performance of "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten" temporarily changed a symphonic concert into chamber music, and at that the small orchestra used was long silent while harpsichord and oboe, or cello continuo accompanied the voice.

But on the other hand, what a marvelous performance! Mr. Munch used only eight each of first and second violins, six violas, four cellos and a single double-bass. The proportion was perfect. Let deserved praise be given, also, to Daniel Pinkham's harpsichord playing, the noble work of Ralph Gomberg, first oboe, and Mr. Maye's silken sonority.

A Beautiful Work

A Bach Cantata now and again is desirable at the Symphony concerts, though perhaps some of those with chorus and several vocal solosits would be preferable, in general terms. But this Cantata, popularly known as "the" Wedding Cantata, though it is the second of two such, is a most beautiful work.

Hindemith's songs chosen for these concerts were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ," three of the four, out of the cycle of 15 composed in 1922-23, which the composer revised and set for orchestra in 1938. They have undeniable power, but to my taste, the essentially instrumental genius of Hindemith did not catch, as an essentially "vocal" composer might, the essence of the poems.

As with the vocal writing of Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler," power and weight take the place of lyricism. It is possible, I think, to respect the technic and the substance of these songs without being able to take them to one's heart.

Still, Miss Seefried did them beautifully. But I could not help thinking how fine it would be if Mr. Munch were more cordial to Mahler, for the singer would make a great soloist in that composer's Fourth Symphony.

Honegger's brooding and darksome Symphony, with the relief of the hopeful chorale at the end, was more than ever before revealed as remarkable and perhaps even great music. As for "Bacchus and Ariane," that was completely stunning.

There has had to be a revision of next week's program because Gregor Piatigorsky, to have been soloist in the world premiere of Sir William Walton's Cello Concerto, is sick. It is hoped he will be able to play it here in January. Mr. Munch, accordingly, will present Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Escales" and the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven.

Soprano Sings Bach Cantata And Three Hindemith Songs

By Harold Rogers

There are times when the various elements that make up a program fuse in a way that produces an inspiring event, and such was the case yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Charles Munch has chosen selections for the weekend concerts that represent the aspects of intense drama, sacred fervor, secular joy, and idyllic abandon. Irmgard Seefried—the beautiful and gracious soprano from Vienna—joined the Boston Symphony in two of these works—Bach's "Wedding" Cantata, No. 202, and three songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben" cycle. Since both selections were

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 1 1956

with all the purity that he poured into his sacred works, and the purity of Mme Seefried's soprano, reaching the ears and the heart like a balm, was the apt conveyor of his graceful melodies.

There was a sense of sheerest joy as she sang the familiar aria, "Sich üben im lieben," with Ralph Gomberg providing an eloquent counterpoint on his oboe. Afterward, while her listeners showered her with applause, she graciously thanked Dr. Munch and Mr. Gomberg, together with Daniel Pinkham, whose excellent harpsichord added authenticity, and of course the concertmaster, Richard Burgin.

For the Hindemith "Marienleben" songs Mme Seefried adopted a more serious manner in keeping with Rainer Maria Rilke's verses on the life of Mary. The three items heard yesterday—"The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt," and "The Birth of Christ"—represent the composer at his best. The expressive melodies are supported by descriptive harmonies that reflect to some extent Hindemith's interest in the medieval. The moods alternate between the tender and the triumphant, giving Mme Seefried a full emotional range for her glorious voice.

Dr. Munch closed with a favorite that he introduced to Boston in 1946 while appearing here as guest. It is Roussel's Second Suite from his ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," a late-impressionist score (1930) that turns its back on some of the enervated writing of its predecessors.

Roussel took his impressionism out of the clouds, planted it firmly on the ground, and it is there that one responds to his ranging melodies, his pungent harmonies, his vigorous rhythms. Dr. Munch gave it a stunning performance.

MacDonald

Alice Farnsworth Boffetti, soprano soloist in Handel's "Messiah," to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall, Sunday and Monday evenings, Dec. 9 and 10.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch ~~[illegible]~~ gave the seventh program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Irmagaard Seefried. The program:

Largo from the Concerto in D minor ..... Vivaldi
Symphony No. 2 for Strings ..... Honegger
"Wedding Cantata," No. 202 ..... Bach
Songs from "Das Marienleben" ..... Hindemith
"Bacchus et Arianne" ..... Rouseel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Of all the developments in music in the last half-century, one of the most delightful in the discovery that great beauty and great voices in women are not necessarily inseparable. Consider for example, Irmgaard Seefried, who yesterday returned as soprano soloist with the orchestra: surely, a more stunning woman with a more stunning voice could hardly be imagined.

Appearing in a blue gown with a filmy stole in a light contrasted blue, Miss Seefried first gave us an enchanting performance—the first at these concerts to—of Bach's Wedding Cantata. Composed of five arias of the gentlest lyric vien separated by brief recitatives in the secco style, the Cantata is a little gem illustrating the poetic secular warmth the musical public geenrally denies this exceedingly human composer. The legend of formidability, indeed, could hardly be better dispelled than in this delightful paen to spring, to romance and to connubial felicity.

Great Delicacy

Using but a handful of strings with harpsichord and the solo oboe (exquisitely played by Ralph Gomberg), Mr. Munch provided an accompaniment of great delicacy and refinement, flawed in only one section by an overly heavy bass continuo line. For her part, Miss Seefried sang the role with an appealing simplicity and with a graciousness of attitude additionally effective for its lack of mannerism. Actually, the part does not really suit her particular voice, nor does it reveal her capabilities but it was a joy to hear her—and the work itself—just the same. Richard Burgin supplied the solo obbligato in one number, Ralph Gomberg in another, while Daniel Pinkham played the harpsichord continuo.

It was in Hindemith's three songs from his "Das Marienleben" cycle that Miss Seefried came into her own as an interpretative artist. She was in splendid voice, and captured the sense of awe and mystery these songs reflect. In contrast to much contemporary vocal music for the voice, these are truly vocal in character despite the difficult idiom, and they communicate directly, the orchestral background, generally sparing in texture but rising in "Joseph's Doubt" to high tension, adding to the special atmosphere of these powerful songs.

Cantelli Tribute

On this occasion it was our melancholy lot to note the tragic death of Guido Cantelli in a lane crash last week. In memory of this 36-year old genuis, the most promising young conductor of the generation, Mr. Munch played the largo from Vivaldi's "L'Estro armonico," a beautiful gesture beautifully accomplished. The ensuing Honegger Symphony, itself one of the most strikingly tragic utterances in contemporary music, took on an additional feeling of brooding, haunting sorrow in the light of the memorial performance on the death of an inspired, inspiring and dedicated musician.

Roussel's "Bacchus et Arianne" Suite brought the concert to an end on anything of little consequence, but it remains an enjoyable tour de force recalling Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in theme and construction. I think Mr. Munch occasionally overdoes the fortissimos in it, but he certainly gives it a whop, so to speak, and all ends in an atmosphere of the bacchanale of bacchanales.

Due to illness, Gregor Piatigorsky will not appear next week in the new Walton Concerto for cello. It will be given later in the season, still as a world premiere. The new program, then, offers Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Ibert's "Ports of Call" and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony.

SIR CEDRIC HARDWICKE as King Edward IV in Sir Laurence Olivier's "Richard III," now playing at the Exeter.

16c

December 2, 56 Globe

Enormously Gifted Cantelli Disliked Being Called "Mister" Until Told It's American Way

By CYRUS DURGIN

Guido Cantelli was an enormously gifted conductor, who stretched every nerve in his tense manner of working. He demanded the utmost from an orchestra, not with a view to self-glorification, but because, like his master Toscanini, he was dedicated fiercely to the finest possible performance. His death in the Italian plane crash near Paris has removed a striking figure from contemporary music, and has deprived the world of a conductor who in the next several years might have become great.

★ ★ ★

Cantelli was the fourth outstanding musician to die in such a manner within almost 10 years. Grace Moore of the Metropolitan Opera met the same fate in 1947, then Ginette Neveu in 1949 (her violin, ironically, was unharmed!), and pianist William Kapell in 1953.

The short, spare man with the trim figure, the black hair and eyes, the pale face that was serious and even strained much more than it smiled, was somewhat imperious. Cantelli spoke quietly and in a friendly manner in private conversation, but he was invariably serious. His manner compelled respect. It was difficult to make a joke with him.

"CALL ME MAESTRO"

When he first came to conduct the Boston Symphony as guest, in 1953, Cantelli was irked by the fact that the gentlemen of the orchestra addressed him as "Mister." "Call me maestro," he said. He referred to the Italian custom of calling musical conductors "maestro," which means master, or boss.

Here was a problem. How to make him understand that in our democratic fashion we always say mister? A member of the Symphony Hall staff thought a bit, then went to Mrs. Cantelli, when her husband was on stage, and explained that no slight had been intended. "You see," he went on, "here in America we even call the head of State 'Mister President.'" Mrs. Cantelli smiled, nodded agreement, and promised to tell her husband. There was no more reference to "maestro."

Cantelli was still a young man, only 36, when death claimed him. He had been, truly, a comet among conductors. Son of an Italian bandmaster, his career really had begun late because of World War II, in which he served before internment by the Nazis. His active career with the baton lasted little more than the decade after the war ended. In that time he had made an international impression as a conductor of seemingly unlimited promise.

In Boston thrice as guest conductor, Cantelli gathered many admirers. There were some, indeed, who spoke with enthusiasm of him as a possible future candidate for conductor of the Boston Symphony. There were few, in my experience, who spoke disparagingly of his work. Certainly he was hailed by the press and the great majority of the public. He had his faults, his interpretive limitations—as who has not?—but they were small, indeed, compared to his vast amount of ability. It is not easy for most men of his age to compel the respect and willing cooperation of seasoned musicians who play in orchestras of high reputation.

HOW HE LEARNED

One of his conspicuous attributes was the high tension of his readings. He never seemed to relax. That gave his performances a strong emotional voltage which, in most of the music I have heard him conduct, was altogether desirable and made powerful effect. But one who admired him could also ask, inwardly, how long can a man go on at such tension? There was and is no answer. It depends upon the individual. In his different way, the late Serge Koussevitzky invariably worked under the pressure of his own ardent temperament.

There was one remarkable thing about Cantelli, I have discovered in few other conductors: He not only knew his business, but he could speak informatively about it. That is rare.

I asked him over luncheon one day how he prepared a new score, and got the whole story in simple and illuminating English. First, he said, he read through the score noting the principle melodic passages and other immediately perceptible effects and devices. Then he put the music aside for a short time. When he took it up again he then read through, from first measure to last, each instrumental part, memorizing as he went. When he had finished this sizeable chore, he knew pretty well the continuity of each instrument.

At that point, Cantelli added, he simply forget the score for three months. When for the third time he resumed study, he briefly reviewed in his mind, with the printed notes, the separate parts. Then began the final

---

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 4 1956

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a rehearsal for one of their televised concerts in the Kresge Auditorium at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. On Wednesday evening WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM will carry the next of these simulcast concerts.

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 39,259
DEC 5 1956

Music In Review

Boston Sympho[illegible] For Brahms' W[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was acclaimed with cheers and "bravos" for a magnificent performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C-Minor, opus 68" that [illegible] an extraordinary [illegible] in Veterans Memo[illegible] Auditorium. Charles Munch [illegible] was called to the stage [illegible] the concluded [illegible] had for the first [illegible] ballet music that was [illegible] exciting and melodious [illegible] music without dancers. Stravinsky's unique "Jeu de Cartes (Card Game) in Three Deals" was vividly descriptive in its rhythms and clearly discernible figurations. Some fine flute music was lavishly threaded through the entire work and the horns were magnificent. In the two closing figures, "Co[illegible] at Between Hearts and Spades" and the "Triumph of the He[illegible] the stern deep voices of t[illegible] dominated the moods [illegible] climax was startling but [illegible] ing.

The other ballet work was Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" [illegible] the story of Jason's aban[illegible] of Medea and his children. The opening was played on muted strings with an intermittent and recurring theme on the bells. The meditations became more and more sad until a mournful melody of lamentation was heard on the oboe.

Then, with a crashing chorus of brasses and percussion, the mood of vengeance built up to a frenzy of passion that ended with an almost full-throated roar.

After this demonstration of descriptive interpretation which was pleasing in its novelty, Dr. Munch led the orchestra in the glorious Brahms symphony that was harmonious with the approaching Christmas season. It was reverential without being

---

Version of Brahms, Led By Munch, Is High Point

by Katherine Schutt

Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony presented its second Providence concert of the winter season at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium. The Program included: Stravinsky's Jeu de Cartes ('Card Game') Ballet in Three Deals; Barber's Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance; and Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

The selection by Stravinsky is a ballet depicting a card game consisting of three deals. In the last hand, a dance of triumph indicates the final victory of one of the three players. This piece was neither outstanding nor particularly deficient in any way. It served to establish the proper mood for the remainder of the program.

Unusual Effects Portray Vengeance

Barber's ballet, an interpretation of the tragedy of Medea by Euripides, is an extremely modern composition which makes use of a great many dissonant chords and a wide variety of rather unusual percussion instruments among which are: side drums, tom-tom, bass drum, tam-tam, whip, and xylophone. All of these contribute in creating some of the most intriguing and unusual sounds ever heard. The theme of the piece, vengeance, is developed from its seed of meditation to its point of full fury and wrath. It was adeptly interpreted by the orchestra and Munch. The entire feeling of vengeance was firmly implanted in the mind of the audience.

However, the highest point of the program was reached in the second half of the concert with Brahms's First Symphony. Munch, directing without score, was superb and demonstrated his insight and complete understanding not only of the composition but also of the composer. Despite a few weaknesses which were evident in the woodwinds, the technique, execution and interpretation, taken from the hand of the conductor, were near to perfection. In the last movement, the flute was especially outstanding.

Munch Orchestra Work Together

The concert as a whole was very enjoyable and was witnessed by a large, near to capacity, crowd which received the program with a great deal of pleasure and enthusiasm. The most striking feature of the concert was the conducting of Munch and the co-operation and attention evident between the orchestra and their director. It was indeed gratifying to see such a relationship when in the Brown community it is so often conspicuous by it absence.

There were also a few other notable features of the concert among which were the number of fur coats seen and the water and paper cups available in the lobby during the intermission.

The third concert of the season will be presented Tuesday, January 29 and will feature cellist Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1956

formance of the season in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium at 8:15 p.m., Tuesday, December 4.

The program includes Stravinsky's Card Game (Ballet in Three Deals) Samuel Barber's Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Tickets may be obtained from now until 5:00 p.m. on December 4 at the Avery Piano Company, 256 Weybosset Street, and at the Auditorium itself after 7 p.m. on the day of the performance.

Munch I[illegible]

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Nov. [illegible]

Symphony [illegible] Mozart ("Paris") [illegible] Symphony No. [illegible] Tchaikovsky [illegible]

Of [illegible] concerts at this [illegible] co-[illegible] in the Boston [illegible] C[illegible]

(Continued on page 2)

(Continued from page 18)

negie Hall series was the performance of Walter Piston's unusual and very beautiful Fifth Symphony, Composed on commission from the Juilliard School of Music for the festival of American music celebrating the 5[illegible] anniversary of the school, in 1955, the work was first heard on Feb. 24, 1956, when it was played by the Juilliard Orchestra under Jean Morel.

Charles Munch

That original performance came closer to the composer's intentions, in my opinion, than Mr. Munch's more virtuosic and impersonal treatment. There was nothing with which to quarrel in the Boston Symphony's technical performance; it was superbly clear and polished. But the sensuous magic of the first two movements, the mystery and emotional undercurrents, the constant poetic evocation were somehow lacking. Of all Piston's six symphonies, this is the most personal, the most inventive, the most haunting in its ideas and evolution.

It had been apparent in the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, K. 297, that this was not to be one of Mr. Munch's banner evenings. The string tone overbalanced the winds, and for all its brilliance, the playing of the orchestra was hard-driven in the rapid movements. Again, in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," the orchestra could not be blamed for the conductor's meaningless accelerandos, melodramatic exaggerations in climaxes, and emphasis upon surface glitter rather than inner conviction. Serge Koussevitzky's shattering interpretation of this work is still too fresh in our ears to enable us to accept so inferior a conception from the Boston Symphony. But by the next visit Mr. Munch will doubtless again be in the vein. —R. S.

164 December 2, 56 - Globe

Enormously Gifted Cantelli Disliked Being Called "Mister" Until Told It's American Way

By CYRUS DURGIN

Guido Cantelli was an enormously gifted conductor, who stretched every nerve in his tense manner of working. He demanded the utmost from an orchestra, not with a view to self-glorification but because, like his master Toscanini, he was dedicated fiercely to the finest possible performance. His death in the Italian plane crash near Paris has removed a striking figure from contemporary music, and has deprived the world of a conductor who in the next several years might have become great.

★ ★ ★

Cantelli was the fourth outstanding musician to die in such a manner within almost 10 years. Grace Moore of the Metropolitan Opera met the same fate in 1947, then Ginette Neveu in 1949 (her violin, ironically, was unharmed!), and pianist William Kapell in 1953.

The short, spare man with the trim figure, the black hair and eyes, the pale face that was serious and even strained much more than it smiled, was somewhat imperious. Cantelli spoke quietly and in a friendly manner in private conversation, but he was invariably serious. His manner compelled respect. It was difficult to make a joke with him.

"CALL ME MAESTRO"

When he first came to conduct the Boston Symphony as guest, in 1953, Cantelli was irked by the fact that the gentlemen of the orchestra addressed him as "Mister." "Call me maestro," he said. He referred to the Italian custom of calling musical conductors "maestro," which means master, or boss.

Here was a problem. How to make him understand that in our democratic fashion we always say mister? A member of the Symphony Hall staff thought a bit, then went to Mrs. Cantelli, when her husband was on stage, and explained that no slight had been intended. "You see," he went on, "here in America we even call the head of State 'Mister President.'" Mrs. Cantelli smiled, nodded agreement, and promised to tell her husband. There was no more reference to "maestro."

Cantelli was still a young man, only 36, when death claimed him. He had been, truly, a comet among conductors. Son of an Italian bandmaster, his career really had begun late because of World War II, in which he served before internment by the Nazis. His active career with the baton lasted little more than the decade after the war ended. In that time he had made an international impression as a conductor of seemingly unlimited promise.

In Boston thrice as guest conductor, Cantelli gathered many admirers. There were some, indeed, who spoke with enthusiasm of him as a possible future candidate for conductor of the Boston Symphony. There were few, in my experience, who spoke disparagingly of his work. Certainly he was hailed by the press and the great majority of the public. He had his faults, his interpretive limitations—as who has not?—but they were small, indeed, compared to his vast amount of ability. It is not easy for most men of his age to compel the respect and willing cooperation of seasoned musicians who play in orchestras of high reputation.

HOW HE LEARNED

One of his conspicuous attributes was the high tension of his readings. He never seemed to relax. That gave his performances a strong emotional voltage which, in most of the music I have heard him conduct, was altogether desirable and made powerful effect. But one who admired him could also ask, inwardly, how long can a man go on at such tension? There was and is no answer. It depends upon the individual. In his different way, the late Serge Koussevitzky invariably worked under the pressure of his own ardent temperament.

There was one remarkable thing about Cantelli, I have discovered in few other conductors: He not only knew his business, but he could speak informatively about it. That is rare.

I asked him over luncheon one day how he prepared a new score, and got the whole story in simple and illuminating English. First, he said, he read through the score noting the principle melodic passages and other immediately perceptible effects and devices. Then he put the music aside for a short time. When he took it up again he then read through, from first measure to last, each instrumental part, memorizing as he went. When he had finished this sizeable chore, he knew pretty well the continuity of each instrument.

At that point, Cantelli added, he simply forgot the score for three months. When for the third time he resumed study, he briefly reviewed in his mind, with the printed notes, the separate parts. Then began the final

---

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 4 1956

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a rehearsal for one of their televised concerts in the Kresge Auditorium at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. On Wednesday evening WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM will carry the next of these simulcast concerts.

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 39,259
DEC 5 1956

Music In Review

Boston Sympho[illegible] For Brahms' W[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was acclaimed with cheers and "bravos" for a magnificent performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, opus 68" that climaxed an extraordinary program last night in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Charles Munch, director, was called to the stage five times after the concluding work.

The concert had for the first two works ballet music that was surprisingly exciting and melodious for music without dancers. Stravinsky's unique "Jeu de Cartes (Card Game) in Three Deals" was vividly descriptive in its rhythms and clearly discernible figurations. Some fine flute music was lavishly threaded through the entire work and the horns were magnificent. In the two closing figures, "Combat Between Hearts and Spades" and the "Triumph of the Hearts," the stern deep voices of the brasses dominated the moods [illegible] the climax was startling but gratifying.

The other ballet work was Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" which is the story of Jason's abandonment of Medea and his children. The opening was played on muted strings with an intermittent and recurring theme on the bells. The meditations became more and more sad until a mournful melody of lamentation was heard on the oboe.

Then, with a crashing chorus of brasses and percussion, the mood of vengeance built up to a frenzy of passion that ended with an abrupt full-voiced roar.

After this demonstration of descriptive interpretation which was pleasing in its novelty, Dr. Munch led the orchestra in the glorious Brahms symphony that was harmonious with the approaching Christmas season. It was reverential without being

---

Version of Brahms, Led By Munch, Is High Point

by Katherine Schutt

Tuesday evening, the Boston Symphony presented its second Providence concert of the winter season at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium. The Program included: Stravinsky's Jeu de Cartes' ('Card Game') Ballet in Three Deals; Barber's Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance; and Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

The selection by Stravinsky is a ballet depicting a card game consisting of three deals. In the last hand, a dance of triumph indicates the final victory of one of the three players. This piece was neither outstanding nor particularly deficient in any way. It served to establish the proper mood for the remainder of the program.

Unusual Effects Portray Vengeance

Barber's ballet, an interpretation of the tragedy of Medea by Euripides, is an extremely modern composition which makes use of a great many dissonant chords and a wide variety of rather unusual percussion instruments among which are: side drums, tom-tom, bass drum, tam-tam, whip, and xylophone. All of these contribute in creating some of the most intriguing and unusual sounds ever heard. The theme of the piece, vengeance, is developed from its seed of meditation to its point of full fury and wrath. It was adeptly interpreted by the orchestra and Munch. The entire feeling of vengeance was firmly implanted in the mind of the audience.

However, the highest point of the program was reached in the second half of the concert with Brahms's First Symphony. Munch, directing without score, was superb and demonstrated his insight and complete understanding not only of the composition but also of the composer. Despite a few weaknesses which were evident in the woodwinds, the technique, execution and interpretation, taken from the hand of the conductor, were near to perfection. In the last movement, the flute was especially outstanding.

Munch Orchestra Work Together

The concert as a whole was very enjoyable and was witnessed by a large, near to capacity, crowd which received the program with a great deal of pleasure and enthusiasm. The most striking feature of the concert was the conducting of Munch and the co-operation and attention evident between the orchestra and their director. It was indeed gratifying to see such a relationship when in the Brown community it is so often conspicuous by it absence.

There were also a few other notable features of the concert among which were the number of fur coats seen and the water and paper cups available in the lobby during the intermission.

The third concert of the season will be presented Tuesday, January 29 and will feature cellist Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1956

formance of the season in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium at 8:15 p.m., Tuesday, December 4.

The program includes Stravinsky's Card Game (Ballet in Three Deals) Samuel Barber's Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Tickets may be obtained from now until 5:00 p.m. on December 4 at the Avery Piano Company, 256 Weybosset Street, and at the Auditorium itself after 7 p.m. on the day of the performance.

Munch L[illegible]

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Nov. [illegible]

Symphony in D major, K. 297 ("Paris") . . . Mozart
Symphony No. [illegible] . . . Piston
Symphony [illegible] . . . Tchaikovsky

Of major concern at the last concert in the Boston Symphony's Car-

(Continued on page 25)

(Continued from page 18)

negie Hall series was the performance of Walter Piston's unusual and very beautiful Fifth Symphony. Composed on commission from the Juilliard School of Music for the festival of American music celebrating the 50th anniversary of the school, in 1955, the

Charles Munch

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 1 1956

work was first heard on Feb. 24, 1956, when it was played by the Juilliard Orchestra under Jean Morel.

This original performance came closer to the composer's intentions, in my opinion, than Mr. Munch's more virtuosic and impersonal treatment. There was nothing with which to quarrel in the Boston Symphony's technical performance; it was superbly clear and polished. But the sensuous magic of the first two movements, the nuances and emotional undercurrents, the constant poetic evocation were somehow lacking. Of all Piston's six symphonies, this is the most personal, the most inventive, the most haunting in its ideas and evolution.

It had been apparent in the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, K. 297, that this was not to be one of Mr. Munch's banner evenings. The string tone overbalanced the winds, and, for all its brilliance, the playing of the orchestra was hard-driven in the rapid movements. Again, in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," the orchestra could not be blamed for the conductor's meaningless accelerandos, melodramatic exaggerations in climaxes, and emphasis upon surface glitter rather than inner conviction. Serge Koussevitzky's shattering interpretation of this work is still too fresh in our ears to enable us to accept so inferior a conception from the Boston Symphony. But by the next visit Mr. Munch will doubtless again be in the vein. —R. S.

164 December 2, 56 - Globe

Enormously Gifted Cantelli Disliked Being Called "Mister" Until Told It's American Way

By CYRUS DURGIN

Guido Cantelli was an enormously gifted conductor, who stretched every nerve in his tense manner of working. He demanded the utmost from an orchestra, not with a view to self-glorification, but because, like his master Toscanini, he was dedicated fiercely to the finest possible performance. His death in the Italian plane crash near Paris has removed a striking figure from contemporary music, and has deprived the world of a conductor who in the next several years might have become great.

★ ★ ★

Cantelli was the fourth outstanding musician to die in such a manner within almost 10 years. Grace Moore of the Metropolitan Opera met the same fate in 1947, then Ginette Neveu in 1949 (her violin, ironically, was unharmed!), and pianist William Kapell in 1953.

The short, spare man with the trim figure, the black hair and eyes, the pale face that was serious and even strained much more than it smiled, was somewhat imperious. Cantelli spoke quietly and in a friendly manner in private conversation, but he was invariably serious. His manner compelled respect. It was difficult to make a joke with him.

"CALL ME MAESTRO"

When he first came to conduct the Boston Symphony as guest, in 1953, Cantelli was irked by the fact that the gentlemen of the orchestra addressed him as "Mister." "Call me maestro," he said. He referred to the Italian custom of calling musical conductors "maestro," which means master, or boss.

Here was a problem. How to make him understand that in our democratic fashion we always say mister? A member of the Symphony Hall staff thought a bit, then went to Mrs. Cantelli, when her husband was on stage, and explained that no slight had been intended. "You see," he went on, "here in America we even call the head of State 'Mister President.'" Mrs. Cantelli smiled, nodded agreement, and promised to tell her husband. There was no more reference to "maestro."

Cantelli was still a young man, only 36, when death claimed him. He had been, truly, a comet among conductors. Son of an Italian bandmaster, his career really had begun late because of World War II, in which he served before inerment by the Nazis. His active career with the baton lasted little more than the decade after the war ended. In that time he had made an international impression as a conductor of seemingly unlimited promise.

In Boston thrice as guest conductor, Cantelli gathered many admirers. There were some, indeed, who spoke with enthusiasm of him as a possible future candidate for conductor of the Boston Symphony. There were few, in my experience, who spoke disparagingly of his work. Certainly he was hailed by the press and the great majority of the public. He had his faults, his interpretive limitations—as who has not?—but they were small, indeed, compared to his vast amount of ability. It is not easy for most men of his age to compel the respect and willing cooperation of seasoned musicians who play in orchestras of high reputation.

HOW HE LEARNED

One of his conspicuous attributes was the high tension of his readings. He never seemed to relax. That gave his performances a strong emotional voltage which, in most of the music I have heard him conduct, was altogether desirable and made powerful effect. But one who admired him could also ask, inwardly, how long can a man go on at such tension? There was and is no answer. It depends upon the individual. In his different way, the late Serge Koussevitzky invariably worked under the pressure of his own ardent temperament.

There was one remarkable thing about Cantelli, I have discovered in few other conductors: He not only knew his business, but he could speak informatively about it. That is rare.

I asked him over luncheon one day how he prepared a new score, and got the whole story in simple and illuminating English. First, he said, he read through the score noting the principle melodic passages and other immediately perceptible effects and devices. Then he put the music aside for a short time. When he took it up again he then read through, from first measure to last, each instrumental part, memorizing as he went. When he had finished this sizeable chore, he knew pretty well the continuity of each instrument.

At that point, Cantelli added, he simply forgot the score for three months. When for the third time he resumed study, he briefly reviewed in his mind, with the printed notes, the separate parts. Then began the final

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 4 1956

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a rehearsal for one of their televised concerts in the Kresge Auditorium at the

Parsons Pleads Gr Freedom for Educ

by Marilyn Tarasiewicz

Talcott Parsons, chairman of the social relation Harvard, addressed the Brown chapter of the Americ University Professors last Wednesday evening at the the subject "Academic Freedom and the Problem of N

Prof. Parsons, a member of the national council Association of University Professors, suggested a kin Immunity" for the educator. He should be "free to think with ideas, and, in a sense, to think irresponsibly." "Pri cation" between the teacher and the student might b same grounds as is the conversation between the lawye

Prof. Parsons was a member of a special committ AAUP which inve es involving the versity staff mem ferred specifically involving the Fifth the special loyalt pressed disagreem quirements as spe which single out a tal professional g

The AAUP was tioized, said Prof it declared that m Communist Party sufficient grounds This decision was the policy of the c no single factor s for dismissal; a g the individual's should be made in The committee a long view appro enemy away. We understood fully for the first time that the rebellion was not only the work of impassioned students and debarred workers, but had come from deep feeling and solidarity."

PARSONS

And then the story of the return of the soviet troops to destroy the patriots, deport them to slavery and drive them into exile as the Russians reverted to Stalin's methods, but "the rebels never thought of surrender."

The magazine concludes with an article and pictures telling of the reaction of the rest of the world to what had taken place in Hungary. People all over the world gathered in protests against Russia, and gathered funds and clothing for the Hungarian refugees.

Even Communist countries dem-

'LIFE' Page 4

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 39,259
DEC 5 1956

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Acclaimed For Brahms' Work Rendition

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was acclaimed with cheers and "bravos" for a magnificent performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C-Minor, opus 68" that climaxed an extraordinary program last night in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Charles Munch, director, was called to the stage five times after the concluded work.

The concert had for the first two works ballet music that was surprisingly exciting and melodious for music without dancers. Stravinsky's unique "Jeu de Cartes (Card Game) in Three Deals" was vividly descriptive in its rhythms and clearly discernible figurations. Some fine flute music was lavishly threaded through the entire work and the horns were magnificent. In the two closing figures, "Contest Between Hearts and Spades" and the "Triumph of the Hearts," the stern deep voices of the basses dominated the moods and the climax was startling but gratifying.

The other ballet work was Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" which is the story of Jason's abandonment of Medea and his children. The opening was played on muted strings with an intermittent and recurring theme on the bells. The meditations became more and more sad until a mournful melody of lamentation was heard on the oboe.

Then, with a crashing chorus of brasses and percussion, the mood of vengeance built up to a frenzy of passion that ended with an abrupt full-voiced roar.

After this demonstration of descriptive interpretation which was pleasing in its novelty, Dr. Munch led the orchestra in the glorious Brahms' symphony that was harmonious with the approaching Christmas season. It was reverential without being religious, solemn without being sad.

The opening movement, allegro poco sostenuto, was divine in the development of the close harmony that by the insertion of one false note could have been dissonance. The grandeur of the second movement, andante sostenuto, plucked at heart strings and many a listener was deep in reverie and close to tears.

The expected lightness of the third movement, customary in symphonies, had a gracefully quickened tempo but still retained the solemness that gave it a nobility.

The closing movement, adagio: allegro non troppo ma con brio, was played with the kind of fire that warms and invites rather than the kind that flames and fascinates. The final movement seemed endless in its gradual approach to grandeur as the theme was developed again and again with ever increasing radiance. At the last chord, the capacity audience shouted its pent up admiration. Loud and insistent applause demanded the return of Dr. Munch to acknowledge the acclaim.

C. H. L.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1956

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Includes Stravinsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Charles Munch, will present its second performance of the season in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium at 8:15 p.m., Tuesday, December 4.

The program includes Stravinsky's Card Game (Ballet in Three Deals) Samuel Barber's Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Tickets may be obtained from now until 5:00 p.m. on December 4 at the Avery Piano Company, 256 Weybosset Street, and at the Auditorium itself after 7 p.m. on the day of the performance.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 1 1956

Munch Leads Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 14:

Symphony in D major, K. 297 ("Paris") ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 6 ..... Walter Piston
Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique") ..... Tchaikovsky

Of major concern at this first concert in the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall series was the performance of Walter Piston's unusual and very beautiful Fifth Symphony. Composed on commission from the Juilliard School of Music for the festival of American music celebrating the 50th anniversary of the school, in 1955, the work was first heard on Feb. 24, 1956, when it was played by the Juilliard Orchestra under Jean Morel.

(Continued on page 26)

(Continued from page 18)

Charles Munch

That original performance came closer to the composer's intentions, in my opinion, than Mr. Munch's more virtuosic and impersonal treatment. There was nothing with which to quarrel in the Boston Symphony's technical performance; it was superbly clear and polished. But the sensuous magic of the first two movements, the nuances and emotional undercurrents, the constant poetic evocation were somehow lacking. Of all Piston's six symphonies, this is the most personal, the most inventive, the most haunting in its ideas and evolution.

It had been apparent in the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, K. 297, that this was not to be one of Mr. Munch's banner evenings. The string tone overbalanced the winds and, for all its brilliance, the playing of the orchestra was hard-driven in the rapid movements. Again, in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," the orchestra could not be blamed for the conductor's meaningless accelerandos, melodramatic exaggerations in climaxes, and emphasis upon surface glitter rather than inner conviction. Serge Koussevitzky's shattering interpretation of this work is still too fresh in our ears to enable us to accept so inferior a conception from the Boston Symphony. But by the next visit Mr. Munch will doubtless again be in the vein. —R. S.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

DEC 8 - 1956

Christmas Festival

Boston Symphony on Channel 2

Third Telecast Presented From Kresge Auditorium

By Harold Rogers

Considerable improvement was shown last night in the televising of symphony concerts when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was seen in its third telecast of a complete program. Charles Munch marshaled his forces in Kresge Auditorium for an appearance in the annual Humanities Series offered by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

This concert was broadcast simultaneously over WGBH-TV and WGBH-FM, with Jordan Whitelaw again functioning as producer and David M. Davis as the director. Although Parker Wheatley offered no technical explanations in his announcements, WGBH was apparently using one camera in the control room for front views of the orchestra, and another camera—or possibly two—in the loft to the left of the ensemble, thus affording closeup views of individual choirs or soloists.

* * *

The improvements included better sight lines into the orchestra itself, plus a closer integration of the cameras with the musical scores. The viewer generally saw either the choir that was in the musical spotlight or the soloist who was momentarily holding forth.

The cameras were active as they constantly scanned the orchestra for visual interest, yet they did so without resorting to trick shots that would divert the listener's attention from the music. If it were possible to mount another camera on the right side of the stage, the viewer would feel even less fettered. But the new Holtkamp organ fills the loft to the right, and there is probably no other place where a camera could be mounted.

* * *

In the opening selection, Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, was one excellent view of Dr. Munch at close range. It is absorbing to watch a conductor's face while it reflects the moods of the music, as Dr. Munch's so easily does. Here, too, is a vantage point that television can offer. Listeners in the hall are seldom situated where they can watch the conductor's face.

Unfortunately, however, such views were few and very far between last night. Since Dr. Munch is eminently photogenic, the WGBH producers are missing a strong source of interest.

In Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" the soloists (of whom there are many) were carefully selected and brought to the screen. Here again the veteran symphony-goer has a rare opportunity to see certain players at close range—and last night nearly all the first-desk musicians were featured.

In the final selection, Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, we were given a dramatic sequence during the storm scene when the cameras alternately flashed between Everett Firth's timpani, his mallets flying, and the whole doublebass section as they brought forth that ominous rumble of thunder.

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Independent
Circ. 53,259

DEC 5 - 1956

Music

Fitting Memorial To Guido Cantelli By Boston Symphony

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the second concert of its current Providence season last evening at the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium.

Two of the works performed had been conducted here by Guido Cantelli, who lost his life recently in an air disaster at Orly near Paris, and they served as an appropriate memorial to this outstanding artist who had promised so much for musical progress.

The program:

Stravinsky . . . "Jeu de Cartes" Ballet in Three Deals
Barber . . . Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance, Op. 23-A Brahms . . Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68

Modern symphonic sounds dominated the first half of this concert and we were treated to two clever and very challenging pieces of music. Hearing these two together would never lead one to guess that nearly 20 years separates them, with Stravinsky's dating from 1936 and Barber's (in its present form) dated 1955. In idiom they are certainly related. The use of motor rhythms, dissonance, melodic fragments designed to create interest in special orchestral colors, all these and many more were present in abundance and the Boston Symphony dealt out the scores with overwhelming ease and skill.

More performances of this calibre and modernity will certainly irritate small portions of our audience. But these are irritating times in which we live, after all, and we like the Boston Symphony best when it is vital and alive and challenging.

At the same time, last night's reading of the familiar Brahms First Symphony by Dr. Munch was a memorable one. There was a measure of restraint, whether because of the memory of Mr. Cantelli or not is not at issue, which seemed to grip the audience in a rather special way. This combined with the usual brilliant close to make a highly effective musical evening.

The next concert in this series, scheduled for January 29, will feature Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, as soloist.

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

DEC 6 - 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

VIENNA PHILHARMONIC, BSO, EARLY MUSIC SOCIETY

It is now commonly agreed that the concert of the Vienna Philharmonic at Symphony Hall last Sunday was one of the more luminous orchestral performances in recent years in this community of luminous orchestral performances. By the time the seventy-six-year-old German conductor, Carl Schurich, had led his charges through a program consisting of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Mozart's early Symphony in D major and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, there could be little doubt that this is an ensemble of extraordinary tonal balance, refinement of phrasing and eloquence of execution. One of its most compelling characteristics was the exquisite quality of the brass, deriving, one assumes, both from the great Viennese brass tradition in general and the mellower, wider-bored instruments used. Another was the delicacy of articulation exhibited by the strings. A third was the hair-line control of dynamics. Above all the orchestra, through some mystique, somehow managed to imbue the music with an ever-present Viennese spirit that was too unmistakable to be missed.

Sharing the honors with the orchestra, conductor and the City of Vienna must be Anton Bruckner. This sprawling giant of the late romantic tradition for some reason has won little acceptance by conductors of American orchestras with the result that the majesty and beauty of his music are largely unknown to our audiences. All the greater, then, the impact on Sunday night as the Seventh Symphony unrolled in all its grandeur and loveliness.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, bouncing back from the Golschmann debacle, dashed off with considerable eclat the kind of program which the Vienna Philharmonic probably would perform if at all only with great hesitation. It included the Largo from Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra in memory of Guido Cantelli, Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for string orchestra, Bach's Wedding Cantata No. 202, 3 songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben", for Soprano and orchestra, and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane", Suite No. 2. The hesitation of which I speak derives from the elaborate counterpoint, the harsh polytonality, the lean, compressed supple power of Honegger's Symphony and from the gaudy flashes of orchestral color and neo-impressionist abandon of Roussel's ballet piece.

The soloist was the soprano Irmgard Seefried. Her voice is not large and its range is rather limited, but it is exceedingly pure, and she uses it with great authority and sensitivity. Her rendition, with small orchestra, of the endlessly delightful little secular wedding cantata leads one once more to speculate loudly on the great performances of the larger Bach religious choral works that would be possible here were the soloists of her caliber.

A word about Mr. Cantelli. His two visits here in 1953 and 1954 certainly convinced this listener, for one, that he was one of the most gifted persons that ever mounted the podium at Symphony Hall. His tragic death is a terrible loss.

* * *

The remarkable thing about the Cambridge Society for Early Music programs is not the quality of the music played nor the performances thereof. Rather it is the full play that these programs allow for the prodigious research of the Society's director, Erwin Bodky.

The third and last concert of the season at Sanders Theatre this week was a case in point. It consisted of an uninterrupted performance of Haydn's "The Seven Last Words of Christ" in the original version for basso and orchestra. From Mr. Bodky's ever informative program notes one gathers that the familiar series of string quartets bearing this name are actually only an adaptation of an original composition based on the Seven Last Words. This composition was designed to be performed in Lent and consisted of an introduction, seven "sonatas", each preceded by an accompanying voice recitative and a finale depicting an earthquake. It turns out that Mr. Bodky was able to obtain from Vienna the microfilm of the original. The revival on this occasion in its original form, so far as is known, was the first since Haydn's lifetime.

The results proved more notable for their scholarship than for the intrinsic value of the music, which is not top-drawer Haydn. The remainder of the work never does live up to the promise of the portentous introduction. The baritone recitatives, without chorales or arias to follow add little or nothing to its feeling and dramatic continuity. And the "earthquake" as descriptive music doesn't come off at all.

Still the presentation was something of an historic occasion, and we look forward with relish to the Society's next series.

TIGHT BINDING

166

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 8 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave its eighth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Op. 10 — Britten
"Escales" — Ibert
Symphony No. [illegible] Op. [illegible] — Beethoven

By RUDOLF ELIE

A concert of warm and gentle [illegible] day, if not though in good [illegible] brilliant), yesterday's was especially notable for the performance of Benjamin Britten's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridges.

Mr. Munch did it six seasons ago and the repetition again revealed that it is one of the finest works for the string orchestra in the contemporary repertoire. On this occasion, as on the last, I never did get the theme firmly fixed in mind but it couldn't matter less, for the ensuing variations, each in widely contrasted styles, stand on their own whatever their relationship to Mr. Bridges' elusive theme may be.

Musical Ingenuity

A tribute to the [illegible] of the composer's [illegible] the Variations display musical ingenuity, of the highest order. While the two slow movements in particular, the powerful [illegible] wonderfully [illegible] Marcia Funebre, clearly suggest Britten's devotion to his late mentor, the others are witty and often humorous. The "Aria Italiana," the "Bourree Classique" and the "Moto Perpetuo" even hint that are private jokes or perhaps matters teacher and pupil had at one time or another in common.

The only jarring note, from the listener's point of view, is the curiously edgy string quality that appears in the fugue. There is a curious fugue to begin with, the entire exposition being in unison. But it is in the [illegible] yet reserved emotion of the slower sections that the work speaks most eloquently of the personal bond between the two English musicians. It is a little too bad, I think, that Mr. Munch omits the "Weiner Waltz" and the "Chant." Not that their omission is particularly to be noted, but that in such a work as this they must have their own special significance.

The string band, called upon for every virtuosity, played with work marvelously well with a tone at once robust and clear, and the whole thing went with spirit and dignity and assurance under Mr. Munch's authoritative command.

Pretty Light

While Ibert's "Ports of Call" is pretty light in character and makes use of almost all of the musical cliches suggesting the familiar Mediterranean atmosphere, it is well worth an occasional outing. It is the first time Mr. Munch has done it here and he brings to it the same special feeling for its mood and textures that he does to all French music of this genre. He was at no time heavy handed with its climaxes while seeking out the play of instrumental colors in the score. Ralph Gomberg made the second section particularly effective by his oboe playing of the melody inspired by North Afr[illegible]

[illegible] and the work went exceedingly well with the audience.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, though done only last season, is perennially a delight. Through the profusion of long-flowing melodies of the most grateful character, re-iterated again and again in an evolution that is not only without monotony but is somehow miraculously fitting to the material, it seems to induce a state of happy self-hypnosis. One merely sits and the music permeates soul and body as a gold lullaby might an infant. Even its thunder storm is a matter of little alarm; one knows it won't last long and besides it's mostly on the other side of the lake anyway. In fine, if there is a more effective—and more beautiful—tranquilizer than this [illegible] music, I can't think what it is.

The orchestra is on tour next week, returning on Dec. 21 to Berlioz' exquisite "L'Enfance du Christ" with Cesare Valletti, Gerard Souzay, Florence K[illegible] [illegible]leff and Giorgio Tozzi as soloists.

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 8 - 1956

Stage—Britten, Ibert, and Beethoven at Symphony

Munch Conducts 'Escales' and 'Pastoral'

By Harold Rogers

The Boston Symphony program this weekend might be thought of as a "Mid-Winter Vacation Issue" as it summons up pictures of sunnier climes in idyllic places.

With Jacques Ibert we cruised the Mediterranean to three ports of call—Palermo, Tunis, and Valencia—as we listened to his beguiling moods in "Escales." With Beethoven we tramped the countryside, sat dreaming a long time by that almost endless stream of the second movement, danced with the villagers, ran for cover in the thunderstorm, and joined with the shepherds in "Gladsome and thankful feelings."

With Benjamin Britten, however, we stayed at home—at least his non-programatic score didn't issue a direct invitation to travel—but one could indirectly imagine Mr. Britten in London at age of 12, dutifully harmonizing figured basses under the approving eye of Frank Bridge, one of his first teachers.

Mr. Britten must have respected Mr. Bridge's guidance, for in 1937 the younger man wrote his Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme of Frank Bridge, thus rendering Mr. Bridge an honor similar to that rendered Thomas Tallis by Ralph Vaughan Williams.

* * *

The Britten Variations are more freely handled than Vaughan Williams' Fantasia—that is, with Vaughan Williams one is quite certain of the theme, but with Britten one wonders if Mr. Bridge himself would always pick it out. This matters little, however, because Mr. Britten has turned out a highly original score with ten variations, eight of which were played yesterday. Charles Munch deftly guided his musicians through the difficult passages, making wonderful sense out of it all in such sections as the Marcia, Aria Italiana, Marcia Funebre, and Moto Perpetuo.

Ibert's "Escales" was deputized to take the place of the world première of Walton's new Cello Concerto, postponed owing to Gregor Piatigorsky's inability to appear this weekend. There is now a possibility of it being heard at the last of the January concerts.

* * *

"Escales," composed in 1922, is filled with the aroma of glamorous scenes. With his genial flair for the theatrical, M. Ibert has fashioned a score of appealing sounds and lilting rhythms, cast in an impressionistic mold.

He produces quasi-African music with seven beats to the bar while an oboe inscribes a haunting melody. He offers a swirling Sicilian tarantella, and he winds the whole thing up with a gala version of the punctuated strummings you might hear in a Spanish cabaret. Ralph Gomberg came forward to receive the applause for his excellent oboe solo.

Dr. Munch played the Beethoven Sixth on Wednesday evening in the MIT Kresge Auditorium, where the concert was televised. His performance yesterday in Symphony Hall went even better, because he didn't take the country dance faster than the French horn can play.

It was an inspiring performance—inspiring enough to send most listeners in search of sunnier climes in idyllic places.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 8 - 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Britten, Ibert and Beethoven

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeate tonight, the eighth program in the Friday-Saturday series. Britten: Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridge; Ibert: 'Escales'; Beethoven: "Pastoral" Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Another thoroughly comfortable program, this (with much to ease the spirit and nothing to tax the mind. Designed for purposes of pleasure only, unless, as in the case of Ibert and perhaps of Britten, you awake with difficulty anything composed after 1900.

Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge are, however, remarkably innocuous, full of clever detail, soothing inner voices and ingenious blends and contrasts of string sonorities. Harmonically the score is never more than bracing. The Variations never have been done too much hereabouts and this is a good time to renew acquaintance.

For some reason Ibert's charming "Escales" has not been played here frequently, although it has become popular elsewhere and has received several recordings. I trust it is not laboring what is obvious to point out the exceptional Mediterranean "warmth" of the piece, which is considerable and pervasive. After all, the music hardly could have been otherwise (for Ibert is not of the dry-bones-and-abstraction school, since "Escales" more or less grew out of a voyage in the waters of Mare Nostrum and along some of its various ports.

This is not descriptive work, however, at most but suggestive, and it is the product of a resourceful technic and lively temperament.

Munch once again read Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony in a comparatively "straight" fashion and, it must be said, in a manner which coarsened just a trifle the smooth surfaces of the music. At least he does not reduce all to miniature and spend endless time and effort polishing to a high gloss the proliferating tiny details.

Nor, on the other hand, does he make the storm episode any louder than an average Summer thundershower—what, in some parts of New Hampshire they call with local exaggeration, "a tempest." But the balance of sound between sections yesterday was not in that fineness of adjustment which is the Boston Symphony's best. Britten and Ibert, however, fared well, indeed.

Next week the orchestra goes again to New York. The week following Munch will present Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ."

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 8,809

DEC 14 1956

North Shore Arts Exhibit Praised At Symphony Hall

Members of the North Shore [illegible] Association, in connection with [illegible] activities of its Boston Gallery [illegible] Circuit exhibitions, are at present showing in group exhibitions [illegible] sisting of from three to 30 work[illegible]

Current shows are at Symphony Hall, First National Bank of Boston, Home Savings Bank, all [illegible] Boston; Salem Five Cents Savings Bank, and the Burlington Art Gallery, Burlington. These shows are in addition to the regular permanent gallery of the association at [illegible] Kingston street, Boston.

The current Symphony Hall exhibition is one of the larger shows. The committee has received numerous compliments for the quality of work shown. The exhibition is in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The exhibition is under the direction of Karl Zeise, noted cellist member of the orchestra. The association has accepted an invitation to exhibit at the opening of the Boston Symphony's 1957 season.

Beginning in January, the Circuit schedule is for exhibitions at Lynn, Marblehead, Amherst, Athol, New Bedford, Mass., and Kennebunk, Me. Tentative dates for shows in Gardner, Springfield and Providence, R. I., are now being made.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 13 1956

Kennedy, Munch To Pick Awards

Sen. John F. Kennedy and Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been named to the 1956 Lane Bryant Annual Awards Committee, Raphael Malsin of Lane Bryant, Inc., president, announced yesterday.

Three other prominent Americans will serve on the committee to select the recipients of a $1,000 award to an individual and a $1,000 award to a group for voluntary efforts that benefit the American home and community life.

They include Orville Prescott, book critic of The New York Times; deLesseps S. Morrison, mayor of New Orleans; and Dean John E. Drewry of the University of Georgia's journalism school.

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Independent Democrat
Circ. 113,081

DEC 1 2 1956

Charles Munch Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert on UConn Campus

BY GEORGE W. STONE

Storrs—Our cultural bounty can be measured by the fact that the Boston Symphony under Munch made its second consecutive appearance on the University of Connecticut Concert Series last night. Many an enlightened American community would rejoice in one such opportunity in a decade or two.

* * *

NO MATTER how familiar we become with this orchestra's attributes they hardly breed indifference. A brass choir without a symphonic equal has its complement in a group of strings of [illegible] and transparent quality. When these elements are taken together, we are assured of a marvelously rich texture and a satisfying tonal embodiment.

And last night Mr. Munch dedicated himself to a triumvirate of composers for whom he has a demonstrable interpretative affinity—Beethoven, Honegger and Roussel. The accessible Beethoven of the "Pastoral" Symphony was nicely counterbalanced with the more modern idiom of Honegger's Second Symphony and the "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 of Roussel.

As the annual visitors to Tanglewood know, this conductor has an invigorating style with Beethoven. Not as galvanic as Toscanini's nor as seraphically aloof as Furtwangler's, it strikes a happy medium with a reliance on virile articulation and sensitive phraseology at the appropriate moments. Last night Munch offered us "music from the heart to the heart"—a glorious hymn to nature that would have uplifted the spirit of Beethoven himself.

THE MOOD of the Honegger is continually somber in his symphony for string orchestra, yet this work, written during the Nazi occupation of Paris in 1941, has an enduring strength. Munch introduced it to America and he has always managed to it sound eloquent, particularly in the finale, which has a touch of genius about it. The dramatic entrance of the trumpets (in this so-called "string symphony") playing a chorale against slashing figures in the strings always brings the work to a stirring finish.

TIGHT BINDING

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 8 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the eighth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Op. 10 — Britten
"Escales" — Ibert
Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. [illegible] — Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A concert as warm and gentle [illegible] day itself (though a good [illegible] brighter), yesterday's was especially notable for the performance of Benjamin Britten's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme of Frank Bridges.

Mr. Munch did it six seasons ago and the repetition again revealed that it is one of the finest works for the string orchestra in the contemporary repertoire. On this occasion, as on the last, I never did get the theme firmly fixed in mind, but it couldn't matter less, for the ensuing variations, each in widely contrasted styles, stand on their own whatever their relationship to Mr. Bridges' elusive theme may be.

Musical Ingenuity

A tribute to the memory of the composer's teacher, and titled the Variations, display musical ingenuity of the highest order. While the two slow movements in particular, the powerful yet wonderfully tender Marcia Funebre, clearly suggest Britten's devotion to his late mentor, the others are spirited and often humorous. The "Aria Italiana," the "Bourree Classique" and the "Moto Perpetuo" even hint they are private jokes or perhaps matters teacher and pupil had at one time or another in common.

The only jarring note from the listener's point of view is the curiously edgy string quality that appears in the fugue which is a curious fugue to begin with, the entire exposition being in unison. But it is in the moving yet reserved emotionalism of the slower sections that the work speaks most eloquently of the personal bond between these two English musicians. It is a little too bad, I think, that Mr. Munch omits the "Weiner Waltz" and the "Chant." Not that their omission is particularly to be noted, but that in such a work as this they must have their own special significance.

The string band, called upon for every virtuosity, played with work marvelously well with a tone at once robust and clear, and the whole thing went with spirit and dignity and assurance under Mr. Munch's authoritative command.

Pretty Light

While Ibert's "Ports of Call" is pretty light in character and makes use of almost all of the musical cliches suggesting the familiar Mediterranean atmosphere, it is well worth an occasional outing. It is the first time Mr. Munch has done it here and he brings to it the same special feeling for its moods and textures that he does to all French music of this genre. He was at no time heavy handed with its climaxes while seeking out the play of instrumental colors in the score. Ralph Gomberg made the second section particularly effective by his oboe playing of the melody inspired by North African melos, and the work went exceedingly well with the audience.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, though done only last season, is perennially a delight. Through its profusion of long-flowing melodies of the most graceful character, re-iterated again and again in an evolution that is not only without monotony but is somehow miraculously fitting to the material, it seems to induce a state of happy self-hypnosis. One merely sits and the music permeates soul and body as a jolly lullaby might an infant. Even its thunder storm is a matter of little alarm; one knows it won't last long and besides it's mostly on the other side of the lake anyway. In fine, if there is a more effective—and more beautiful—tranquilizer than this in all music, I can't think what it is.

The orchestra is on tour next week, returning on Dec. 21 to do Berlioz' exquisite "L'Enfance du Christ" with Cesare Valletti, Gerard Souzay, Florence Kopleff and Giorgio Tozzi as soloists.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

DEC 8 - 1956

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 8 - 1956

Stage—Britten, Ibert, and Beethoven at Symphony

Munch Conducts 'Escales' and 'Pastoral'

By Harold Rogers

The Boston Symphony program this weekend might be thought of as a "Mid-Winter Vacation Issue" as it summons up pictures of sunnier climes in idyllic places.

With Jacques Ibert we cruised the Mediterranean to three ports of call—Palermo, Tunis, and Valencia—as we listened to his beguiling moods in "Escales." With Beethoven we tramped the countryside, sat dreaming a long time by that almost endless stream of the second movement, danced with the villagers, ran for cover in the thunderstorm, and joined with the shepherds in "Gladsome and thankful feelings."

With Benjamin Britten, however, we stayed at home—at least his non-programatic score didn't issue a direct invitation to travel—but one could indirectly imagine Mr. Britten in London at age of 12, dutifully harmonizing figured basses under the approving eye of Frank Bridge, one of his first teachers.

Mr. Britten must have respected Mr. Bridge's guidance, for in 1937 the younger man wrote his Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme of Frank Bridge, thus rendering Mr. Bridge an honor similar to that rendered Thomas Tallis by Ralph Vaughan Williams.

* * *

The Britten Variations are more freely handled than Vaughan Williams' Fantasia—that is, with Vaughan Williams one is quite certain of the theme, but with Britten one wonders if Mr. Bridge himself could always pick it out. This matters little, however, because Mr. Britten has turned out a highly original score with ten variations, eight of which were played yesterday. Charles Munch deftly guided his musicians through the difficult passages, making wonderful sense out of it all in such sections as the March, Aria Italiana, Marcia Funebre, and Moto Perpetuo.

Ibert's "Escales" was deputized to take the place of the world première of Walton's new Cello Concerto, postponed owing to Gregor Piatigorsky's inability to appear this weekend. There is now a possibility of it being heard at the last of the January concerts.

* * *

"Escales," composed in 1922, is filled with the aroma of glamorous scenes. With his genial flair for the theatrical, M. Ibert has fashioned a score of appealing sounds and lilting rhythms, cast in an impressionistic mold.

He produces quasi-African music with seven beats to the bar while an oboe inscribes a haunting melody. He offers a swirling Sicilian tarantella, and he winds the whole thing up with a gala version of the punctuated strummings one might hear in a Spanish cabaret. Ralph Gomberg came forward to receive the applause for his excellent oboe solo.

Dr. Munch played the Beethoven Sixth on Wednesday evening in the MIT Kresge Auditorium, where the concert was televised. His performance yesterday in Symphony Hall went even better, because he didn't take the country dance faster than the French horns can play.

It was an inspiring performance—inspiring enough to send most listeners in search of summer climes in idyllic places.

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 8,809
DEC 14 1956

North Shore Arts Exhibit Praised At Symphony Hall

Members of the North Shore Art Association, in connection with the activities of its Boston Gallery and Circuit exhibitions, are at present showing in group exhibitions consisting of from three to 30 works.

Current shows are at Symphony Hall, First National Bank of Boston, Home Savings Bank, all in Boston; Salem Five Cents Savings Bank, and the Burlington Art Gallery, Burlington. These shows are in addition to the regular permanent gallery of the association at 11 Kingston street, Boston.

The current Symphony Hall exhibition is one of the larger shows. The committee has received numerous compliments for the quality of work shown. The exhibition is in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The exhibition is under the direction of Karl Zeise, noted cellist member of the orchestra. The association has accepted an invitation to exhibit at the opening of the Boston Symphony's 1957 season.

Beginning in January, the Circuit schedule is for exhibitions at Lynn, Marblehead, Amherst, Athol, New Bedford, Mass., and Kennebunk, Me. Tentative dates for shows in Gardner, Springfield and Providence, R. I., are now being made.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Britten, Ibert and Beethoven

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeate tonight, the eighth program in the Friday-Saturday series. Britten: Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridge; Ibert: 'Escales"; Beethoven: "Pastoral" Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Another thoroughly comfortable program, this, with much to ease the spirit and nothing to tax the mind. Designed for purposes of pleasure only, unless, as in the case of Ibert and perhaps of Britten, you swallow with difficulty anything composed after 1900.

Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge are, however, remarkably innocuous, full of clever detail, soothing inner voices and ingenious blends and contrasts of string sonorities. Harmonically the score is never more than bracing. The Variations never have been done too much hereabouts and this is a good time to renew acquaintance.

For some reason Ibert's charming "Escales" has not been played here frequently, although it has become popular elsewhere and has received several recordings. I trust it is not laboring what is obvious to point out the exceptional Mediterranean "warmth" of the piece, which is considerable and pervasive. After all, the music hardly could have been otherwise (for Ibert is not of the dry-bones-and-abstraction school, since "Escales" more or less grew out of a voyage in the waters of Mare Nostrum and along some of its various ports.

This is not descriptive work however, at most, but suggestive and it is the product of a resourceful technic and lively temperament.

Munch once again read Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony in a comparatively "straight" fashion and, it must be said, in a manner which coarsened just a trifle the smooth surfaces of the music. At least he does not reduce all to miniature and spend endless time and effort polishing to a high gloss the proliferating tiny details.

Nor, on the other hand, does he make the storm episode any louder than an average Summer thundershower—what, in some parts of New Hampshire they call with local exaggeration, "a tempest." But the balance of sound between sections yesterday was not in that fineness of adjustment which is the Boston Symphony's best. Britten and Ibert, however, fared well, indeed.

Next week the orchestra goes again to New York. The week following, Munch will present Berlioz' "L'Enface du Christ."

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

DEC 13 1956

Kennedy, Munch To Pick Awards

Sen. John F. Kennedy and Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been named to the 1956 Lane Bryant Annual Awards Committee, Raphael Malsin of Lane Bryant, Inc., president, announced yesterday.

Three other prominent Americans will serve on the committee to select the recipients of a $1,000 award to an individual and a $1,000 award to a group for voluntary efforts that benefit the American home and community life.

They include Orville Prescott, book critic of The New York Times; deLesseps S. Morrison, mayor of New Orleans; and Dean John E. Drewry of the University of Georgia's journalism school.

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Independent Democrat
Circ. 113,081

DEC 12 1956

Charles Munch Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert on UConn Campus

By GEORGE W. STONE

Storrs—Our cultural bounty can be measured by the fact that the Boston Symphony under Munch made its second consecutive appearance on the University of Connecticut Concert Series last night. Many an enlightened American community would rejoice in one such opportunity in a decade or two.

* * *

NO MATTER how familiar we become with this orchestra's attributes they hardly breed indifference. A brass choir without a symphonic equal has its complement in a group of strings of luminous and transparent quality. When these elements are taken together, we are assured of a marvelously rich texture and a satisfying tonal embodiment.

And last night Mr. Munch dedicated himself to a triumvirate of composers for whom he has a demonstrable interpretative affinity — Beethoven, Honegger, and Roussel. The accessible Beethoven of the "Pastoral" Symphony was nicely counterbalanced with the more modern idiom of Honegger's Second Symphony and the "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 of Roussel.

As the annual visitors to Tanglewood know, this conductor has an invigorating style with Beethoven. Not as galvanic as Toscanini's, nor as seraphically aloof as Furtwangler's, it strikes a happy medium with a reliance on virile articulation and sensitive phraseology at the appropriate moments. Last night Munch offered us "music from the heart to the heart"—a glorious hymn to nature that would have uplifted the spirit of Beethoven himself.

THE MOOD of the Honegger phony is continually somber in his symphony for string orchestra, yet this work, written during the Nazi occupation of Paris in 1941, has an enduring strength. Munch introduced it to America and he has always managed to it sound eloquent, particularly in the finale, which has a touch of genius about it. The dramatic entrance of the trumpets in this so-called "string sym- playing a cut against slashing heavy strings always brings it to a stirring finish.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
Post & Times Herald
Circ. D. 380,624 - S. 410,185
DEC 10 1956

The Music Box

Munch Opens 'Season' Here

By Paul Hume

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, makes its Washington bow for the year Thursday night. With symphonies by Beethoven and Honegger, the program, spiced up with a Roussell Suite, is a good one.

The Institute of Contemporary Arts presents Carlos Chavez, distinguished Mexican musician, composer, conductor, and teacher, in a lecture tonight in the Corcoran Gallery. The subject: Beethoven and Contemporary Music. Tickets at the door.

On Friday, the Institute presents Ravi Shankar and Chatur Lal in a concert on the sitar and the tabla, respectively. This event, in the Corcoran Auditorium, will also be available via tickets at the door. It replaces the postponed program by pianist Natasha Litvin, who is recovering from a recent automobile accident.

WEDNESDAY, at 7:30 p. m. in the sanctuary of the church, the Calvary Baptist Choir under Frank Heberleinn, will sing the Saint-Saens Christmas Oratorio, and The Story of Christmas by Matthews. The Montgomery County A Capella Chorus will sing director Max Seeboth's new version of "The Night Before Christmas" at Bethesda Elementary School, on Saturday at 8 p. m.

Reformation Church continues its Sunday-in-Advent evenings of music from around the world with a program on the 16th from countries of eastern Europe. These are at 7:45.

Tomorrow night the University of Maryland Women's Chorus, under Louise Payler, sings the Britten Ceremony of Carols, and works by Bach, Pergolesi and Niles. Time is 8 p. m., in the University Chapel.

TONIGHT THE Commerce Symphony, under Nicholas Pappas, plays at 8:15 in the Commerce Auditorium: Haydn: Symphony No. 104; Handel: Pastoral Symphony; Bach: Air.

Wednesday evening at 9 p. m., the A Capella Choir of Catholic University, directed by the Rev. Russell Woollen, sings a Christmas program in the Pan American Union. Tickets are available free from the Pan Am bookshop.

Edith Piaf is moving into —of all places—Constitution Hall, Saturday, Jan. 5, she will sing there, with tickets from the Hayes Bureau. She brings a company.

And tonight from 8 to 9:30 on NBC-TV, you can see and hear Boris Christoff, Marian Anderson, Victoria de los Angeles, Richard Tucker, Elizabeth Doubleday, Andres Segovia, Artur Rubinstein, and an orchestra under Alfred Wallenstein. Free, and in color.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 345,604 - S. 477,285
DEC 16 1956

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

Edward Everett Horton, Cheryl Maxwell and Elizabeth Kerr in "Harvey," opening Monday, Fred Miller theater.

Right: AnnDre House in "Hansel and Gretel," Pabst, 2:30 today, and Ivry Gitlis, guest violinist, Chicago symphony, Monday, Pabst.

On Stage

Today, 2:30—"Hansel and Gretel," Pabst.
Monday, 8:15—Chicago symphony, Pabst.
Monday to Jan. 5—"Harvey," Fred Miller theater.
Dec. 23, 8:30—Yale Glee club, Pabst.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Heights P
Circ. W. 2,050
DEC 27 195

Boston Symph (With Dignity)

By Jerry Clarke

Precision and restraint can m very dull music. The Bosto phony Orchestra under Munch was very precise, strained two Fridays ago Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Fortunately, the Boston Sy gave us more. Mainly magic, Take Beethoven's "Pastoral" phony. It evoked reminiscer nature so compelling that the light in the Academy's Opera seemed to shift with the m the music. There were clou wind and water.

Mostly sunshine, though. Beethoven's idealized response to nature was filled with fields and trees and birds. What wonderfull birds Mr. Munch was able to summon up for us Friday evening.

W. B. Yeats described one once as having " . . . such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make / Of hammered gold and gold enameling / To keep a drowsy emperor awake; / Or set upon a golden bough to sing / To lords and ladies of Byzantium . . . " He might have said Boston. Certainly this bird must nest in the vicinity of Beacon hill.

On another plane, one can say that the Boston Symphony gave an utterly "U" performance. Of course, if we start applying Nancy Mitford's terms, "U" and "non-U", to music, we run the risk of starting a deluge of discussion, but they are certainly brought to mind by the aristocratic orchestra from Boston. It seems incapable of making an even slightly "non-U" sound, and certainly unlikely to display any "non-U" emotional excesses.

Samuel Barber ineptly asked Mr. Munch and his orchestra to "project the psychological state of jealousy and vengeance" in a fully orchestrated snippet from his ballet, "Medea." The section played by the Boston Symphony was entitled "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance." But it was only from I suppose that goes for Brooklyn ites, too.

Much more worthwhile was Stravinsky's ballet music called "Jeu de Carte," or more completely, "Card Game in Three Deals." It dates back to 1936, but for some reason has never gained the popularity its surface appearance would warrant. Nevertheless, this piece apparently made a big impression on the audience at the Academy of Music.

As strong and as angular as it is, this music also came off as an exercise in grace and refinement, precision and restraint.

It could have been dull, but elegance redeemed all.

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is hard enough to play to make almost any failure at it an honorable one. It is serene without being passive, spirited without being nervous. It's musical progress is unusually repetitive but by no means so merely meandering as it seemed last Saturday. Also, the dynamic range of this score should be what Beethoven asked for. Mr. Munch seemed oddly distrustful of Beethoven's judgment in this respect. It was as if, having decided that this music was essentially quiet and relaxed, he took it on himself to make little corrections in the score. He softened and slowed everything down to fit his own conception, which to this reviewer's ears is not as interesting or noble as Beethoven's. The slow movement, for instance, was sleepy and weak rather than spacious and the woodwinds, in particular, were kept to a dimly fragrant tone which was beautiful in itself but often simply unsuitable to its musical purpose. The thunderstorm was a pale and pitiful affair and this was fatal to the dimension of the whole work. For if you soft-pedal this drama of nature, you give the impression of patronizing Beethoven's descriptive technique and the 'Pastoral' ends up by sounding like a quaint curio from older days.

It's still a great orchestra, our Boston Symphony. This reviewer went to last Saturday's concert with the beautiful sound of the Vienna Philharmonic still in his ears, yet it was a pleasure all over again to hear the special qualities of the local organization: the elegant refinement of its over-all sound, the beautiful individuality of texture in the various voices. But this superb instrument needs a real work-out.

Music and Theater

Chicago Symphony, 'Harvey' This Week

Return of Orchestra Reminds Milwaukee Music Lovers of 10 Concert Bargain They Get; Most Symphonies Operate With Yearly Deficit of $100,000 to $300,000

By Walter Monfried

"IF I HAD the money," Arthur Fiedler remarked on his recent visit here, "I could build the world's finest orchestra on the north pole."

The affable maestro of the Boston Pops, who came here to lead the Milwaukee Pops, explained the facts of professional musical life to luncheon guests of Norman Klug, president of the Miller Brewing Co., which paid Fiedler's fee.

Fiedler was peppered with questions about orchestral finances. Obviously, the Milwaukee Pops expansion has stirred up such interest in a widening circle. As Fiedler indicated, and as all followers of the concert business have long realized, the money problem is a perennial and staggering one. Big orchestras are big business —literally million dollar business. Several of them, including the New York, Boston, Cleveland, Philadelphia and Chicago bands, spend nearly $1,500,000 a year each. And the less expensive groups, such as those of Cincinnati, Minneapolis and St. Louis, require several hundred thousands a year to operate. They all operate at a deficit, too, so their societies of subsidizing friends must raise $100,000 to $300,000 to keep each organization afloat.

Milwaukee Gets Bargain Rates

We have at hand the latest financial statement, for the year ending last June, of the Philadelphia orchestra. It is fairly typical for its top class. Total expenses were $1,402,000. Total revenue (including $377,000 from recordings and a $50,000 municipal grant) was $1,214,000 — nearly $200,000 loss. The Chicago symphony orchestra last season spent a million and a quarter and took in a million.

If Milwaukeeans ever decide seriously to undertake a full scale symphony project, they must learn not to be shocked by such figures. For 60 years Milwaukee concertgoers have been enjoying, at bargain rates, the annual series of 10 concerts by the visiting Chicagoans. With celebrated conductors and soloists—Reiner, Beecham, Milstein, etc., etc.—an annual series now costs the Milwaukee public around $45,000. A committee of 100 women erases the $10,000 to $12,000 local deficit. Obviously Milwaukeeans have yet to experience what "big league" music costs.

The Chicago symphony will return to the Pabst theater tomorrow night with Izler Solomon of the Indianapolis orchestra as guest leader. Ivry Gitlis, young Israeli violinist whom impresario S. Hurok discovered in Paris, will be the guest soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto. The "Roman Carnival" overture, Bizet's first symphony and the Rimsky-Korsakov "Capriccio Espagnole."

'Harvey' to End the Stage Year

The last professional dramatic offering of the year will be the indestructible "Harvey," which tomorrow night starts a three week run at the Fred Miller theater. Edward Everett Horton, the veteran of stage, screen and television, will be making his third annual appearance, in the Elwood Dowd role.

"Harvey" was written by Mary Chase, a Denver newspaperwoman, and it ran more than four years on Broadway. It has toured all parts of the land, it was made into a movie with Jimmy Stewart, and it has been given many thousands of times by amateur and stock companies. Advance sales indicate that it will be one of the best attended plays in Miller history.

The Pabst will have its next play in late January — "The Sleeping Prince," with Francis Lederer and Hermione Gingold, English comedienne.

Piano Talenteens to Perform Again

An extremely worthwhile project for young musicians, the "piano talenteens" auditions, sponsored by the Milwaukee Seven Arts society, is again under way. Milwaukee county pianists, 14 through 17, are eligible to compete, and must mail their applications before Jan. 24 to Chairman C. W. Lassmann, 3031 N. 75th st., Milwaukee 10. He also will supply complete information.

The preliminary contest will be held Feb. 24 at Milwaukee-Downer college. The judges then will name the players they feel capable of playing Mar. 24 in the finals at Shorewood auditorium. The judges will be Prof. Leland Coon, University of Wisconsin, Madison; Cecile de Horvath, Chicago; John K. Christensen, Evanston, Ill., who directs Milwaukee choruses. Milwaukee piano teachers are urged to confer with potential applicants and arrange to have their works perfected.

The orchestra of the Jewish Community Center, organized last spring, makes its debut in a free concert at 8:30 tonight. Sol Schapiro is conductor and Beverly Lubotsky Levin guest soprano soloist.

The Wauwatosa municipal orchestra will play its second annual Christmas concert at 8:15 p.m. Wednesday at Longfellow junior high. Robert J. Stevenson is conductor.

Tickets are on sale at the Ray Mitchell agency here for the Wauwatosa symphony's concert Feb. 15 at the Oriental theater, Milwaukee. Maria Tipo, Italian pianist, will be guest soloist.

The Yale university glee club will sing at 4 p.m. next Sunday at the community Christmas program, MacArthur square, and at 8:30 p.m. at the Pabst theater.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
Post & Times Herald
Circ. D. 380,624 - S. 410,185
DEC 10 1956

The Music Box

Munch Opens 'Season' Here

By Paul Hume

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, makes its Washington bow for the year Thursday night. With symphonies by Beethoven and Honegger, the program, spiced up with a Roussell Suite, is a good one.

The Institute of Contemporary Arts presents Carlos Chavez, distinguished Mexican musician, composer, conductor, and teacher, in a lecture tonight in the Corcoran Gallery. The subject: Beethoven and Contemporary Music. Tickets at the door.

On Friday, the Institute presents Ravi Shankar and Chatur Lal in a concert on the sitar and the tabla, respectively. This event, in the Corcoran Auditorium, will also be available via tickets at the door. It replaces the postponed program by pianist Natasha Litvin, who is recovering from a recent automobile accident.

WEDNESDAY, at 7:30 p. m. in the sanctuary of the church, the Calvary Baptist Choir under Frank Heileinn, will sing the Saint-Saens Christmas Oratorio and The Story of Christmas by Matthews. The Montgomery County A Capella Chorus will sing director Max Seeboth's new version of "The Night Before Christmas" at Bethesda Elementary School on Saturday at 8 p. m.

Reformation Church continues its Sunday-in-Advent evenings of music from around the world with a program on the 16th from countries of eastern Europe. These are at 7:45.

Tomorrow night the University of Maryland Women's Chorus, under Louise Payler, sings the Britten Ceremony of Carols, and works by Bach, Pergolesi and Niles. Time is 8 p. m., in the University Chapel.

TONIGHT THE Commerce Symphony, under Nicholas Pappas, plays at 8:15 in the Commerce Auditorium: Haydn: Symphony No. 104; Handel: Pastoral Symphony; Bach: Air.

Wednesday evening at 9 p. m., the A Capella Choir of Catholic University, directed by the Rev. Russell Woollen, sings a Christmas program in the Pan American Union. Tickets are available free from the Pan Am bookshop.

Edith Piaf is moving into —of all places—Constitution Hall, Saturday, Jan. 5, she will sing there, with tickets from the Hayes Bureau. She brings a company.

And tonight from 8 to 9:30 on NBC-TV, you can see and hear Boris Christoff, Marian Anderson, Victoria de los Angeles, Richard Tucker, Elizabeth Doubleday, Andres Segovia, Artur Rubinstein and an orchestra under Alfred Wallenstein. Free, and

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 345,604 - S. 477,285
DEC 16 1956

of a strategic ... be the index ... which tomor

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 8,809
DEC 14 1956

North Shore Arts Exhibit Praised At Symphony Ha

Members of the North Shore Association, in connection wi activities of its Boston Galler Circuit exhibitions, are at pr showing in group exhibitions ... of from three to 30 wo ... Current shows are at Symp Hall, First National Bank of ... Home Savings Bank, ... Salem Five Cents Sa ... and the Burlington Ar ... Burlington. These show ... addition to the regular p ... gallery of the association ... street, Boston.

The current Symphony Ha ... exhibition is one of the larger ... The committee has receive ... merous compliments for the ... ty of work shown. The exhi ... is in connection with the ... Symphony Orchestra concert ... the direct ... noted cellist mem ... the orchestra. The associatio ... accepted an invitation to exhi ... the opening of the Boston ... phony's 1957 season.

Beginning in January, the ... schedule is for exhibitions at ... Marblehead, Amherst, Athol ... Bedford, Mass., and Kenn ... Me. Tentative dates for sho ... Gardner, Springfield and ... ence, R. I., are now being ...

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Heights Press
Circ. W. 2,050
DEC 27 1956

Boston Symphony Makes Magic (With Dignity) at Music Academy

By Jerry Clarke Dec. 14

Precision and restraint can make for very dull music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch was very precise, very restrained two Fridays ago at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Fortunately, the Boston Symphony gave us more. Mainly magic, I think. Take Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. It evoked reminiscences of nature so compelling that the air and light in the Academy's Opera House seemed to shift with the mood of the music. There were clouds and wind and water.

Mostly sunshine, though. Beethoven's idealized response to nature was filled with fields and trees and birds. What wonderfull birds Mr. Munch was able to summon up for us Friday evening.

W. B. Yeats described one once as having " . . . such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make / Of hammered gold and gold enameling / To keep a drowsy emperor awake; / Or set upon a golden bough to sing / To lords and ladies of Byzantium . . . " He might have said Boston. Certainly this bird must nest in the vicinity of Beacon hill.

On another plane, one can say that the Boston Symphony gave an utterly "U" performance. Of course, if we start applying Nancy Mitford's terms, "U" and "non-U", to music, we run the risk of starting a deluge of discussion, but they are certainly brought to mind by the aristocratic orchestra from Boston. It seems incapable of making an even slightly "non-U" sound, and certainly unlikely to display any "non-U" emotional excesses.

Samuel Barber ineptly asked Mr. Munch and his orchestra to "project the psychological state of jealousy and vengeance" in a fully orchestrated snippet from his ballet, "Medea." The section played by the Boston Symphony was entitled "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance." But it was only from his program notes, and certainly not from his music that we were able to ascertain Mr. Barber's aims. His conception of jealousy and revenge is very "U," very well-mannered. In fact, it "projected" rather prettily.

Short, staccato trumpet phrases set against the rising and falling of divided string sections; that's about all there was to it.

By the time Mr. Munch and his orchestra layed on their unique variety of gold enameling, little remained to excite the ear, or to offend the psychological orientations of the most sensitive Bostonian, and I suppose that goes for Brooklynites, too.

Much more worthwhile was Stravinsky's ballet music called "Jeu de Carte," or more completely, "Card Game in Three Deals." It dates back to 1936, but for some reason has never gained the popularity its surface appearance would warrant. Nevertheless, this piece apparently made a big impression on the audience at the Academy of Music.

As strong and as angular as it is, this music also came off as an exercise in grace and refinement, precision and restraint.

It could have been dull, but elegance redeemed all.

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000
DEC 13 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. ...

SOCIETA CORELLI PERFORMS

by ROBERT F. GARIS

Duo di Roma, Trio di Trieste, Quartetto Italiano, Quintette Boccherini, Virtuosi di Roma, I Musici, Societa Corelli — on they come out of Italy in endless and glorious proliferation. And on they go, thanks to the Mason Music Foundation, to the stage of Jordan Hall.

The last named of these distinguished ensembles, now on its third American tour, consists of a dozen string players and a pianist and concentrates upon the rich literature of the Italian baroque masters. Previously here in October, the Societa returned last week for a brace of concerts devoted to the works of Corelli, Vivaldi, Handel, Bach, Flocco, Mannino and Bartok. Unhappily, I was able to hear only the first of the two programs, but that was sufficient for me to conclude that this group's advance reputation for tonal balance and for highly sensitive, finely chiseled musicianship was more than justified.

This was the case even though the performance in general never caught fire until the concluding Bartok Divertimento for Strings and in fact was marred by an inadvertent mishap or two by the soloist, Silvane Zuccherini, in his rendering of the Flocco G major Cello Concerto. Fatigue seemed the obvious cause.

Though contemporary music is said not be the Societa Corelli's metier, it was in the late work of Bartok aforementioned, with its jagged pattern of cross-rhythms, amazing sonorities, eclectic traversal of styles and witty commentary, that the ensemble achieved its highest level of performance. And that was very high level indeed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Editor's Note: Mr. Garis is a contributor to the Music Department of The Nation Magazine.

The music Mr. Munch chose to play on the evening of December 8 was all rather mild and so were the performances. This might at first glance seem only appropriate, but in music a mild performance of anything has a way of seeming trivial.

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is, of course, gloriously mild, the genial good humor of a mind incapable of triviality. As for the other two pieces on the program — Britten's Variations for String Orchestra, on a theme by Frank Bridge and Ibert's 'Escales' — I call them "mild" as a polite way of raising the question whether they are interesting enough to warrant the orchestra's labor and the audience's attention. My own opinion is that they aren't and I suspect Mr. Munch of agreeing with me. At least his perfunctory readings suggested lack of interest in the music. But then so did his reading of the Beethoven. An off-night, you might say, if it were not that this routine blandness of music-making happens pretty often at Symphony Hall these days.

Britten's Variations are an engaging series of what might be called musical impersonations: the disguises are cleverly fashioned and entertaining without quite reaching the level of distinguished art. Nevertheless, this is a decent show-piece for the Boston strings, and if Mr. Munch had taken it seriously everybody would have enjoyed listening to what these superb musicians can do. But though the sound was always of a lovely refinement, the men seemed unwilling to leave the middle of the road. One heard a self-satisfied complacency instead of the true professional fire of virtuosity. The fortissimos lacked body and sheer volume (is the cello-section really disappearing?), the assertive passages lacked bite, even the quiet passages sounded somehow, hardly quiet.

• • •

And the same was true of the performance of 'Escales,' a derivative cream-puff for the impressionistic orchestra. In the oriental second movement, however, Mr. Gomberg took his oboe solo seriously and played with an exciting sensitivity that was very much worth hearing.

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is hard enough to play to make almost any failure at it an honorable one. It is serene without being passive, spirited without being nervous. It's musical progress is unusually repetitive but by no means so merely meandering as it seemed last Saturday. Also, the dynamic range of this score should be what Beethoven asked for. Mr. Munch seemed oddly distrustful of Beethoven's judgment in this respect. It was as if, having decided that this music was essentially quiet and relaxed, he took it on himself to make little corrections in the score. He softened and slowed everything down to fit his own conception, which to this reviewer's ears is not as interesting or noble as Beethoven's. The slow movement, for instance, was sleepy and weak rather than spacious and the woodwinds, in particular, were kept to a dimly fragrant tone which was beautiful in itself but often simply unsuitable to its musical purpose. The thunderstorm was a pale and pitiful affair and this was fatal to the dimension of the whole work. For if you soft-pedal this drama of nature, you give the impression of patronizing Beethoven's descriptive technique and the 'Pastoral' ends up by sounding like a quaint curio from older days.

It's still a great orchestra, our Boston Symphony. This reviewer went to last Saturday's concert with the beautiful sound of the Vienna Philharmonic still in his ears, yet it was a pleasure all over again to hear the special qualities of the local organization: the elegant refinement of its over-all sound, the beautiful individuality of texture in the various voices. But this superb instrument needs a real work-out.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
Post & Times Herald
Circ. D. 360,624 - S. 410,185
DEC 1 6 1956

The Music Box

Munch Opens 'Season' Here

By Paul Hume

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, plays in Washington for the first time this season next Thursday when it presents the Beethoven Symphonies No. 6 and No. 7 in the Constitution Hall series. Munch will also play a good deal of music by Mozart, Berlioz, Bach and Bee-thoven in a concert on Friday in the Institute of Musical Art auditorium. Shankar and his Hindu ensemble will give a concert on Friday night in the Constitution Hall series, presenting a program of music for the sitar, tabla, tanpura and other instruments. The Shankar concert will be in the auditorium of the Institute of Musical Art, which is a branch of the Juilliard School of Music. Shankar will be accompanied by a Hindu percussionist.

At 7:30 p. m. Sunday in the Central Presbyterian Church, Dr. Frederick Haberlen, minister, will give the Saint-Saëns Oratorio, and the story of Christmas by Matthews. The Montgomery County A Capella Chorus will sing, directed by Max Seebold, in a new version of "The Night Before Christmas" at Beverly Elementary School, on Saturday at 8 p. m.

Reformation Church continues its Sunday in Advent evenings of music from around the world with a program on the 16th from countries of eastern Europe. These are at 7:45.

Tomorrow night the University of Maryland Women's Chorus, under Louise Payler, sings the Britten Ceremony of Carols, and works by Bach, Pergolesi and Niles. Time is 8 p. m., in the University Chapel.

TOMORROW THE Commerce Symphony, under Nicholas Pappas, plays at 8:15 in the Commerce Auditorium: Haydn: Symphony No. 104; Handel: Pastoral Symphony; Bach: Air.

Wednesday evening at 9 p. m., the A Capella Choir of Catholic University, directed by the Rev. Russell Woollen, sings a Christmas program in the Pan American Union. Tickets are available free from the Pan Am bookshop.

Edith Piaf is moving into—of all places—Constitution Hall. Saturday, Jan. 5, she will sing there, with tickets from the Hayes Bureau. She brings a company.

And tonight from 8 to 9:30 on NBC-TV, you can see and hear Boris Christoff, Marian Anderson, Victoria de los Angeles, Richard Tucker, Elizabeth Doubleday, Andres Segovia, Artur Rubinstein and an orchestra under Alfred Wallenstein. Free, and in color.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 345,604 - S. 477,285
DEC 1 6 1956

of a strategic ... be the index ... which tomor ...

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 8,809
DEC 1 4 1956

North Shore Arts Exhibit Praised At Symphony Hall

Members of the North Shore Arts Association, in connection with activities of its Boston Gallery Circuit exhibitions, are at present showing in group exhibitions consisting of from three to 30 works.

Current shows are at Symphony Hall, First National Bank of Boston, Home Savings Bank, all in Boston; Salem Five Cents Savings Bank, and the Burlington Art Gallery, Burlington. These shows are in addition to the regular permanent gallery of the association at 11 Kingston street, Boston.

The current Symphony Hall exhibition is one of the larger shows. The committee has received numerous compliments for the quality of work shown. The exhibition is in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The exhibition is under the direction of Karl Zeise, noted cellist member of the orchestra. The association has accepted an invitation to exhibit at the opening of the Boston Symphony's 1957 season.

Beginning in January, the Circuit schedule is for exhibitions at Lynn, Marblehead, Amherst, Athol, New Bedford, Mass., and Kennebunk, Me. Tentative dates for shows in Gardner, Springfield and Providence, R. I., are now being made.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Heights Press
Circ. W. 2,050
DEC 27 1956

Boston Symphony Makes Magic (With Dignity) at Music Academy

By Jerry Clarke

Precision and restraint can make for very dull music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch was very precise, very restrained two Fridays ago at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Fortunately, the Boston Symphony gave us more. Mainly magic, I think. Take Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. It evoked reminiscences of nature so compelling that the air and light in the Academy's Opera House seemed to shift with the mood of the music. There were clouds and wind and water.

Mostly sunshine, though. Beethoven's idealized response to nature was filled with fields and trees and birds. What wonderfull birds Mr. Munch was able to summon up for us Friday evening.

W. B. Yeats described one once as having " . . . such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make / Of hammered gold and gold enameling / To keep a drowsy emperor awake; / Or set upon a golden bough to sing / To lords and ladies of Byzantium . . . " He might have said Boston. Certainly this bird must nest in the vicinity of Beacon hill.

On another plane, one can say that the Boston Symphony gave an utterly "U" performance. Of course, if we start applying Nancy Mitford's terms, "U" and "non-U", to music, we run the risk of starting a deluge of discussion, but they are certainly brought to mind by the aristocratic orchestra from Boston. It seems incapable of making an even slightly "non-U" sound, and certainly unlikely to display any "non-U" emotional excesses.

Samuel Barber ineptly asked Mr. Munch and his orchestra to "project the psychological state of jealousy and vengeance" in a fully orchestrated snippet from his ballet, "Medea." The section played by the Boston Symphony was entitled "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance." But it was only from his program notes, and certainly not from his program notes, and certainly not from his music that we were able to ascertain Mr. Barber's aims. His conception of jealousy and revenge is very "U," very well-mannered. In fact, it "projected" rather prettily.

Short, staccato trumpet phrases set against the rising and falling of divided string sections; that's about all there was to it.

By the time Mr. Munch and his orchestra layed on their unique variety of gold enameling, little remained to excite the ear, or to offend the psychological orientations of the most sensitive Bostonian, and I suppose that goes for Brooklynites, too.

Much more worthwhile was Stravinsky's ballet music called "Jeu de Carte," or more completely, "Card Game in Three Deals." It dates back to 1936, but for some reason has never gained the popularity its surface appearance would warrant. Nevertheless, this piece apparently made a big impression on the audience at the Academy of Music.

As strong and as angular as it is, this music also came off as an exercise in grace and refinement, precision and restraint.

It could have been dull, but elegance redeemed all.

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000
DEC 1 3 1956

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

SOCIETA CORELLI PERFORMS

by ROBERT E. GARIS

Duo di Roma, Trio di Trieste, Quartetto Italiano, Quintetto Boccherini, Virtuosi di Roma, I Musici, Societa Corelli — on they come out of Italy in endless and glorious proliferation. And on they go, thanks to the Mason Music Foundation, to the stage of Jordan Hall.

The last named of these distinguished ensembles, now on its third American tour, consists of a dozen string players and a pianist and concentrates upon the rich literature of the Italian baroque masters. Previously here in October, the Societa returned last week for a brace of concerts devoted to the works of Corelli, Vivaldi, Handel, Bach, Fiocco, Mannino and Bartok. Unhappily, I was able to hear only the first of the two programs, but that was sufficient for me to conclude that this group's advance reputation for tonal balance and for highly sensitive, finely chiseled musicianship was more than justified.

This was the case even though the performance in general never caught fire until the concluding Bartok Divertimento for Strings and in fact was marred by an inadvertent mishap or two by the soloist, Silvano Zuccharini, in his rendering of the Fiocco G major Cello Concerto. Fatigue seemed the obvious cause.

Though contemporary music is said not be the Societa Corelli's metier, it was in the late work of Bartok aforementioned, with its jagged pattern of cross-rhythms, amazing sonorities, eclestic traversal of styles and witty commentary, that the ensemble achieved its highest level of performance. And that was very high level indeed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Editor's Note: Mr. Garis is a contributor to the Music Department of The Nation Magazine.

The music Mr. Munch chose to play on the evening of December 8 was all rather mild and so were the performances. This might at first glance seem only appropriate, but in music a mild performance of anything has a way of seeming trivial.

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is, of course, gloriously mild, the genial good humor of a mind incapable of triviality. As for the other two pieces on the program — Britten's Variations for String Orchestra, on a theme by Frank Bridge and Ibert's 'Escales' — I call them "mild", as a polite way of raising the question whether they are interesting enough to warrant the orchestra's labor and the audience's attention. My own opinion is that they aren't and I suspect Mr. Munch of agreeing with me. At least his perfunctory readings suggested lack of interest in the music. But then so did his reading of the Beethoven. An off-night, you might say, if it were not that this routine blandness of music-making happens pretty often at Symphony Hall these days.

Britten's Variations are an engaging series of what might be called musical impersonations: the disguises are cleverly fashioned and entertaining without quite reaching the level of distinguished art. Nevertheless, this is a decent show-piece for the Boston strings, and if Mr. Munch had taken it seriously everybody would have enjoyed listening to what these superb musicians can do. But though the sound was always of a lovely refinement, the men seemed unwilling to leave the middle of the road. One heard a self-satisfied complacency instead of the true professional fire of virtuosity. The fortissimos lacked body and sheer volume (is the cello-section really disappearing?), the assertive passages lacked bite, even the quiet passages sounded, somehow, hardly quiet.

* * *

And the same was true of the performance of 'Escales,' a derivative cream-puff for the impressionistic orchestra. In the oriental second movement, however, Mr. Gomberg took his oboe solo seriously and played with an exciting sensitivity that was very much worth hearing.

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is hard enough to play to make almost any failure at it an honorable one. It is serene without being passive, spirited without being nervous. It's musical progress is unusually repetitive but by no means so merely meandering as it seemed last Saturday. Also, the dynamic range of this score should be what Beethoven asked for. Mr. Munch seemed oddly distrustful of Beethoven's judgment in this respect. It was as if, having decided that this music was essentially quiet and relaxed, he took it on himself to make little corrections in the score. He softened and slowed everything down to fit his own conception, which to this reviewer's ears is not as interesting or noble as Beethoven's. The slow movement, for instance, was sleepy and weak rather than spacious and the woodwinds, in particular, were kept to a dimly fragrant tone which was beautiful in itself but often simply unsuitable to its musical purpose. The thunderstorm was a pale and pitiful affair and this was fatal to the dimension of the whole work. For if you soft-pedal this drama of nature, you give the impression of patronizing Beethoven's descriptive technique and the 'Pastoral' ends up by sounding like a quaint curio from older days.

It's still a great orchestra, our Boston Symphony. This reviewer went to last Saturday's concert with the beautiful sound of the Vienna Philharmonic still in his ears, yet it was a pleasure all over again to hear the special qualities of the local organization: the elegant refinement of its over-all sound, the beautiful individuality of texture in the various voices. But this superb instrument needs a real work-out.

UConn Campus

...phony" is playing a chorale against slashing figures ... the strings always brings the work to a stirring finish.

168

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,57
DEC 13 1956

Irmgard Seefried Sings Bach With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

If variety was the keynote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night in Carnegie Hall, its contrasts were unconventional but welcome.

The combination of Irmgard Seefried, Austrian soprano, singing Bach, and Honegger's Second Symphony made up the first half of the concert. In opening the evening the Honegger composition gave us music which in its initial two movements is somber, brooding, even resentful. Composed in 1941, the symphony thus wears the mood of Frenchmen living in occupied Paris, and the composer has movingly recreated their feelings. This music is compelling in its expressions of irony and bitterness. Portions of it appear contrived, but, on the whole, its content is impressive.

The surprise of the four trumpets in the final portion of the concluding vivace is a sudden thrust of glory amidst the darkness. They double with the violins on a hymn tune, and their joyousness exuberantly expresses the thought of liberation.

Miss Seefried's beautiful soaring soprano enhanced Bach's "Wedding Cantata," an apostrophe to spring and love. It appeared significant that she followed this by three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben," which she performed with more subjectivity than she had in the Bach.

Could it have been by accident that Mme. Seefried, soon herself to become a mother, chose at this time to sing of the birth of Mary and the birth of Christ? In any case, the Hindemith songs, set to poems by Rilke, based on the life of the Virgin Mary, were poignant and noble in expression, and were sung with ecstatic sincerity by the soprano. Munch and the ensemble provided an accompaniment which was musically sensitive and well modulated in relation to the voice.

The effulgence of the Bostonians' tone, and their technical brilliance as well as Munch's ability to cast a spell with a picturesque French score were all illustrated by the final "Bacchus et Ariane," the suite from the second act of Roussel's ballet of the same name.

The composer evokes a chameleon palette of colors and moods as he takes us from a dreaming Ariane to one who awakes and goes into plenty of action with and without Bacchus. It all culminates in a dance by the two, followed by a final Bacchanale.

The Bostonians play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night and repeat the following program Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes"; "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," Op. 23-A, by Samuel Barber.

N. Y. Sinfonia Plays

The New York Sinfonia, which played its first concert last night in Town Hall with Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, as soloist, will return Wednesday night, Jan. 23, for its second and final event of the season. Clayton Westermann conducts the group, which consists of a basic unit of 14 strings. Soloists for the next concert will be Joseph Fuchs, violinist, and Lillian Fuchs, violist. The program will include one of Mozart's most beautiful works for chamber ensemble, the Symphonie Concertante for Solo Violin and Viola. Compositions by Bloch, Bartok and Tansman complete the program.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
DEC 13 1956

CARNEGIE HALL:

Miss Seefried Shines

By MILES KASTENDIECK

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC dominated Charles Munch's program for the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. A provocative symphony of Honegger, three songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleban," and the second suite of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" represented music composed within the last quarter century. It made good listening.

The most winning of these numbers was the Hindemith, beautifully sung by Irmgard Seefried. She gave his music color and warmth in her pure-toned singing and interpretative understanding.

In revised form these songs of the birth of Mary, Joseph's doubt, and the birth of Christ have been enriched not only through their orchestral dress but also in Hendemith's deeper insight into the expressivity of music. They made a strong impression on the audience.

Playing Restrained

The most elusive work was Honegger's Second Symphony for Strings with the surprise entry of trumpets in the third movement. This music evolves from foreboding somberness to hopefulness through an undercurrent of counterpoint and rhythm that is quite individual. It grows on acquaintance, but the performance was too restrained last night, to convey the intensity of its feeling.

The showiest music was the Roussel which found the full orchestra in top form; but then, this is a Munch warhorse.

Earlier in the program Miss Seefried sang Bach's "Wedding" Cantata for Soprano, No. 202, assisted by Richard Burgin, violin, Ralph Gomberg, oboe and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.

The performance was almost too small-scaled. Nor did the performers quite catch the spirit so that both work and performance held interest (even though by Bach). Coming as it did within 24 hours after the performance of Orff's wedding piece, it presented a complete anti-thesis in its purity—and dullness. For once 18th and 20th century music were not too compatible on the same program.

K, N. Y.
RIBUNE
- S. 528,253
4 1956

K, N. Y.
RIBUNE
S. 528,253
13 1956

ony Heard all Concert

that a Bach can

Symphony Heard negie Hall Concert

arrison
Orchestra

soloists, Richard mberg, oboe, and ord.
Orchestra
Honegger
etruebte Schatnter shadows")
.....Bach
en" for Soprano
.....Hindemith
e No. 2, Op. 43
Roussel

It is to the boundless credit of the Boston Symphony that what ever the orchestra plays emerges as a classic. Last night at Carnegie Hall, for example, the ensemble, under Charles Munch's direction, offered a program that featured not a single number from the workaday repertoire; yet, through the majesty of its performance and the ease of its execution, the Boston men managed to make each piece sound as though it had been their exclusive property from the moment the ink dired on the score.

Honegger's Second Symphony —to cite a case in point—I did not find a very attractive piece, nor even a remotely engaging one. Aside from a haunting and elegiac opening, its developments seem contrived, its harmony undefined and its rhythm halting and limp. Still, given a wreath of velvet string sonorities and the work begins to jell, begins to make the kind of sense that its printed notes do not. In lesser hands the symphony moves dumbly and is barely able to keep from collapsing. But the Boston Symphony makes it speak with eloquence and gives it a spine of brass.

One would also be led to consider that a Bach cantata played by a handful of strings, an oboe and a harpsichord has no place in the wide and open spaces of a Carnegie Hall. And valid the consideration might be were it not for the presence last night of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists and a soprano whose way with a curling phrase is one of the bounties of our time. Irmgard Seefried, once she had brushed away the few barbs that clung to the top of her voice, set sail on a sea of Bachian invention and made every measure ripple and roll and toss as its course demanded.

Much the same might be remarked of the three "Marienleben" songs, which in their original version with piano accompaniment served as a landmark of neo-classicism. Decked out orchestrally, the songs have a tendency to go a mite flabby and soft, their counterpoint inclining to smear and blur, but they are animated by nobility of expression and deep religious feeling. That, at any rate, is how they were read by Miss Seefried, for which reason they communicated fully and tenderly.

DECEMBER 13, 1956 NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND SUN

Music

Boston Concert Has Tribute to Virgin Mary

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A beautiful musical tribute to the Virgin Mary — beautifully written and beautifully sung — was heard as part of the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night.

The work was Paul Hindemith's warm and sensitive settings for soprano and orchestra of three excerpts from Karl Maria Rilke's cycle of poems on the life of the Mother of Jesus.

The singer was Irmgard Seefried, the lovely and gifted Viennese artist who made her debut at the Metropolitan in 1953, one decade after her triumphant bow at home on the stage of the Vienna Opera.

Perfect Fusion.

Miss Seefried supplied the perfect fusion of style, voice and temperament for Hindemith's searching and soaring songs. There was abundant warmth and superb technic to the readings — and a piety always tender and human.

Charles Munch and the orchestra gave the accomplished soloist fine-spun support in the way of dynamics, with that added something that affords such accompaniments the quality of both comment and expansion.

Earlier on the program, Miss Seefried was also heard as soloist in Bach's "Wedding Cantata" — a nuptial hymn which, compared to Carl Orff's bridal festivity heard the night before was a Victorian nursery charade.

Recitatives vs. Arias.

For some reason, Miss Seefried, for all her sincere art, stay and round tone, was not quite as successful in Bach last night as she was in Hindemith. While the recitatives were warm and forceful, the arias were not.

Neither was the orchestra at its best in applying Bach's delicate commentary to the singing. Only the violin solo was truly in the vein. Both the oboe and harpsichord were a little on the recessive side.

Other numbers last night were Honegger's Second Symphony, for String Orchestra and that heaving fabric of symphonic revelry, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Suite No. 2.

The Honegger score, tense and angry from the mood of occupied Paris in 1941, received model treatment as to texture and motion, but somewhat less than its due of internal combustion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 13 1956

Music: Works by 2 Modern Masters

Honegger, Hindemith Scores Are Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

HONEGGER and Hindemith, modern masters at their best, were represented by some of their finest product at last night's Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All that Charles Munch, the conductor, sought to do was to present music he believed in. But the power with which these pieces dominated the program and touched the heart was a reminder that the art of music is far from exhausted, no matter how many requiems the gloomy ones may say over it.

•

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 gains in stature with each hearing. The inscription it bears, "Paris, October, 1941," is a bitter reminder of the time and place of its composition. While the composer provided no literal scenario for the thoughts and emotions that stirred him, it is clear from the clashing turbulence of the first movement and the somber gravity of the second that this is a sensitive musician's account of the agony of occupied France.

All this Honegger says with the strings alone. In the final movement he introduces the trumpets to sing a chorale that is like a glorious call to [illegible]

When Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist, Mr. Munch presented three songs from Hindemith's "Lieder aus dem Marienleben." These songs, drawn from a cycle based on Rilke's poems on the life of Mary, were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ."

The songs captured the simple, devout spirit of the poems. Hindemith can be dry and academic, but here he sings serenely and affectingly. It is interesting to recall that his first version of the cycle was written when he was 27 and that twenty-five years later he returned to it.

Acting on a belief in "the ethical necessity of music and the moral obligation of its composer," he undertook to improve the work, to shape it more in keeping with the essential content of the poems and the capacities of the human voice. "The Birth of Christ" was revised most drastically, the composer confessed. It is now a noble song.

•

Miss Seefried sang this music with stirring conviction. Where her performance had been on the surface of the Bach cantata earlier in the program, she conveyed a sense of identification with Hindemith's music. The voice was better focused and securer at the top, and her phrasing had perception.

Mr. Munch, who seldom arranges a program without one of his specialties, had Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 for this occasion. Bach cantatas, however, rarely appear at orchestral concerts. For this one, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," the conductor used a small group of strings, and the capable instrumental soloists were Richard Burgin, violinist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichordist.

This is Bach in a mild, sweet-tempered mood, and the performance was appropriately modest. It is worth noting that this is a "wedding" cantata. On Tuesday night the Philadelphia Orchestra brought us Carl Orff's often literal celebration of love and marriage. With the Boston Symphony bringing up the same subject last night, it began to look as if our orchestras were determined to make June bust out in December.

Irmgard Seefried

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Charles Munch conducting, Irmgard Seefried, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.

Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger
Cantata, Weichet nur, betrueble Schatten ..... Bach
Songs from Aus dem Marienleben ..... Hindemith
Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2 ..... Roussel

Miss Seefried Sings With Bostonians

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,57

DEC 13 1956

Irmgard Seefried Sings Bach With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

If variety was the keynote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night in Carnegie Hall, its contrasts were unconventional but welcome.

The combination of Irmgard Seefried, Austrian soprano, singing Bach, and Honegger's Second Symphony made up the first half of the concert. In opening the evening, the Honegger composition gave us music which in its initial two movements is somber, brooding, even resentful. Composed in 1941, the symphony thus wears the mood of Frenchmen living in occupied Paris, and the composer has movingly recreated their feelings. This music is compelling in its expressions of irony and bitterness. Portions of it appear contrived, but, on the whole, its content is impressive.

The surprise of the four trumpets in the final portion of the concluding vivace is a sudden thrust of glory amidst the darkness. They double with the violins on a hymn tune, and their joyousness exuberantly expresses the thought of liberation.

Miss Seefried's beautiful, soaring soprano enhanced Bach's "Wedding Cantata," an apostrophe to spring and love. It appeared significant that she followed this by three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben," which she performed with more subjectivity than she had in the Bach.

Could it have been by accident that Mme. Seefried, soon herself to become a mother, chose at this time to sing of the birth of Mary and the birth of Christ? In any case, the Hindemith songs, set to poems by Rilke, based on the life of the Virgin Mary, are poignant and noble in expression, and were sung with ecstatic sincerity by the soprano. Munch and the ensemble provided an accompaniment which was musically sensitive and well modulated in relation to the voice.

The effulgence of the Bostonians' tone, and their technical brilliance as well as Munch's ability to cast a spell with a picturesque French score were all illustrated by the final "Bacchus et Ariane," the suite from the second act of Roussel's ballet of the same name.

The composer evokes a chameleon palette of colors and moods as he takes us from a dreaming Ariane to one who awakes and goes into plenty of action with and without Bacchus. It all culminates in a dance by the two, followed by a final Bacchanale.

The Bostonians play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night and repeat the following program Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes"; "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," Op. 23-A, by Samuel Barber.

N. Y. Sinfonia Plays

The New York Sinfonia, which played its first concert last night in Town Hall with Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, as soloist, will return Wednesday night, Jan. 23, for its second and final event of the season. Clayton Westermann conducts the group, which consists of a basic unit of 14 strings. Soloists for the next concert will be Joseph Fuchs, violinist, and Lillian Fuchs, violist. The program will include one of Mozart's most beautiful works for chamber ensemble, the Symphonie Concertante for Solo Violin and Viola. Compositions by Bloch, Bartok and Tansman complete the program.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

DEC 13 1956

CARNEGIE HALL:

Miss Seefried Shines

By MILES KASTENDIECK

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC dominated Charles Munch's program for the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. A provocative symphony of Honegger, three songs from Hindemith's "Das Marienleben," and the second suite of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" represented music composed within the last quarter century. It made good listening.

The most winning of these numbers was the Hindemith, beautifully sung by Irmgard Seefried. She gave his music color and warmth in her pure-toned singing and interpretative understanding.

In revised form these songs, of the birth of Mary, Joseph's doubt, and the birth of Christ have been enriched not only through their orchestral dress but also in Hendemith's deeper insight into the expressivity of music. They made a strong impression on the audience.

Playing Restrained

The most elusive work was Honegger's Second Symphony for Strings with the surprise entry of trumpets in the third movement. This music evolves from foreboding somberness to hopefulness through an undercurrent of counterpoint and rhythm that is quite individual. It grows on acquaintance, but the performance was too restrained last night to convey the intensity of its feeling.

The showiest music was the Roussel which found the full orchestra in top form; but then, this is a Munch warhorse.

Earlier in the program Miss Seefried sang Bach's "Wedding" Cantata for Soprano, No. 202, assisted by Richard Burgin, violin, Ralph Gomberg, oboe and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.

The performance was almost too small-scaled. Nor did the performers quite catch the spirit so that both work and performance held interest (even though by Bach). Coming as it did within 24 hours after the performance of Orff's wedding piece, it presented a complete anti-thesis in its purity—and dullness. For once 18th and 20th century music were not too compatible on the same program.

DECEMBER 13 '56 NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND SUN

Music

Boston Concert Has Tribute to Virgin Mary

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A beautiful musical tribute to the Virgin Mary — beautifully written and beautifully sung— was heard as part of the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night.

The work was Paul Hindemith's warm and sensitive settings for soprano and orchestra of three excerpts from Karl Maria Rilke's cycle of poems on the life of the Mother of Jesus.

The singer was Irmgard Seefried, the lovely and gifted Viennese artist who made her debut at the Metropolitan in 1953, one decade after her triumphant bow at home on the stage of the Vienna Opera.

Perfect Fusion.

Miss Seefried supplied the perfect fusion of style, voice and temperament for Hindemith's searching and soaring songs. There was abundant warmth and superb technic to the readings — and a piety always tender and human.

Charles Munch and the orchestra gave the accomplished soloist fine-spun support in the way of dynamics, with that added something that affords such accompaniments the quality of both comment and expansion.

Earlier on the program, Miss Seefried was also heard as soloist in Bach's "Wedding Cantata"—a nuptial hymn which, compared to Carl Orff's bridal festivity heard the night before was a Victorian nursery charade.

Recitatives vs. Arias.

For some reason, Miss Seefried, for all her sincere artstry and round tone, was not quite as successful in Bach last night as she was in Hindemith. While the recitatives were warm and forecful, the arias were not.

Neither was the orchestra at its best in applying Bach's delicate commentary to the singing. Only the violin solo was truly in the vein. Both the oboe and harpsichord were a little on the recessive side.

Other numbers last night were Honegger's Second Symphony, for String Orchestra, and that heaving fabric of symphonic revelry, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Suite No. 2.

The Honegger score, tense and angry from the mood of occupied Paris in 1941, received model treatment as to texture and motion, but somewhat less than its due of internal combustion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

DEC 13 1956

Music: Works by 2 Modern Masters

Honegger, Hindemith Scores Are Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

HONEGGER and Hindemith, modern masters at their best, were represented by some of their finest product at last night's Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All that Charles Munch, the conductor, sought to do was to present music he believed in. But the power with which these pieces dominated the program and touched the heart was a reminder that the art of music is far from exhausted, no matter how many requiems the gloomy ones may say over it.

•

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 gains in stature with each hearing. The inscription it bears, "Paris, October, 1941," is a bitter reminder of the time and place of its composition. While the composer provided no literal scenario for the thoughts and emotions that stirred him, it is clear from the clashing turbulence of the first movement and the somber gravity of the second that this is a sensitive musician's account of the agony of occupied France.

All this Honegger says with the strings alone. In the final movement he introduces the trumpets to sing a chorale that is like a glorious call to hope.

With Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist, Mr. Munch presented three songs from Hindemith's "Lieder aus dem Marienleben." These songs, drawn from a cycle based on Rilke's poems on the life of Mary, were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ."

The songs captured the simple, devout spirit of the poems. Hindemith can be dry and academic, but here he sings serenely and affectingly. It is interesting to recall that his first version of the cycle was written when he was 27 and that twenty-five years later he returned to it.

Acting on a belief in "the ethical necessity of music and the moral obligation of its composer," he undertook to improve the work, to shape it more in keeping with the essential content of the poems and the capacities of the human voice. "The Birth of Christ" was revised most drastically, the composer confessed. It is now a noble song.

•

Miss Seefried sang this music with stirring conviction. Where her performance had been on the surface of the Bach cantata earlier in the program, she conveyed a sense of identification with Hindemith's music. The voice was better focused and securer at the top, and her phrasing had perception.

Mr. Munch, who seldom arranges a program without one of his specialties, had Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 for this occasion. Bach cantatas, however, rarely appear at orchestral concerts. For this one, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," the conductor used a small group of strings, and the capable instrumental soloists were Richard Burgin, violinist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichordist.

This is Bach in a mild, sweet-tempered mood, and the performance was appropriately modest. It is worth noting that this is a "wedding" cantata. On Tuesday night the Philadelphia Orchestra brought us Carl Orff's often literal celebration of love and marriage. With the Boston Symphony bringing up the same subject last night it began to look as if our orchestras were determined to make June bust out in December.

Irmgard Seefried

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Charles Munch conducting. Irmgard Seefried, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.

Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger

Cantata, Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten ..... Bach

Songs from Aus dem Marienleben ..... Hindemith

Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2 ..... Roussel

Miss Seefried Sings With Bostonians

N. Y.
RIBUNE
S

4 1956

N. Y.
RIBUNE
S. 526

13 1956

ony Heard all Concert

that a Bach cantata

Symphony Heard
negie Hall Concert

arrison
Orchestra

soloists: Richard mberg, oboe, and ord.
Orchestra
Honeggeretruebte Schatten
Bach
en" for Soprano
Hindemith
e No. 2, Op. 43
Roussel

It is to the boundless credit of the Boston Symphony that what ever the orchestra plays emerges as a classic. Last night at Carnegie Hall, for example, the ensemble, under Charles Munch's direction, offered a program that featured not a single number from the workaday repertoire; yet, through the majesty of its performance and the ease of its execution, the Boston men managed to make each piece sound as though it had been their exclusive property from the moment the ink dired on the score.

Honegger's Secord Symphony —to cite a case in point—I did not find a very attractive piece, nor even a remotely engaging one. Aside from a haunting and elegiac opening, its developments seem contrived, its harmony undefined and its rhythm halting and limp. Still, given a wreath of velvet string sonorities and the work begins to jell, begins to make the kind of sense that its printed notes do not. In lesser hands the symphony moves dumbly and is barely able to keep from collapsing. But the Boston Symphony makes it speak with eloquence and gives it a spine of brass.

One would also be led to consider that a Bach cantata played by a handful of strings, an oboe and a harpsichord has no place in the wide and open spaces of a Carnegie Hall. And valid the consideration might be were it not for the presence last night of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists and a soprano whose way with a curling phrase is one of the bounties of our time. Irmgard Seefried, once she had brushed away the few barbs that clung to the top of her voice, set sail on a sea of Bachian invention and made every measure ripple and roll and toss as its course demanded.

Much the same might be remarked of the three "Marienleben" songs, which in their original version with piano accompaniment served as a landmark of neo-classicism. Decked out orchestrally, the songs have a tendency to go a mite flabby and soft, their counterpoint inclining to smear and blur, but they are animated by nobility of expression and deep religious feeling. That, at any rate, is how they were read by Miss Seefried, for which reason they communicated fully and tenderly.

168

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,57
DEC 13 1956

Irmgard Seefried Sings Bach With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

If variety was the keynote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night in Carnegie Hall, its contrasts were unconventional but welcome.

The combination of Irmgard Seefried, Austrian soprano, singing Bach, and Honegger's Second Symphony made up the first half of the concert. In opening the event, the Honegger composition gave us music which in its initial two movements is somber, brooding, even resentful. Composed in 1941, the symphony thus wears the mood of Frenchmen living in occupied Paris, and the composer has movingly recreated their feelings. This music is compelling in its expressions of irony and bitterness. Portions of it appear contrived, but, on the whole, its content is impressive.

The surprise of the four trumpets in the final portion of the concluding vivace is a sudden thrust of glory amidst the darkness. They double with the violins on a hymn tune, and their joyousness exuberantly expresses the thought of liberation.

Miss Seefried's beautiful soaring soprano enhanced Bach's "Wedding Cantata," an apostrophe to spring and love. It appeared significant that she followed this by three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben," which she performed with more subjectivity than she had in the Bach.

Could it have been by accident that Mme. Seefried, soon herself to become a mother, chose at this time to sing of the birth of Mary and the birth of Christ? In any case, the Hindemith songs, set to poems by Rilke, based on the life of the Virgin Mary, were poignant and noble in expression, and were sung with ecstatic sincerity by the soprano. Munch and the ensemble provided an accompaniment which was musically sensitive and well modulated in relation to the voice.

The effulgence of the Bostonians' tone, and their technical brilliance as well as Munch's ability to cast a spell with a picturesque French score were all illustrated by the final "Bacchus et Ariane," the suite from the second act of Roussel's ballet of the same name.

The composer evokes a chameleon palette of colors and moods as he takes us from a dreaming Ariane to one who awakes and goes into plenty of action, with and without Bacchus. It all culminates in a dance by the two, followed by a final Bacchanale.

The Bostonians play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night and repeat the following program Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes"; "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," Op. 23-A, by Samuel Barber.

N. Y. Sinfonia Plays

The New York Sinfonia, which played its first concert last night in Town Hall with Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, as soloist, will return Wednesday night, Jan. 23, for its second and final event of the season. Clayton Westermann conducts the group, which consists of a basic unit of 14 strings. Soloists for the next concert will be Joseph Fuchs, violinist, and Lillian Fuchs, violist. The program will include one of Mozart's most beautiful works for chamber ensemble, the Symphonie Concertante for Solo Violin and Viola. Compositions by Bloch, Bartok and Tansman complete the program.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
DEC 13 1956

CARNEGIE HALL:

Miss S

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC Symphony orchestra in Honegger, three songs from of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ari century. It [illegible] listening.

The most winning of these numbers was the Hindemith, beautifully sung by Irmgard Seefried. She gave his music color and warmth in her pure-toned singing and interpretative understanding.

In revised form these songs of the birth of Mary, Joseph's doubt, and the birth of Christ have been enriched not only through their orchestral dress but also in Hendemith's deeper insight into the expressivity of music. They made a strong impression on the audience.

Playing Restrained

The most elusive work was Honegger's Second Symphony for Strings with the surprise entry of trumpets in the third

ISTRIE

e yo ory-fresh

this is a Munch warhorse.

Earlier in the program Miss Seefried sang Bach's "Wedding" Cantata for Soprano, No. 202, assisted by Richard Burgin, violin, Ralph Gomberg, oboe and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.

The performance was almost too small-scaled. Nor did the

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 14 1956

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 13 1956

ony Heard
all Concert

that a Bach cantata

Boston Symphony Heard In Carnegie Hall Concert

By Jay S. Harrison

Boston Symphony Orchestra
CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Charles Munch; soloists, Richard Burgin, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.

Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger
Cantata, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten" ("Vanish now, ye winter shadows"), for Soprano, No. 202 ..... Bach
Songs from "Das Marienleben" for Soprano and Orchestra ..... Hindemith
"Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2, Op. 43 ..... Roussel

It is to the boundless credit of the Boston Symphony that what ever the orchestra plays emerges as a classic. Last night at Carnegie Hall, for example, the ensemble, under Charles Munch's direction, offered a program that featured not a single number from the workaday repertoire; yet, through the majesty of its performance and the ease of its execution, the Boston men managed to make each piece sound as though it had been their exclusive property from the moment the ink dired on the score.

Honegger's Second Symphony —to cite a case in point—I did not find a very attractive piece, nor even a remotely engaging one. Aside from a haunting and elegiac opening, its developments seem contrived, its harmony undefined and its rhythm halting and limp. Still, given a wreath of velvet string sonorities and the work begins to jell, begins to make the kind of sense that its printed notes do not. In lesser hands the symphony moves dumbly and is barely able to keep from collapsing. But the Boston Symphony makes it speak with eloquence and gives it a spine of brass.

One would also be led to consider that a Bach cantata played by a handful of strings, an oboe and a harpsichord has no place in the wide and open spaces of a Carnegie Hall. And valid the consideration might be were it not for the presence last night of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists and a soprano whose way with a curling phrase is one of the bounties of our time. Irmgard Seefried, once she had brushed away the few barbs that clung to the top of her voice, set sail on a sea of Bachian invention and made every measure ripple and roll and toss as its course demanded.

Much the same might be remarked of the three "Marienleben" songs, which in their original version with piano accompaniment served as a landmark of neo-classicism. Decked out orchestrally, the songs have a tendency to go a mite flabby and soft, their counterpoint inclining to smear and blur, but they are animated by nobility of expression and deep religious feeling. That, at any rate, is how they were read by Miss Seefried, for which reason they communicated fully and tenderly.

DECEMBER 13 '56 NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND SUN

Music

Boston Concert Has Tribute to Virgin Mary

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A beautiful musical tribute to the Virgin Mary—beautifully written and beautifully sung—was heard as part of the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night.

The work was Paul Hindemith's warm and sensitive settings for soprano and orchestra of three excerpts from Karl Maria Rilke's cycle of poems on the life of the Mother of Jesus.

The singer was Irmgard Seefried, the lovely and gifted Viennese artist who made her debut at the Metropolitan in 1953, one decade after her triumphant bow at home on the stage of the Vienna Opera.

Perfect Fusion.

Miss Seefried supplied the perfect fusion of style, voice and temperament for Hindemith's searching and soaring songs. There was abundant warmth and superb technic to the readings—and a piety always tender and human.

Charles Munch and the orchestra gave the accomplished soloist fine-spun support in the way of dynamics, with that added something that affords such accompaniments the quality of both comment and expansion.

Earlier on the program, Miss Seefried was also heard as soloist in Bach's "Wedding Cantata"—a nuptial hymn which, compared to Carl Orff's bridal festivity heard the night before was a Victorian nursery charade.

Recitatives vs. Arias.

For some reason, Miss Seefried, for all her sincere artistry and round tone, was not quite as successful in Bach last night as she was in Hindemith. While the recitatives were warm and forceful, the arias were not.

Neither was the orchestra at its best in applying Bach's delicate commentary to the singing. Only the violin solo was truly in the vein. Both the oboe and harpsichord were a little on the recessive side.

Other numbers last night were Honegger's Second Symphony, for String Orchestra and that heaving fabric of symphonic revelry, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Suite No. 2.

The Honegger score, tense and angry from the mood of occupied Paris in 1941, received model treatment as to texture and motion, but somewhat less than its due of internal combustion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 13 1956

Music: Works by 2 Modern Masters

Honegger, Hindemith Scores Are Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

HONEGGER and Hindemith, modern masters at their best, were represented by some of their finest product at last night's Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All that Charles Munch, the conductor, sought to do was to present music he believed in. But the power with which these pieces dominated the program and touched the heart was a reminder that the art of music is far from exhausted, no matter how many requiems the gloomy ones may say over it.

•

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 gains in stature with each hearing. The inscription it bears, "Paris, October, 1941," is a bitter reminder of the time and place of its composition. While the composer provided no literal scenario for the thoughts and emotions that stirred him, it is clear from the clashing turbulence of the first movement and the somber gravity of the second that this is a sensitive musician's account of the agony of occupied France.

All this Honegger says with the strings alone. In the final movement he introduces the trumpets to sing a chorale that is like a glorious call to hope.

With Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist, Mr. Munch presented three songs from Hindemith's "Lieder aus dem Marienleben." These songs, drawn from a cycle based on Rilke's poems on the life of Mary, were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ."

The songs captured the simple, devout spirit of the poems. Hindemith can be dry and academic, but here he sings serenely and affectingly. It is interesting to recall that his first version of the cycle was written when he was 27 and that twenty-five years later he returned to it.

Acting on a belief in "the ethical necessity of music and the moral obligation of its composer," he undertook to improve the work, to shape it more in keeping with the essential content of the poems and the capacities of the human voice. "The Birth of Christ" was revised most drastically, the composer confessed. It is now a noble song.

Irmgard Seefried

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Charles Munch conducting; Irmgard Seefried, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.

Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger
Cantata, Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten ..... Bach
Songs from Aus dem Marienleben ..... Hindemith
Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2 ..... Roussel

Miss Seefried Sings With Bostonians

Miss Seefried sang this music with stirring conviction. Where her performance had been on the surface of the Bach cantata earlier in the program, she conveyed a sense of identification with Hindemith's music. The voice was better focused and securer at the top, and her phrasing had perception.

Mr. Munch, who seldom arranges a program without one of his specialties, had Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 for this occasion. Bach cantatas, however, rarely appear at orchestral concerts. For this one, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," the conductor used a small group of strings, and the capable instrumental soloists were Richard Burgin, violinist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichordist.

This is Bach in a mild, sweet-tempered mood, and the performance was appropriately modest. It is worth noting that this is a "wedding" cantata. On Tuesday night the Philadelphia Orchestra brought us Carl Orff's often literal celebration of love and marriage. With the Boston Symphony bringing up the same subject last night, it began to look as if our orchestras were determined to make June bust out in December.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 398,982 - S. 274,57[illegible]

DEC 13 1956

Irmgard Seefried Sings Bach With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

If variety was the keynote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night in Carnegie Hall, its contrasts were unconventional but welcome.

The combination of Irmgard Seefried, Austrian soprano, singing Bach, and Honegger's Second Symphony made up the first half of the concert. In opening the event, the Honegger composition gave us music which in its initial two movements is somber, brooding, even resentful. Composed in 1941, the symphony thus wears the mood of Frenchmen living in occupied Paris, and the composer has movingly recreated their feelings. This music is compelling in its expressions of irony and bitterness. Portions of it appear contrived, but, on the whole, its content is impressive.

The surprise of the four trumpets in the final portion of the concluding vivace is a sudden thrust of glory amidst the darkness. They double with the violins on a hymn tune, and their joyousness exuberantly expresses the thought of liberation.

Miss Seefried's beautiful, soaring soprano enhanced Bach's "Wedding Cantata," an apostrophe to spring and love. It appeared significant that she followed this by three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben," which she performed with more subjectivity than she had in the Bach.

Could it have been by accident that Mme. Seefried, soon herself to become a mother, chose at this time to sing of the birth of Mary and the birth of Christ? In any case, the Hindemith songs, set to poems by Rilke, based on the life of the Virgin Mary, were poignant and noble in expression, and were sung with ecstatic sincerity by the soprano. Munch and the ensemble provided an accompaniment which was musically sensitive and well modulated in relation to the voice.

The effulgence of the Bostonians' tone, and their technical brilliance as well as Munch's ability to cast a spell with a picturesque French score were all illustrated by the final "Bacchus et Ariane," the suite from the second act of Roussel's ballet of the same name.

The composer evokes a chameleon palette of colors and moods as he takes us from a dreaming Ariane to one who awakes and goes into plenty of action with and without Bacchus. It all culminates in a dance by the two, followed by a final Bacchanale.

The Bostonians play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night and repeat the following program Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes"; "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," Op. 23-A, by Samuel Barber.

N. Y. Sinfonia Plays

The New York Sinfonia, which played its first concert last night in Town Hall with Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, as soloist, will return Wednesday night, Jan. 23, for its second and final event of the season. Clayton Westermann conducts the group, which consists of a basic unit of 14 strings. Soloists for the next concert will be Joseph Fuchs, violinist, and Lillian Fuchs, violist. The program will include one of Mozart's most beautiful works for chamber ensemble, the Symphonie Concertante for Solo Violin and Viola. Compositions by Bloch, Bartok and Tansman complete the program.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

DEC 13 1956

CARNEGIE HALL:

Miss S[illegible] ISTRIE

[illegible]e yo[illegible]

[illegible]ory-fresh

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC [illegible] Symphony orchestra in Honegger, three songs from of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ari[illegible] century. It made good listening.

The most winning of these numbers was the Hindemith, beautifully sung by Irmgard Seefried. She gave his music color and warmth in her pure-toned singing and interpretative understanding.

In revised form these songs of the birth of Mary, Joseph's doubt, and the birth of Christ have been enriched not only through their orchestral dress but also in Hendemith's deeper insight into the expressivity of music. They made a strong impression on the audience.

Playing Restrained

The most elusive work was Honegger's Second Symphony for Strings with the surprise entry of trumpets in the third [illegible] this is a Munch warhorse.

Earlier in the program Miss Seefried sang Bach's "Wedding" Cantata for Soprano, No. 202, assisted by Richard Burgin, violin, Ralph Gomberg, oboe and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.

The performance was almost too small-scaled. Nor did the [illegible] and roll and toss as its course demanded.

Much the same might be remarked of the three "Marienleben" songs, which in their original version with piano accompaniment served as a landmark of neo-classicism.

[illegible] House of Burgesses, and of [illegible] Francis Cooke, who came over on the Mayflower. The late [illegible] United States Senator Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, was her great-uncle. She is a member of the Society of Mayflower Descendants and the Huguenot Society.

[illegible]med Music Director

[illegible] Josef Krips, who makes his [illegible] New York debut in Tuesday [illegible] night's concert of the Symphony of the Air at Carnegie Hall, has been appointed a general music director of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, it was announced yesterday. Succeeding this position with Herbert von Karajan, Mr. Krips, who will continue as conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, will direct the Vienna Orchestra for three months each spring. The Austrian-born musician will also [illegible] Mozart's "The Abduc-

[illegible]ny Heard
[illegible]ll Concert

[illegible] that a Bach cantata [illegible] by a handful of strings, an oboe and a harpsichord has no place in the wide and open spaces of a Carnegie Hall. And valid the consideration might be were it not for the presence last night of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists and a soprano whose way with a curling phrase is one of the bounties of our time. Irmgard Seefried, once she had brushed away the few barbs that clung to the top of her voice, set sail on a sea of Bachian invention and made every measure ripple

Conductor, Charles Munch; soloists, Richard Burgin, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord.
Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger
Cantata, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten" ("Vanish now, ye winter shadows"), for Soprano, No. 202 ..... Bach
Songs from "Das Marienleben" for Soprano and Orchestra ..... Hindemith
"Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2, Op. 43 ..... Roussel

It is to the boundless credit of the Boston Symphony that what ever the orchestra plays emerges as a classic. Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall, for example, the ensemble, under Charles Munch's direction, offered a program that featured not a single number from the workaday repertoire; yet, through the majesty of its performance and the ease of its execution, the Boston men managed to make each piece sound as though it had been their exclusive property from the moment the ink dired on the score.

Honegger's Second Symphony —to cite a case in point—I did not find a very attractive piece, nor even a remotely engaging one. Aside from a haunting and elegiac opening, its developments seem contrived, its harmony undefined and its rhythm halting and limp. Still, given a wreath of velvet string sonorities and the work begins to jell, begins to make the kind of sense that its printed notes do not. In lesser hands the symphony moves dumbly and is barely able to keep from collapsing. But the Boston Symphony makes it speak with eloquence and gives it a spine of brass.

One would also be led to con-

DECEMBER 13 '56 NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND SUN

Music

Boston Concert Has Tribute to Virgin Mary

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A beautiful musical tribute to the Virgin Mary — beautifully written and beautifully sung— was heard as part of the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night.

The work was Paul Hindemith's warm and sensitive settings for soprano and orchestra of three excerpts from Karl Maria Rilke's cycle of poems on the life of the Mother of Jesus.

The singre was Irmgard Seefried, the lovely and gifted Viennese artist who made her debut at the Metropolitan in 1953, one decade after her triumphant bow at home on the stage of the Vienna Opera.

Perfect Fusion.

Miss Seefried supplied the perfect fusion of style, voice and temperament for Hindemith's searching and soaring songs. There was abundant warmth and superb technic to the readings — and a piety always tender and human.

Charles Munch and the orchestra gave the accomplished soloist fine-spun support in the way of dynamics, with that added something that affords such accompaniments the quality of both comment and expansion.

Earlier on the program, Miss Seefried was also heard as soloist in Bach's "Wedding Cantata"—a nuptial hymn which, compared to Carl Orff's bridal festivity heard the night before was a Victorian nursery charade.

Recitatives vs. Arias.

For some reason, Miss Seefried, for all her sincere artstry and round tone, was not quite as successful in Bach last night as she was in Hindemith. While the recitatives were warm and forecful, the arias were not.

Neither was the orchestra at its best in applying Bach's delicate commentary to the singing. Only the violin solo was truly in the vein. Both the oboe and harpsichord were a little on the recessive side.

Other numbers last night were Honegger's Second Symphony, for String Orchestra, and that heaving fabric of symphonic revelry, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Suite No. 2.

The Honegger score, tense and angry from the mood of occupied Paris in 1941, received model treatment as to texture and motion, but somewhat less than its due of internal combustion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

DEC 13 1956

Music: Works by 2 Modern Masters

Honegger, Hindemith Scores Are Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

HONEGGER and Hindemith, modern masters at their best, were represented by some of their finest product at last night's Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All that Charles Munch, the conductor, sought to do was to present music he believed in. But the power with which these pieces dominated the program and touched the heart was a reminder that the art of music is far from exhausted, no matter how many requiems the gloomy ones may say over it.

•

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 gains in stature with each hearing. The inscription it bears, "Paris, October, 1941," is a bitter reminder of the time and place of its composition. While the composer provided no literal scenario for the thoughts and emotions that stirred him, it is clear from the clashing turbulence of the first movement and the somber gravity of the second that this is a sensitive musician's account of the agony of occupied France.

All this Honegger says with the strings alone. In the final movement he introduces the trumpets to sing a chorale that is like a glorious call to hope.

With Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist, Mr. Munch presented three songs from Hindemith's "Lieder aus dem Marienleben." These songs, drawn from a cycle based on Rilke's poems on the life of Mary, were "The Birth of Mary," "Joseph's Doubt" and "The Birth of Christ."

The songs captured the simple, devout spirit of the poems. Hindemith can be dry and academic, but here he sings serenely and affectingly. It is interesting to recall that his first version of the cycle was written when he was 27 and that twenty-five years later he returned to it.

Acting on a belief in "the ethical necessity of music and the moral obligation of its composer," he undertook to improve the work, to shape it more in keeping with the essential content of the poems and the capacities of the human voice. "The Birth of Christ" was revised most drastically, the composer confessed. It is now a noble song.

•

Miss Seefried sang this music with stirring conviction. Where her performance had been on the surface of the Bach cantata earlier in the program, she conveyed a sense of identification with Hindemith's music. The voice was better focused and securer at the top, and her phrasing had [illegible].

Mr. Munch, who seldom arranges a program without one of his specialties, had Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 for this occasion. Bach cantatas, however, rarely appear in orchestral concerts. For this one, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," the conductor used a small group of strings, and the capable instrumental soloists were Richard Burgin, violinist, Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichordist.

This is Bach in a mild, sweet vein and good, and the performance was appropriately modest. It is worth noting that this is a "wedding" cantata. On Tuesday night the Philadelphia Orchestra brought us Carl Orff's often literal celebration of love and marriage. With the Boston Symphony hence [illegible] the sphere last [illegible] to look as if [illegible] our [illegible] dedicated to [illegible] but our [illegible] in December.

Irmgard Seefried

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Charles Munch conducting. Irmgard Seefried, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.
Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra ..... Honegger
Cantata, Weichet nur, betrueble Schatten ..... Bach
Songs from Aus dem Marienleben ..... Hindemith
Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2 ..... Roussel

Miss Seefried Sings With Bostonians

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544
DEC 14 1956

Triumphant Return

Can it be that Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony had to go to Russia to be really appreciated by Washington?

Their concert at Constitution Hall last night, the first since their summer tour of Russia, was a sell-out.

This was in [illegible] contrast to last season's Boston Symphony concerts here in which the orchestra and Mr. Munch were [illegible] as brilliant but drew relatively small audiences.

What with its new-found prestige, it is unfortunate that Mr. Munch and the Boston will give only one more program here this season.

Last night's was a French affair. Even the Beethoven 6th described more of a pastoral France than Germany. Mr. Munch unfolded it in an easy way which created a feeling of relaxation and well-being that comes with a sunny day in the country. The brief "storm" was a friendly one, not the havoc-wreaking fury some conductors make it.

The second half was devoted to Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for Strings Orchestra and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2. The former was a moving work with a brilliant close; the Roussel, a splash of orchestral color full of [illegible] ment—particularly [illegible] Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony did it.

MILTON BERLINER

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 250,086 - S. 278,877
DEC 14 1956

NEWS OF MUSIC

Boston Concert Heard By Capacity Audience

By DAY THORPE

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor. In Constitution Hall. Program: Symphony No. 6 in F, Opus 68, Beethoven; Symphony for Strings (1941), Honegger; Bacchus et Ariane, Second Suite, Opus 43, Roussel.

The French have had a way with music of Beethoven since at least the days of Berlioz's youth, as readers of the curious Beethoven concerts in the "Memoirs" may remember. One cannot say that the feeling of Charles Munch for the out-of-doors of the Pastoral Symphony is perverse, but it certainly is langorous, if not downright sleepy. It is as though the maestro were wandering by the brook and experiencing thankful reflections after the storm while recovering from luncheon at the Relais de Porquerolles or the Tour d'Argent.

When Dr. Munch and the Boston Symphony moved on to the more sympathetic music of Honegger and Roussel, the interest of the capacity audience in Constitution Hall last night picked up considerably. The Honegger symphony for strings is one of the strongest works of the composer—a piece which displays the full resources of one of the most versatile 20th century composers yet remains as concise, clear and communicative as a rondo of Haydn or Mozart.

The string section of the Boston orchestra was nothing less than superb in this music, in which the color and variety of the absent brass and woodwind are always suggested by the fiddlers alone in Honegger's imaginative and difficult writing.

The concert closed with a rousing reading of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," a ballet suite for the antithesis of Honegger's restricted orchestra. The scoring is for two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassons, contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani, celesta, two harps, cymbals, tambourine, bass drum, military drum and strings.

What Roussel makes of this army of instruments is a wonderful example of that intoxicating and sumptuous noise which only French composers — and only the best of them, at that — can create.

Dr. Munch is an individualistic and distinguished conductor, one who for years has achieved successful results with excellent orchestras here and abroad. It is possible that the average listener would do well to shut his eyes at a Munch concert and inhale his pleasure only through his ears, for the conductor's motions sometimes stand between his music and his audience.

The traceries of his stick seem to have no relation to a downbeat, and his physical indications of expression little connection with the mood of the music. The excellence of the Boston Symphony is evidence to the contrary, but the audience, participating in the concert without the advantage of rehearsals, is bewildered by what its eyes see.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 250,086 - S. 278,877
DEC 14 1956

Dec 14, '56 - Washington Post?

Postlude

Munch and Boston Orchestra Present Program of Splendor

By Paul Hume

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, closed its initial Washington program of the season last night in Constitution Hall with music and playing of unparalleled splendor.

To the season's first sold-out orchestra concert, the Bostonians and their noted French conductor, recently returned from a successful tour of Europe including Russian centers, brought the 6th symphony of Beethoven, the 2nd of Honegger, and the "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite of Albert Roussel.

The latter work was heard in its second performance here this fall, having appeared on the first of the Vienna Philharmonic's two concerts.

Arthur Honegger's 2nd Symphony is a magnificent conception, superbly realized. Written to exploit the fullest resources of the string orchestra, it gives to the sounds of the viola a richness and eloquence early in its course [illegible] the mood for three highly contrasted sections.

When all that can be done to highlight the sonorities of the strings has been achieved through skillful demonstration of their potentialities in rhythms as well as singing melodies, Honegger dramatically flings out above them, like a silvered canopy, the sound of a solo trumpet lining out a broadchoral [illegible] of proud majesty. It is an electrifying moment, and one that last[illegible] night was [illegible] its full glory.

Roussel's ballet suite [illegible] equally rich, compounded [illegible] the orchestra's complete galaxy. It is music Munch giv[illegible] with almost frenetic excitement, just as he brought [illegible] Honegger a vitality and su[illegible]pleness of flawless insight.

Beethoven's gentlest symphony, which Walter Leg[illegible] once said should begin as [illegible] one came in on a friendly conversation already in progress, was fine-grained in sound, but lacking in the propulsive quality needed to keep the rather intimate conversation alive.

Does not the sold-out house indicate that concerts played once a week draw better than those scheduled two nights in a row?

Advertisement

SYMPHONY LOVERS—A full house turned out last night in Constitution Hall to hear the Boston Symphony, recently back from a successful tour of Europe, including Russian centers. Shown in their box at intermission are (left to right), Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne, wife of the Norwegian Ambassador; Mrs. John Gates, Jr., wife of the Under Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. George Maurice Morris and Mr. R. J. Lepkowski.

BRITONS ARRIVE—The new British Ambassador and Lady Caccia are shown arriving at Constitution Hall's limousine entrance to hear the Boston Symphony. —Photos by Rosemary.

[illegible]ny Heard [illegible]T Concert

[illegible] Bach cantata [illegible] a handful of strings [illegible] and a harpsichord [illegible] in the bride and open [illegible] Carnegie [illegible] And [illegible] the consideration might [illegible] it not for the presence [illegible]ght of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists [illegible] Arano whose way with [illegible] phrase is one of the [illegible] of our time. Irmgard [illegible], ones she had brushed [illegible] few barbs that clung [illegible] of her voice, yet all [illegible] of Bachian intention [illegible] every measure ripple [illegible] and toss as its course [illegible] led. [illegible] the same might be re[illegible] of the three "Marien[illegible] songs, which in the [illegible] version with piano ac[illegible]niment served as a hand[illegible] of neo-classicism.

[illegible] Masters

[illegible] Seefried Sings [illegible]h Bostonians

[illegible] the work, to shape it [illegible] keeping with the es[illegible] content of the poems [illegible] capacities of the hu[illegible] voice. "The Birth of [illegible] was revised most dras[illegible] the composer com[illegible] It is now a noble song.

[illegible] Seefried sang this [illegible]th stirring conviction. [illegible]er performance had [illegible] the surface of the [illegible]tata earlier in the [illegible] she conveyed a sense [illegible]ication with Hinde[illegible] music. The voice was [illegible] focused and securer at [illegible]p, and her phrasing had [illegible]otion.

Munch, who seldom ar[illegible]s a program without one [illegible] specialties, had Rous[illegible] "Bacchus et Ariane" [illegible] No. 2 for this occasion. [illegible] cantatas, however, rarely [illegible]r at orchestral concerts. [illegible]his one, "Weichet nur, [illegible]ebte Schatten," the con[illegible] used a small group of [illegible]s, and the capable in[illegible]ental soloists were Rich[illegible] Burgin, violinist; Ralph [illegible]erg, oboist, and Daniel [illegible]am, harpsichordist.

[illegible] is Bach in a mild, [illegible] tempered mood, and the [illegible]nance was appropriately [illegible] It is worth noting that [illegible] "wedding" cantata. On [illegible] the Philadelphia [illegible]ra brought us Carl [illegible] often literal celebration [illegible]e and marriage. With [illegible]ston Symphony bring[illegible] the same subject last [illegible] it began to look as if [illegible]orchestras were deter[illegible] to make June bust out [illegible]ember.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Circ. D. 4,544
DEC 14 1956

Triumphant Return

Can it be that Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony had to go to Russia to be really appreciated by Washington?

Their concert at Constitution Hall last night, the first since their summer tour of Russia, was a sell-out.

This was in sharp contrast to last year's Boston Symphony concerts here in which the orchestra and Mr. Munch were just as brilliant but drew relatively small audiences.

What with its new-found prestige, it is unfortunate that Mr. Munch and the Boston will give only one more program here this season.

Last night's was a French affair. When the Beethoven 6th described more of a pastoral France than Germany, Mr. Munch unfolded it in a way which created a feeling of relaxation and well-being, coming with a sunny day in the country. The brief "storm" was a friendly one, not the havoc-raising fury some conductors make.

The second half was devoted to Honegger's Symphony No. 2 and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2. The former was a moving work with a brilliant close; the Roussel, a splash of orchestral color full of excitement—particularly the way Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony did it.

MILTON BERLINER

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 250,086 - S. 278,877
DEC 14 1956

Dec 14.'56 - Washington Post?

NEWS OF MUSIC

Boston Concert Heard By Capacity Audience

By DAY THORPE

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor. In Constitution Hall. Program: Symphony No. 6 in F, Opus 68, Beethoven; Symphony for Strings (1941), Honegger; Bacchus et Ariane, Second Suite, Opus 43, Roussel.

The French have had a way with music of Beethoven since at least the days of Berlioz's youth, as readers of the curious Beethoven concerts in the "Memoirs" may remember. One cannot say that the feeling of Charles Munch for the out-of-doors of the Pastoral Symphony is perverse, but it certainly is langorous, if not downright sleepy. It is as though the maestro were wandering by the brook and experiencing thankful reflections after the storm while recovering from luncheon at the Relais de Porquerolles or the Tour d'Argent.

When Dr. Munch and the Boston Symphony moved on to the more sympathetic music of Honegger and Roussel, the interest of the capacity audience in Constitution Hall last night picked up considerably. The Honegger symphony for strings is one of the strongest works of the composer—a piece which displays the full resources of one of the most versatile 20th century composers yet remains as concise, clear and communicative as a rondo of Haydn or Mozart.

The string section of the Boston orchestra was nothing less than superb in this music, in which the color and variety of the absent brass and woodwind are always suggested by the fiddlers alone in Honegger's imaginative and difficult writing.

The concert closed with a rousing reading of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," a ballet suite for the antithesis of Honegger's restricted orchestra. The scoring is for two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassons, contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani, celesta, two harps, cymbals, tambourine, bass drum, military drum and strings.

What Roussel makes of this army of instruments is a wonderful example of that intoxicating and sumptuous noise which only French composers — and only the best of them, at that — can create.

Dr. Munch is an individualistic and distinguished conductor, one who for years has achieved successful results with excellent orchestras here and abroad. It is possible that the average listener would do well to shut his eyes at a Munch concert and inhale his pleasure only through his ears, for the conductor's motions sometimes stand between his music and his audience.

The traceries of his stick seem to have no relation to a downbeat, and his physical indications of expression little connection with the mood of the music. The excellence of the Boston Symphony is evidence to the contrary, but the audience, participating in the concert without the advantage of rehearsals, is bewildered by what its eyes see.

Postlude

Munch and Boston Orchestra Present Program of Splendor

By Paul Hume

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, closed its intial Washington program of the season last night in Constitution Hall with music and playing of unparalleled splendor.

To the season's first sold-out orchestra concert, the Bostonians and their noted French conductor, recently returned from a successful tour of Europe including Russian centers, brought the 6th symphony of Beethoven, the 2nd of Honegger, and the "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite of Albert Roussel.

The latter work was heard in its second performance here this fall, having appeared on the first of the Vienna Philharmonic's two concerts.

Arthur Honegger's 2nd Symphony is a magnificent conception, superbly realized. Written to exploit the fullest resources of the string orchestra, it gives to the sounds of the viola a richness and eloquence early in its course that sets the mood for three highly contrasted sections.

When all that can be done to highlight the sonorities of the strings has been achieved through skillful demonstration of their potentialities in rhythms as well as singing melodies, Honegger dramatically flings out above them, like a silvered canopy, the sound of a solo trumpet, lining out a broadchoral theme of proud majesty. It is an electrifying moment, and one that last night was [illegible] its full glory.

Roussel's ballet suite is equally rich, compounded of the orchestra's complete galaxy. It is music Munch gives with almost frenetic excitement, just as he brought to Honegger a vitality and suppleness of flawless insight.

Beethoven's gentlest symphony, which Walter Legge once said should begin as if one came in on a friendly conversation already in progress, was fine-grained in sound, but lacking in the propulsive quality needed to keep the rather intimate conversation alive.

Does not the sold-out house indicate that concerts played once a week draw better than those scheduled two nights in a row?

Advertisement

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
Circ. D. 250,086 - S. 278,877
DEC 14 1956

SYMPHONY LOVERS—A full house turned out last night in Constitution Hall to hear the Boston Symphony, recently back from a successful tour of Europe, including Russian centers. Shown in their box at intermission are (left to right), Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne, wife of the Norwegian Ambassador; Mrs. Thomas Gates, jr., wife of the Under Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. George Maurice Morris and Mr. R. J. Lepkowski.

BRITONS ARRIVE—The new British Ambassador and Lady Caccia are shown arriving at Constitution Hall's limousine entrance to hear the Boston Symphony. —Photos by Rosemary.

[illegible]ny Heard [illegible]rt Concert

[illegible] that a Bach cantata [illegible] by a handful of strings, [illegible] and a harpsichord has [illegible] in the wide and open [illegible] of a Carnegie Hall. And [illegible] the consideration might [illegible] it not for the presence [illegible]ght of a remarkably balanced group of instrumentalists [illegible] soprano whose way with [illegible]ing phrase is one of the [illegible] of our time. Irmgard [illegible], once she had brushed [illegible] the few barbs that clung [illegible] top of her voice, set sail [illegible] sea of Bachian invention [illegible] made every measure ripple [illegible] and toss as its course [illegible]mended.

Much the same might be remarked of the three "Marienlieder" songs, which in their original version with piano accompaniment served as a landmark of neo-classicism.

[illegible] Masters

[illegible] Seefried Sings [illegible]th Bostonians

[illegible]ve the work, to shape it [illegible] in keeping with the es[illegible] content of the poems [illegible] the capacities of the hu[illegible] voice. "The Birth of [illegible]" was revised most dras[illegible], the composer con[illegible]. It is now a noble song.

•

[illegible] Seefried sang this [illegible]th stirring conviction. [illegible]er performance had [illegible] the surface of the [illegible] cantata earlier in the [illegible] she conveyed a sense [illegible]ntification with Hinde[illegible] music. The voice was [illegible] focused and securer at [illegible]op, and her phrasing had [illegible]ption.

[illegible] Munch, who seldom ar[illegible] a program without one [illegible] specialties, had Rous[illegible] "Bacchus et Ariane" [illegible] No. 2 for this occasion. [illegible] cantatas, however, rarely [illegible]r at orchestral concerts. [illegible] this one, "Weichet nur, [illegible]ebte Schatten," the con[illegible]er used a small group of [illegible]s, and the capable in[illegible]mental soloists were Rich[illegible] Burgin, violinist; Ralph [illegible]berg, oboist, and Daniel [illegible]kham, harpsichordist.

[illegible] is Bach in a mild, [illegible]-tempered mood, and the [illegible]mance was appropriately [illegible]. It is worth noting that [illegible] "wedding" cantata. On [illegible] Philadelphia [illegible]tra brought us Carl [illegible] often literal celebration [illegible]ve and marriage. With [illegible]ston Symphony bring[illegible]p the same subject last [illegible]ht, it began to look as if [illegible] orchestras were deter[illegible] to make June bust out [illegible]cember.

TIGHT BINDING

170

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 16 1956

Stravinsky and Barber Scores Played by Boston Symphony

Modern works predominated in the program of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Sunday afternoon when Charles Munch led the orchestra in works by Stravinsky, Barber and Beethoven. The Bostonians were in their best fettle and made eloquent music. Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," which opened the program, was composed for ballet performance. This "card game in three deals," as Stravinsky describes it, is in his best neo-"Nutcracker" vein. It is decorative music, very chic and beguiling, turned out by a master confectioner. Mr. Munch performed it for just what it is, lightly and with delicate tonal balance. The performance had style, too, which this music needs above all.

Samuel Barber's tone poem "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" is dance music of a different sort, adapted from a score, "Cave of the Heart," composed several years ago for Martha Graham. The work reinforced the strong impression it made at its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos last February. Mr. Munch led it Saturday with explosive intensity. The composer bowed from a box in response to the applause.

The dance is a brief touch in the vast landscape of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, yet the impulse of the dance seems to pervade at least three of its movements. Saturday's performance was the climax as well as conclusion of the program.

The symphony sounded as if it were fresh from the composer's pen and as if the composer were freshly overwhelmed by the beauties of nature. In the scene by the brookside the instruments sang with a tenderness and warmth that made that long movement sound far too short.

If the finale was a trifle hurried, the very closing measures returned to a mood of almost Pacific serenity. It was a moving performance. E. D.

Unfortunately, it was not the most definitive of renderings that the Bostonians gave the Stravinsky. The orchestra was laggard and [illegible] in attacks [illegible] This through the greater [illegible] piece. Natural sense and [illegible] the window.

[illegible] Stravinsky's [illegible] written originally for ballets, the Barber had by far the better treatment. The inexact, hit-or-miss playing that had possessed "Jeu de Cartes" was nowhere present in the Barber. That excerpt achieved yesterday, in fact, a deserved classic grandeur under the minister ations of conductor Charles Munch. Also it came right down to human essentials in bespeaking the tragic suffering of the princess.

Following the intermission the Beethoven, too, obtained considerable expression, not only along the big line, but also in the intimacy and clarity of detail. [illegible] Sym-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 16 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Performs Three Works, Each With a Dance, on Program Conducted by Munch

There was dance in each of the three works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Charles Munch. The Bostonians were in their best fettle and they made eloquent music.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," which opened the program, was composed for ballet performance. This "card game in three deals," as Stravinsky describes it, is in his best neo-"Nutcracker" vein. It is decorative music, very chic and beguiling, turned out by a master confectioner. Mr. Munch performed it for just what it is, lightly and with delicate tonal balance. The performance had style, too, which this music needs above all.

Samuel Barber's tone poem "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" is dance music of a different sort, adapted from a score, "Cave of the Heart," composed several years ago for Martha Graham. The work reinforced the strong impression it made at its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos last February. Mr. Munch led it Saturday with explosive intensity. The composer bowed from a box in response to the applause.

The dance is a brief touch in the vast landscape of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, yet the impulse of the dance seems to pervade at least three of its movements. Saturday's performance was the climax as well as conclusion of the program.

The symphony sounded as if it were fresh from the composer's pen and as if the composer were freshly overwhelmed by the beauties of nature. In the scene by the brookside the instruments sang with a tenderness and warmth that made that long movement sound far too short.

If the finale was a trifle hurried, the very closing measures returned to a mood of almost Pacific serenity. It was a moving performance. E. D.

N. Y. Times
1956 DECE

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 1957

Editor and Critic: SHIRLEY CECILLE CASH, 42 Clov
Other Critics: Harry L. Fuchs, Sl

With The Orchestras

Boston Symphony. At its Dec. 15 concert this season, the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, performed a beautifully balanced program. First, there was Stravinsky's ballet music, "Jeu de Cartes" (Card Game), a delightful confection performed with a jocular touch. Then there was Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work of sombre power and dark shadings. But it was Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony which shone brightest in this trio of performances . . . Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston for two weeks after Christmas and through the tour of the Orchestra. Mr. Burgin is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony . . .

BOSTON

■ Much new music has been presented to Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons, although an eagerly awaited world premiere, that of Walton's Violoncello Concerto, scheduled for Dec. 7, was postponed because of soloist Gregor Piatigorsky's illness.

According to Symphony Hall officials, however, no other orchestra will play the work until the Boston does so when Piatigorsky recovers.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4, commissioned by the Juilliard School, was new to Boston and made an excellent impression for combination of polish, strength and structure. Other works conducted by Charles Munch for Nov. 23-27 pair were the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, the Lento from Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 130 (performed by the string orchestra in memory of the librarian Leslie Rogers), and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

There were no novelties for the Nov. 9-10 concerts but Munch was at his brilliant best for a well-balanced list including the Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings, the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," and the Brahms First. (The last previous performance of the Brahms was in March 1954 when Guido Cantelli was guest conductor here.)

Vladimir Golschmann brought a United States premiere with him when he guest-conducted for the concerts of Nov. 23-24. This was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, a five-movement work played without pause. Written in 1955, the new work is remarkable chiefly for its [illegible] color. The ideas and themes are well worked out and interest is maintained throughout by provocative themes and craftsmanlike development. Mr. Golschman did a fine piece of work here as he did with the opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon." The performances of Debussy's "La Mer," and the Brahms Fourth were somewhat marred by the orchestra's apparent inability to understand all the conductor's directions. In any event, to program these favorites of both Koussevitzky and Munch in Boston was bringing beans to the Hub with a vengeance.

One of the finest programs thus far was the 7th pair, Nov. 30-31, when Irmgard Seefried was soloist in the Bach "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202). The soprano did a superbly artistic job beautifully supported by the orchestra under Munch. The work had never before been performed at these concerts, nor had the Hindemith Songs from "Das Marienleben," which Miss Seefried sang even better than the Bach, if that were possible. Munch's vital reading of the remarkable Honegger Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra and his sensitive performance of the Roussel "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 completed a program received with much enthusiasm.

■ Other events in Boston have included the opening of the Statler Morning Musicales, with Eileen Farrell as soloist before a capacity audience. At Jordan Hall Paul Cherkassky opened the Civic Symphony Orchestra's season with the Ruslan and Ludmilla Overture by Glinka, the Schubert Seventh, and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Edith Stearns a poised and sensitive soloist. Cherkassky's way with the overture was exciting, indeed, and the Schubert received a well-paced and intelligent reading. JULES WOLFFERS

Golschmann Offers Tansman Concerto in Boston Visit

Boston.—The fortnight past has been reasonably active but relatively uneventful. [illegible] Novelty [illegible]

But one piece of music new here has been proffered [illegible] That was Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, introduced at the Nov. 23-24 concerts of the Boston Symphony by guest conductor Vladimir Golschmann. Indeed, this work of five movements, in alternation between slow and fast, soft and loud, was an American premiere. The single performance of it that I heard failed to establish it as music of decided individuality. Though it has much piquant and finely calculated dissonance, and even some of the strong acid distilled from the 12-tone system, Tansman's Concerto did not register very forcefully.

It could have been the performance, for an [illegible]able impression of superficiality was the residue of the entire concert. Mr. Golschmann is a sincere and conscientious musician, and the orchestra mostly played well for him. But it seldom seemed to be in full control of the players, and some [illegible] wrong. The program otherwise consisted of Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon", Debussy's "La Mer", and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Elgar Work Revived

Two weeks earlier, Charles Munch had revived Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, which was a creditable enterprise and one productive of pleasant listening, especially since the Boston Symphony strings were at their rich and luminous best. Mr. Munch further offered Stravinsky's sparkling ballet score, "Jeu de Cartes," and in an eloquent and heroic-scaled performance the C minor Symphony of Brahms. This last, evidently, the conductor had tinkered a little in the horn and timpani parts. He brought out much horn detail in the first movement, which proved interesting yet not distorted. But why he chose to substitute timpani rolls for the repeated notes Brahms wrote in the closing statement of the chorale [illegible] is another m[illegible]

Elisabeth [illegible] ful blonde [illegible] made her a[illegible] appearance [illegible] Boston University Celebrity [illegible] Nov. 8, [illegible] Schumann's "Der Nu[illegible]" and Schubert's "An die M[illegible]" George [illegible] was the

[illegible] Tansman

[illegible] Jordan [illegible] that the [illegible] bined, that [illegible] not two [illegible] ated, sensitively-adjusted [illegible] whole evening was [illegible] Schumann's A minor Sonata [illegible] gh the A major Sonata of [illegible] econd Sonata by Charles [illegible] Duo Concertante [illegible] Fauré's passionate A major [illegible]

[illegible] by Dyer-Bennet

[illegible] hard Dyer-Bennet has much [illegible] his local following. His [illegible] of art and folksongs in Jordan Hall on Nov. 10 [illegible] coasted an audience with required [illegible] on stage, and second program [illegible] was necessitated [illegible] self "tenor and [illegible] properly, for while [illegible] of the guitar, his powers upon the instrument have notably developed. But I wish he would abandon the idea of announcing numbers as he sings them, and return to the usual detailed printed program.

Alfred Nash Patterson, conducting the Chorus Pro Musica in Emmanuel Church, on Nov. 14, offered an unusual list. The pieces formed a survey of the "Magnificat" as a treatment by various composers from Dufay, Schuetz and Monteverdi to Rachmaninoff and Schroeder. It was excellent choral work enjoyed by a very large audience.

Other concerts here have been a violin recital by the young and greatly gifted Michael Rabin, in Symphony Hall, Nov. 11, and an evening of vocal and violin pieces by the Strangling sisters—Una, violin, and Medea, soprano—at Jordan Hall, Nov. 13.

—Cyrus Durgin

Orchestral Work By Berger Is Issued

The score of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" has been issued recently by Peters. Its music comes as no stranger to audiences in the East, for the piece, written in 1952 on a commission from Dimitri Mitropoulos, had its premiere under [illegible] the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in 1953. Its performances by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony followed the next season. [illegible]

"Ideas of Order" has been talked about already in a number of reviews. More about it comes to light [illegible] the composer's program notes, reprinted in a preface which discusses [illegible] and formal layout as well as its relation to its spirit to the American poet Wallace Stevens. In listening to the score for the first time, after several readings, some fresh [illegible] facets of the work [illegible] most cogent piece of music—are pointed up. One of the most striking is the use of small motivic germs—specifically, three notes or, more important, two intervals—as the seeds from which the form unfolds in almost all its aspects. This in itself is hardly new, to be sure. It finds Berger in the company with Schönberg in his later years and even more so with Webern and recent 12-tone writers. But what is as effective here is that "Ideas of Order" in an essentially dialectic scheme succeeds not just in using these germinal groups, but in infusing their essence throughout the texture of the whole work. The unity of style is considerable, and [illegible] transfers [illegible] freshen the texture without causing any obscurity or confusion of ideas.

Berger achieves something else hard to come by in this line, with their frequent [illegible] point of [illegible] tuneful. Just what makes them come off this way is elusive and fascinating, particularly [illegible] their prototypes in other works of similar gestures various other composers often do not seem to cohere. For one thing, the leaps here are usually intervallic expansions of stepwise lines, whose melodic goals carry over despite the notes in different registers. The end result is an ingratiating lyricism.

Berger has, as well, a keen ear. His scoring of "Ideas" is transparent and fresh, marked throughout by a clean, chiselled style and an inventive use of the orchestra.

In all, this is a significant work, good music in itself, and a special and individual use of advanced techniques on quite successful terms. The score is a welcome addition to the contemporary repertoire.

—David M. Epstein

TIGHT BINDING

170

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 16 1956

Stravinsky and Barber Scores Played by Boston Symphony

Modern works predominated in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. They were "Jeu de Cartes," by Igor Stravinsky, and "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," by Samuel Barber. Beethoven, via the "Pastoral" Symphony, completed the trio of composers played.

Unhappily, it was not the most definitive of renderings that the Bostonians gave the Stravinsky. The orchestra was laggard and premature, by turns, in attacks and releases. This through the greater part of the piece. Naturally, unity, musical sense and the rest went out the window.

Of the two scores, Stravinsky's and Barber's, both written originally for ballets, the Barber had by far the better treatment. The inexact, hit-or-miss playing that had possessed "Jeu de Cartes" was nowhere present in the Barber. That excerpt achieved yesterday, in fact, a deserved classic grandeur under the ministrations of conductor Charles Munch. Also it came right down to human essentials in bespeaking the tragic suffering of the Princess.

Following the intermission the Beethoven, too, obtained considerable expression, not only along the big line, but also in the intimacy and clarity of detail. Obviously the Boston Sym-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 16 1956

N. Y. Times, 1956. DECEMBER 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Performs Three Works, Each With a Dance, on Program Conducted by Munch

There was dance in each of the three works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Charles Munch. The Bostonians were in their best fettle and they made eloquent music.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," which opened the program, was composed for ballet performance. This "card game in three deals," as Stravinsky describes it, is in his best neo-"Nutcracker" vein. It is decorative music, very chic and beguiling, turned out by a master confectioner. Mr. Munch performed it for just what it is, lightly and with delicate tonal balance. The performance had style, too, which this music needs above all.

Samuel Barber's tone poem "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" is dance music of a different sort, adapted from a score, "Cave of the Heart," composed several years ago for Martha Graham. The work reinforced the strong impression it made at its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos last February. Mr. Munch led it Saturday with explosive intensity. The composer bowed from a box in response to the applause.

The dance is a brief touch in the vast landscape of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, yet the impulse of the dance seems to pervade at least three of its movements. Saturday's performance was the climax as well as conclusion of the program.

The symphony sounded as if it were fresh from the composer's pen and as if the composer were freshly overwhelmed by the beauties of nature. In the scene by the brookside the instruments sang with a tenderness and warmth that made that long movement sound far too short.

If the finale was a trifle hurried, the very closing measures returned to a mood of almost beatific serenity. It was a moving performance. E. D.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 1957

Editor and Critic: SHIRLEY CECILLE CASH, 42 Clov
Other Critics: Harry L. Fuchs, Sl

With The Orchestras

Boston Symphony. At its Dec. 15 concert this season, the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, performed a beautifully balanced program. First, there was Stravinsky's ballet music, "Jeu de Cartes" (Card Game), a delightful confection performed with a jocular touch. Then there was Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work of sombre power and dark shadings. But it was Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony which shone brightest in this trio of performances . . . Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston for two weeks after Christmas and through the tour of the Orchestra. Mr. Burgin is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony . . .

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)
DEC 15 1956

BOSTON

■ Much new music has been presented to Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons, although an eagerly awaited world premiere, that of Walton's Violoncello Concerto, scheduled for Dec. 7, was postponed because of soloist Gregor Piatigorsky's illness.

According to Symphony Hall officials, however, no other orchestra will play the work until the Bostonians do it when Piatigorsky recovers.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, commissioned by the Juilliard School, was new to Boston and made an excellent impression for combination of polish, strength and structure. Other works conducted by Charles Munch for this Oct. 26-27 pair were the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, the Lento from Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 135 (performed by the string orchestra in memory of the librarian Leslie Rogers), and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

There were no novelties for the Nov. 9-10 concerts but Munch was at his brilliant best for a well-balanced list including the Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings, the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," and the Brahms First. (The last previous performance of the Brahms was in March 1954 when Guido Cantelli was guest conductor here.)

Vladimir Golschmann brought a United States premiere with him when he guest-conducted for the concerts of Nov. 23-24. This was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, a five-movement work played without pause. Written in 1955, the new work is remarkable chiefly for its glowing tone color. The ideas and themes are well worked out and interest is maintained throughout by provocative themes and craftsmanlike development. Mr. Golschman did a fine piece of work here as he did with the opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon." The performances of Debussy's "La Mer," and the Brahms Fourth were somewhat marred by the orchestra's apparent inability to understand all the conductor's directions. In any event, to program these favorites of both Koussevitzky and Munch in Boston was bringing beans to the Hub with a vengeance.

One of the finest programs thus far was the 7th pair, Nov. 30-31, when Irmgard Seefried was soloist in the Bach "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202). The soprano did a superbly artistic job beautifully supported by the orchestra under Munch. The work had never before been performed at these concerts, nor had the Hindemith Songs from "Das Marienleben," which Miss Seefried sang even better than the Bach, if that were possible. Munch's vital reading of the remarkable Honegger Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra and his sensitive performance of the Roussel "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 completed a program received with much enthusiasm.

■ Other events in Boston have included the opening of the Statler Morning Musicales, with Eileen Farrell as soloist before a capacity audience. . . . At Jordan Hall Paul Cherkassky opened the Civic Symphony Orchestra's season with the Ruslan and Ludmilla Overture by Glinka, the Schubert Seventh, and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, with Edith Stearns a poised and sensitive soloist. Cherkassky's way with the overture was exciting, indeed, and the Schubert received a well-paced and intelligent reading. JULES WOLFFERS

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1956

Golschmann Off[illegible] Concerto in Bo[illegible]

Boston.—The fortnight past has been reasonably active but relatively uneventful, at least in terms of novelty.

But one piece of music new here has been proffered in this time. That was Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, introduced at the Nov. 23-24 concerts of the Boston Symphony by guest conductor Vladimir Golschmann. Indeed, this work of five movements, in alternation between slow and fast, soft and loud, was an American premiere. The single performance of it that I heard failed to establish it as music of decided individuality. Though it has much piquant and finely calculated dissonance, and even some of the strong acid distilled from the 12-tone system, Tansman's Concerto did not register very forcefully.

It could have been the performance, for an inescapable impression of superficiality was the residue of the entire concert. Mr. Golschmann is a sincere and conscientious musician, and the orchestra mostly played well for him. But he seldom seemed to be in full control of the players and some things went wrong. The program otherwise consisted of Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon", Debussy's "La Mer", and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Elgar Work Revived

Two weeks earlier, Charles Munch had dusted off Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, which was a creditable enterprise and one productive of pleasant listening, especially since the Boston Symphony strings were at their rich and luminous best. Mr. Munch further offered Stravinsky's piddling ballet score, "Jeu de Cartes" and, in an eloquent and heroic-scaled performance, the C minor Symphony of Brahms. This last, evidently, the conductor had tinkered a little in the horn and timpani parts. He brought out much horn detail in the first movement, which proved interesting yet not distorted. But why he chose to substitute timpani rolls for the quarter notes Brahms wrote in the loud statement of the chorale in the finale, that is another matter.

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, the beautiful blonde soprano, made her annual appearance in the Boston University Celebrity Series at Symphony Hall on Nov. 18. The first third of the stated program was uneasily delivered, but things picked up after that, and some of her finest singing was accomplished during a lengthy string of encores, which included Wolf's "Kennst du, das Land?" (which Miss Schwarzkopf always does magnificently) and "Mausfallen spruechlein", Schumann's "Der Nussbaum" and Schubert's "An die Musik". George Reeves was the

[illegible]'s Tansman [illegible]n Visit

[illegible] collaborator at the piano, [illegible]ndividual musicians, violinist [illegible]sselt and pianist Luise Vosh both have deservedly high [illegible]. As a duo they are new. Their first such Boston con[illegible]Jordan Hall on Nov. 14, indi[illegible] the abilities of the two are [illegible]ed. that these artists together [illegible] two musicians, but a well-[illegible] sensitively-adjusted entity. [illegible]le evening was pleasurable, [illegible]humann's A minor Sonata, [illegible]he A major Sonata of Bach, [illegible]nd Sonata by Charles Ives, [illegible] Concertante of Stravinsky [illegible]'s passionate A major So[illegible]

by Dyer-Bennet

[illegible]rd Dyer-Bennet has much in[illegible] his local following. His con[illegible]rt and folksongs in Jordan [illegible] Nov. 16, boasted an audience [illegible] required seats on stage, and a [illegible] program, the night following, [illegible]cessitated. He now bills him[illegible]nor and guitarist", and quite [illegible] for while he is no virtuoso [illegible] guitar, his prowess upon the [illegible]ment has notably developed. [illegible] I wish he would abandon the [illegible] announcing numbers as he [illegible]them, and return to the usual [illegible]ed printed program.

[illegible]ted Nash Patterson, conducting [illegible]horus Pro Musica in Emmanuel [illegible]ch. on Nov. 14, offered an un[illegible]ual list. The pieces formed a [illegible]ey of the "Magnificat", in treat[illegible] by various composers from Dufay, Schuetz and Monteverdi to Rachmaninoff and Schroeder. It was excellent choral work, enjoyed by a very large audience.

Other concerts here have been a violin recital by the young and greatly gifted Michael Rabin, in Symphony Hall, Nov. 11, and an evening of vocal and violin pieces by the Sprengling sisters—Una, violin, and Maeda, soprano—at Jordan Hall, Nov. 15.

—Cyrus Durgin

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1956

Orchestral Work By Berger Is Issued

The score of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" has been issued recently by Peters. Its music comes as no stranger to audiences in the East, for the piece, written in 1952 on a commission from Dimitri Mitropoulos, had its premiere under him with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in 1953. A performance by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony followed the next season.

"Ideas of Order" has been talked about already in a number of reviews. More about it comes to light here in the composer's program notes, reprinted as a preface, which discuss the work's conception and formal layout as well as its relation in spirit to the American poet Wallace Stevens.

Looking at the score now for the first time, after several hearings, some fresh but less immediate facets of the work—by all odds a most cogent piece of music—are pointed up. One of the most striking is the use of small motivic germs — specifically, three notes or, more important, two intervals—as the seeds from which the form unfolds in almost all its aspects. This in itself is hardly new, to be sure. It finds Berger in company with Schönberg in his later years and even more so with Webern and recent 12-tone writers. But what is so effective here is that "Ideas of Order", in an essentially diatonic scheme, succeeds not just in using these germinal groups, but in infusing their essence throughout the texture of the whole work. The unity of style is considerable, and operations like octave transfers and inversions of intervals freshen the texture without causing any obscurity or confusion of ideas.

Berger achieves something else, hard to come by. His lines, with their frequent wide leaps—a key point of the idiom—are genuinely tuneful. Just what makes them come off this way is elusive and fascinating, particularly since their prototypes in other works of a similar cast by various other composers often do not seem to cohere. For one thing, the leaps here are usually intervallic expansions of stepwise lines, whose melodic goals carry over despite the notes in different registers. The end result is an ingratiating lyricism.

Berger has, as well, a keen ear. His scoring of "Ideas" is transparent and fresh, marked throughout by a clean, chiselled style and an inventive use of the orchestra.

In all, this is a significant work, good music in itself, and a special and individual use of advanced techniques on quite successful terms. The score is a welcome addition to the contemporary repertoire.

—David M. Epstein

TIGHT BINDING

120

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 16 1956

Stravinsky and Barber Scores Played by Boston Symphony

Modern works predominated in the program of the Boston Symp[illegible] in Carnegie [illegible] afternoon. They [illegible] "[illegible]," by Igor [illegible] "Medea's Medi[illegible] of Vengeance," [illegible] Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. [illegible] of composers played.

Unfortunately, it was not the most definitive of renderings that the Bostonians gave the Stravinsky. The orchestra was laggard and [illegible] by turns, in attacks and releases. This through the greater [illegible] piece. Natural[illegible] sense and [illegible] the window [illegible] Stravinsky's [illegible] written originally for piano, the Barber had by far the better treatment. The inexact, hit-or-miss playing that had possessed "Jeu de Cartes" was nowhere present in the Barber. That excerpt achieved yesterday, in fact, a deserved classic grandeur under the minister[illegible] of conductor Charles Munch. Also it came right down to human essentials in bespeaking the tragic suffering of the Princess.

Following the intermission the Beethoven, too, obtained considerable expression, not only along the big line, but also in the intimacy and clarity of detail. [illegible] Sym-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 16 1956

N. Y. Times
1956 DECEM[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Performs Three Works, Each With a Dance, on Program Conducted by Munch

There was dance in each of the three works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Charles Munch. The Bostonians were in their best fettle and they made eloquent music.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," which opened the program, was composed for ballet performance. This "card game in three deals," as Stravinsky describes it, is in his best neo-"Nutcracker" vein. It is decorative music, very chic and beguiling, turned out by a master confectioner. Mr. Munch performed it for just what it is, lightly and with delicate tonal balance. The performance had style, too, which this music needs above all.

Samuel Barber's tone poem "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" is dance music of a different sort, adapted from a score, "Cave of the Heart," composed several years ago for Martha Graham. The work reinforced the strong impression it made at its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos last February. Mr. Munch led it Saturday with explosive intensity. The composer bowed from a box in response to the applause.

The dance is a brief touch in the vast landscape of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, yet the impulse of the dance seems to pervade at least three of its movements. Saturday's performance was the climax as well as conclusion of the program.

The symphony sounded as if it were fresh from the composer's pen and as if the composer were freshly overwhelmed by the beauties of nature. In the scene by the brookside the instruments sang with a tenderness and warmth that made that long movement sound far too short.

If the finale was a trifle hurried, the very closing measures returned to a mood of almost beatific serenity. It was a moving performance. E. D.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 1957

New York

Editor and Critic: SHIRLEY CECILLE CASH, 42 Clov[illegible]
Other Critics: Harry L. Fuchs, Sl[illegible]

With The Orchestras

Boston Symphony. At its Dec. 15 concert this season, the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, performed a beautifully balanced program. First, there was Stravinsky's ballet music, "Jeu de Cartes" (Card Game), a delightful confection performed with a jocular touch. Then there was Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work of sombre power and dark shadings. But it was Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony which shone brightest in this trio of performances . . . Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston for two weeks after Christmas and through the tour of the Orchestra. Mr. Burgin is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony . . .

BOSTON

■ Much new music has been presented to Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons, although an eagerly awaited world premiere, that of Walton's Violoncello Concerto, scheduled for Dec. 7, was postponed because of soloist Gregor Piatigorsky's illness.

According to Symphony Hall officials, however, no other orchestra will play the work until the Bostonians do, when Piatigorsky recovers.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, commissioned by the Juilliard School, was new to Boston and made an excellent impression for combination of polish, strength and structure. Other works conducted by Charles Munch for his Oct. 26-27 pair were the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, the Lento from Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 130 (performed by the string orchestra in memory of the librarian Leslie Rogers), and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

There were no novelties for the Nov. 9-10 concerts but Munch was at his brilliant best for a well-balanced list including the Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings, the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," and the Brahms First. (The last previous performance of the Brahms was in March 1954 when Guido Cantelli was guest conductor here.)

Vladimir Golschmann brought a United States premiere with him when he guest-conducted for the concerts of Nov. 23-24. This was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, a five-movement work played [illegible] Written in 1955, the new [illegible] markable chiefly for its g[illegible] color. The ideas and themes are [illegible] worked out and interest is maintained throughout by provocative themes and craftsmanlike development. Mr. Golschman did a fine piece of work here as he did with the opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon." The performances of Debussy's "La Mer," and the Brahms Fourth were somewhat marred by the orchestra's apparent inability to understand all the conductor's directions. In any event, to program these favorites of both Koussevitzky and Munch in Boston was bringing beans to the Hub with a vengeance.

One of the finest programs thus far was the 7th pair, Nov. 30-31, when Irmgard Seefried was soloist in the Bach "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202). The soprano did a superbly artistic job beautifully supported by the orchestra under Munch. The work had never before been performed at these concerts, nor had the Hindemith Songs from "Das Marienleben," which Miss Seefried sang even better than the Bach, if that were possible. Munch's vital reading of the remarkable Honegger Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra and his sensitive performance of the Roussel "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 completed a program received with much enthusiasm.

■ Other events in Boston have included the opening of the Statler Morning Musicales, with Eileen Farrell as soloist before a capacity audience. At Jordan Hall Paul Cherkassky opened the Civic Symphony Orchestra's season with the Ruslan and Ludmilla Overture by Glinka, the Schubert Seventh, and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, with Edith Stearns a poised and sensitive soloist. Cherkassky's way with the overture was exciting, indeed, and the Schubert received a well-paced and intelligent reading. JULES WOLFFERS

DEC 1 3 1956

Golschmann Offers Tansman Concerto in Boston Visit

Boston.—The fortnight past has been reasonably active but relatively uneventful. [illegible] novelty. [illegible] piece of music new here has been proffered in the interim. This was Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, introduced on the Nov. 23-24 concerts of the Boston Symphony by guest conductor Vladimir Golschmann. Indeed, this work of five movements, in alternation between slow and fast, soft and loud, was an American premiere. The single performance of it that I heard failed to establish it as music of decided individuality. Though it has much piquant and finely calculated dissonance, and even some of the strong acid distilled from the 12-tone system, Tansman's Concerto did not register very forcefully.

It could have been the performance, for an unmistakable impression of superficiality was the residue of the entire concert. Mr. Golschmann is a thinking and conscientious musician, and the orchestra mostly played well for him. But seldom seemed to be in full control of the players, and some [illegible] wrong. The program otherwise consisted of Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon", Debussy's "La Mer", and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Elgar Work Revived

Two weeks earlier Charles Munch had opened off Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, which was a one production [illegible] ing, especially [illegible] tinkle [illegible] timpani parts. He brought out much horn detail in the first movement, which proved interesting yet not distorted. But why he chose to substitute timpani rolls for the repeated notes Brahms wrote in the loud statement of the chorale [illegible] that is another matter.

Elisabeth [illegible] Kopf, the beautiful blonde [illegible] made her aural appearance [illegible] Celebrity [illegible] Nov. 13, [illegible] Schumann's "Der Nussbaum" and Schubert's "An die Musik." George Reeves was the [illegible]

Tansman

Visit

[illegible] Jordan Hall on Nov. 19 indicated that the abilities of the two are combined, that these [illegible] together not two musicians, but a well-rounded, sensitively-adjusted entity. The whole evening was pleasant [illegible] Schumann's A minor Sonata, [illegible] the A major Sonata of Brahms, the second Sonata by Charles [illegible] Duo Concertante of Bruneau, [illegible] Fauré's passionate A major [illegible]

[illegible] by Dyer-Bennet

[illegible] Richard Dyer-Bennet has much [illegible] his local following. His [illegible] of art and folksongs in Jordan Hall on Nov. 1[illegible] boasted an audience which required [illegible] on stage, and the second program the night following was necessitated [illegible] "tenor and [illegible] properly, for while [illegible] is his virtuosity of the guitar, his powers upon the instrument has notably developed. But I wish he would change the idea of announcing [illegible] as he sings them, and return to the usual detailed printed program.

Alfred Nash Patterson, conducting the Chorus Pro Musica in Emmanuel Church, on Nov. 14, offered an unusual list. The pieces formed a survey of the "Magnificat" as a treatment by various composers from Dufay, Schuetz and Monteverdi to Rachmaninoff and Schroeder. It was an excellent choral work enjoyed by a very large audience.

Other concerts here have been a violin recital by the young and greatly gifted Michael Rabin, in Symphony Hall, Nov. 11, and an evening of vocal and violin pieces by the Sheng-ling sisters—Una, violin, and [illegible]eda, soprano—at Jordan Hall, Nov. 15.

—Cyrus Durgin

MUSICAL [illegible]
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC [illegible]

Orchestral Work By Berger Is Issued

The score of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" has been issued recently by Peters. Its music comes as no stranger to audiences in the East, for the piece, written in 1952 on a commission from Dimitri Mitropoulos, had its premiere under the [illegible] the New York Philharmonic Symphony [illegible] 1953. All performances by Charles Munch and the Boston [illegible] the next season [illegible]

"Ideas of Order" has been talked about already in a number of reviews. Before about a decade to light [illegible] the composer's program notes, reprinted in a preface, which discuss [illegible] with a preconception and formal [illegible] as well as [illegible] in spirit to the American poet Wallace Stevens.

In looking at the score for the first time, after several hearings, some fresh [illegible] facets of the work [illegible] most cogent piece of music—are picked up. One of the most striking is the use of small motivic germs—specifically, three notes or, more important, two intervals—as the seeds from which the form unfolds in [illegible] its aspects. This in itself is hardly new, to be sure. It finds Berger in good company with Schönberg in his later years and even more so with Webern and recent 12-tone writers. But what is so effective here is that "Ideas of Order", in an essentially diatonic scheme, succeeds not just in using these germinal groups, but in infusing their essence throughout the texture of the whole work. The unity of style is considerable, and [illegible] intervals transfer [illegible] freshen the texture without causing any obscurity or confusion of ideas.

Berger [illegible] something else, hard to come [illegible] with their frequent [illegible] key point of [illegible] tuneful. Just what makes them come off this way is elusive and fascinating, particularly [illegible] other works of similar cast by various other composers often do not seem to cohere. For one thing, the leaps here are usually intervallic expansions of stepwise lines, whose melodic goals carry over despite the notes in different registers. The end result is an ingratiating lyricism.

Berger has, as well, a keen ear. His scoring of "Ideas" is transparent and fresh, marked throughout by a clean, chiselled style and an inventive use of the orchestra.

In all, this is a significant work, good music in itself, and a special and individual use of advanced techniques on quite successful terms. The score is a welcome addition to the contemporary repertoire.

—David M. Epstein

TIGHT BINDING

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
DEC 16 1956

Stravinsky and Barber Scores Played by Boston Symphony

Modern works predominated in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. They were, "Jeu de Cartes," by Igor Stravinsky, and "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," by Samuel Barber. Beethoven, via the "Pastoral" Symphony, completed the trio of composers played.

Unhappily, it was not the most definitive of renderings that the Bostonians gave the Stravinsky. The orchestra was laggard and premature by turns, in attacks and releases. This through the greater part of the piece. Naturally, unity, musical sense and the rest went out the window.

Of the two scores, Stravinsky's and Barber's, both written originally for ballets, the Barber had by far the better treatment. The inexact, hit-or-miss playing that had possessed "Jeu de Cartes" was nowhere present in the Barber. That excerpt achieved yesterday, in fact, a deserved classic grandeur under the ministrations of conductor Charles Munch. Also it came right down to human essentials in bespeaking the tragic suffering of the Princess.

Following the intermission the Beethoven, too, obtained considerable expression, not only along the big line, but also in the intimacy and clarity of detail. Obviously the Boston Symphony had found itself. R. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
DEC 16 1956

N.Y. Times, 1956. DECEMBER 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Performs Three Works, Each With a Dance, on Program Conducted by Munch

There was dance in each of the three works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Charles Munch. The Bostonians were in their best fettle and they made eloquent music.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," which opened the program, was composed for ballet performance. This "card game in three deals," as Stravinsky describes it, is in his best neo-"Nutcracker" vein. It is decorative music, very chic and beguiling, turned out by a master confectioner. Mr. Munch performed it for just what it is, lightly and with delicate tonal balance. The performance had style, too, which this music needs above all.

Samuel Barber's tone poem "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" is dance music of a different sort, adapted from a score, "Cave of the Heart," composed several years ago for Martha Graham. The work reinforced the strong impression it made at its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos last February. Mr. Munch led it Saturday with explosive intensity. The composer bowed from a box in response to the applause.

The dance is a brief touch in the vast landscape of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, yet the impulse of the dance seems to pervade at least three of its movements. Saturday's performance was the climax as well as conclusion of the program.

The symphony sounded as if it were fresh from the composer's pen and as if the composer were freshly overwhelmed by the beauties of nature. In the scene by the brookside the instruments sang with a tenderness and warmth that made that long movement sound far too short.

If the finale was a trifle hurried, the very closing measures returned to a mood of almost beatific serenity. It was a moving performance. E. D.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1956

Golschmann Offers Tansman Concerto in Boston Visit

Boston.—The fortnight past has been reasonably active but relatively uneventful, at least in terms of novelty.

But one piece of music new here has been proffered in this time. That was Alexandre Tansman's Concerto for Orchestra, introduced at the Nov. 23-24 concerts of the Boston Symphony by guest conductor Vladimir Golschmann. Indeed, this work of five movements, in alternation between slow and fast, soft and loud, was an American premiere. The single performance of it that I heard failed to establish it as music of decided individuality. Though it has much piquant and finely calculated dissonance, and even some of the strong acid distilled from the 12-tone system, Tansman's Concerto did not register very forcefully.

It could have been the performance, for an inescapable impression of superficiality was the residue of the entire concert. Mr. Golschmann is a sincere and conscientious musician, and the orchestra mostly plays well for him. But he seldom seems to be in full control of the player and some things went wrong. The program otherwise consisted of Kabalevsky's Overture to "Colas Breugnon", Debussy's "La Mer", and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Elgar Work Relished

Two weeks earlier, Charles Munch had dusted off Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, which was a one produc- ng, especially phony strings uminous best. ered Stravin- ore, "Jeu de loquent and nce, the C Brahms. This onductor had tinkered a little in the horn and timpani parts. He brought out much horn detail in the first movement, which proved interesting yet not distorted. But why he chose to substitute timpani rolls for the quarter notes Brahms wrote in the loud statement of the chorale in the finale, that is another matter.

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, the beautiful blonde soprano, made her annual appearance in the Boston University Celebrity Series at Symphony Hall on Nov. 18. The first third of the stated program was uneasily delivered, but things picked up after that, and some of her finest singing was accomplished during a lengthy string of encores, which included Wolf's "Kennst du, das Land?" (which Miss Schwarzkopf always does magnificently) and "Mausfahlen spruechlein", Schumann's "Der Nussbaum" and Schubert's "An die Musik". George Reeves was the collaborator at the piano.

ndividual musicians, violinist osselt and pianist Luise Vosboth have deservedly high
As a duo they are new.
Their first such Boston con-ordan Hall on Nov. 14, indithe abilities of the two are
ed. that these artists together two musicians, but a well-sensitively-adjusted entity.
e evening was pleasurable, umann's A minor Sonata,
e A major Sonata of Bach,
d Sonata by Charles Ives, Concertante of Stravinsky passionate A major So-

by Dyer-Bennet

Dyer-Bennet has much inhis local following. His con-art and folksongs in Jordan
Nov. 16, boasted an audience equired seats on stage, and a program, the night following, cessitated. He now bills him-nor and guitarist", and quite for while he is no virtuoso guitar, his prowess upon the ent has notably developed.
wish he would abandon the announcing numbers as he them, and return to the usual ed printed program.

red Nash Patterson, conducting horus Pro Musica in Emmanuel ch, on Nov. 14, offered an un-al list. The pieces formed a vey of the "Magnificat", in treat-by various composers from Dufay, Schuetz and Monteverdi to Rachmaninoff and Schroeder. It was excellent choral work, enjoyed by a very large audience.

Other concerts here have been a violin recital by the young and greatly gifted Michael Rabin, in Symphony Hall, Nov. 11, and an evening of vocal and violin pieces by the Sprengling sisters—Una, violin, and Maeda, soprano—at Jordan Hall, Nov. 15.

—Cyrus Durgin

New York

Editor and Critic: SHIRLEY CECILLE CASH, 42 Clov
Other Critics: Harry L. Fuchs, Sl

With The Orchestras

Boston Symphony. At its Dec. 15 concert this season, the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, performed a beautifully balanced program. First, there was Stravinsky's ballet music, "Jeu de Cartes" (Card Game), a delightful confection performed with a jocular touch. Then there was Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," a work of sombre power and dark shadings. But it was Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony which shone brightest in this trio of performances . . . Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston for two weeks after Christmas and through the tour of the Orchestra. Mr. Burgin is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony . . .

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)
DEC 15 1956

BOSTON

■ Much new music has been presented to Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons, although an eagerly awaited world premiere, that of Walton's Violoncello Concerto, scheduled for Dec. 7, was postponed because of soloist Gregor Piatigorsky's illness. According to Symphony Hall officials, however, no other orchestra will play the work until the Bostonians do it when Piatigorsky recovers.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 5, commissioned by the Juilliard School, was new to Boston and made an excellent impression for combination of polish, strength and structure. Other works conducted by Charles Munch for this Oct. 26-27 pair were the Mozart "Paris" Symphony, the Lento from Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 135 (performed by the string orchestra in memory of the librarian Leslie Rogers), and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

There were no novelties for the Nov. 9-10 concerts but Munch was at his brilliant best for a well-balanced list including the Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings, the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," and the Brahms First. (The last previous performance of the Brahms was in March 1954 when Guido Cantelli was guest conductor here.)

Vladimir Golschmann brought a United States premiere with him when he guest-conducted for the concerts of Nov. 23-24. This was the Tansman Concerto for Orchestra, a five-movement work played without pause. Written in 1955, the new work is remarkable chiefly for its glittering tone color. The ideas and themes are well worked out and interest is maintained throughout by provocative themes and craftsmanlike development. Mr. Golschman did a fine piece of work here as he did with the opening Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon." The performances of Debussy's "La Mer," and the Brahms Fourth were somewhat marred by the orchestra's apparent inability to understand all the conductor's directions. In any event, to program these favorites of both Koussevitzky and Munch in Boston was bringing beans to the Hub with a vengeance.

One of the finest programs thus far was the 7th pair, Nov. 30-31, when Irmgard Seefried was soloist in the Bach "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202). The soprano did a superbly artistic job beautifully supported by the orchestra under Munch. The work had never before been performed at these concerts, nor had the Hindemith Songs from "Das Marienleben," which Miss Seefried sang even better than the Bach, if that were possible. Munch's vital reading of the remarkable Honegger Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra and his sensitive performance of the Roussel "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 completed a program received with much enthusiasm.

■ Other events in Boston have included the opening of the Statler Morning Musicales, with Eileen Farrell as soloist before a capacity audience. . . . At Jordan Hall Paul Cherkassky opened the Civic Symphony Orchestra's season with the Ruslan and Ludmilla Overture by Glinka, the Schubert Seventh, and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, with Edith Stearns a poised and sensitive soloist. Cherkassky's way with the overture was exciting, indeed, and the Schubert received a well-paced and intelligent reading. JULES WOLFFERS

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1956

Orchestral Work By Berger Is Issued

The score of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" has been issued recently by Peters. Its music comes as no stranger to audiences in the East, for the piece, written in 1952 on a commission from Dimitri Mitropoulos, had its premiere under him with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in 1953. A performance by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony followed the next season.

"Ideas of Order" has been talked about already in a number of reviews. More about it comes to light here in the composer's program notes, reprinted as a preface, which discuss the work's conception and formal layout as well as its relation in spirit to the American poet Wallace Stevens.

Looking at the score now for the first time, after several hearings, some fresh but less immediate facets of the work—by all odds a most cogent piece of music—are pointed up. One of the most striking is the use of small motivic germs — specifically, three notes or, more important, two intervals—as the seeds from which the form unfolds in almost all its aspects. This in itself is hardly new, to be sure. It finds Berger in company with Schönberg in his later years and even more so with Webern and recent 12-tone writers. But what is so effective here is that "Ideas of Order", in an essentially diatonic scheme, succeeds not just in using these germinal groups, but in infusing their essence throughout the texture of the whole work. The unity of style is considerable, and operations like octave transfers and inversions of intervals freshen the texture without causing any obscurity or confusion of ideas.

Berger achieves something else hard to come by. His lines, with their frequent wide leaps—a key point of the idiom—are genuinely tuneful. Just what makes them come off this way is elusive and fascinating, particularly since their prototypes in other works of a similar cast by various other composers often do not seem to cohere. For one thing, the leaps here are usually intervallic expansions of stepwise lines, whose melodic goals carry over despite the notes in different registers. The end result is an ingratiating lyricism.

Berger has, as well, a keen ear. His scoring of "Ideas" is transparent and fresh, marked throughout by a clean, chiselled style and an inventive use of the orchestra.

In all, this is a significant work, good music in itself, and a special and individual use of advanced techniques on quite successful terms. The score is a welcome addition to the contemporary repertoire.

—David M. Epstein

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 19 1956

Silverstein Soloist at Symphony

Young Violinist Heard In Saint-Saëns Concerto

By Harold Rogers

The concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly ~~un~~distinguished with but one exception. This was the debut of Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. Mr. Silverstein had appeared last spring with the Boston Pops, but this was his first performance during the Boston Symphony's regular season.

Mr. Silverstein, modest in manner, is the youngest member of the orchestra (now 24) and is in his second year with the ensemble. At intermission, after his altogether impressive performance of the Saint-Saëns Concerto No. 3, several in the audience were prognosticating the probable reasons why Mr. Silverstein was singled out for this honor. Was he being groomed for the concertmaster's position? Symphony Hall has given no indications of such a move, though it is interesting to note that Mr. Silverstein has been the assistant concertmaster of the Houston Symphony and concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Denver Symphony Orchestra.

He was probably singled out for the honor because he is an extraordinary violinist. This was evident almost from the first bars of the Saint-Saëns, a pallid piece of writing the time of which has long gone by. But it's a pretty piece, and its problems are complicated enough to challenge the most experienced artists. It was a good test—one that Mr. Silverstein passed with colors flying.

* * *

His tone is big and opulent, eminently appealing in its warmth. A few minor flaws in intonation were ironed out as he quickly found his stride, after which he played with ease. Before he had completed the first movement, it was evident that Mr. Silverstein's artistry exceeds that of some of the younger violinists who are on the concert stage today.

In the Andantino he presented the lovely melody in a buoyant, singing way, ending with a fantastic series of harmonics in arpeggios. In the final movement he played with a dashing bravura, striking off the notes with aplomb. He had earned the resulting ovation.

* * *

Although Charles Munch had been scheduled to conduct, he was spelled last night by Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor. Dr. Munch doubtless desired rest after his several long rehearsals this week for the Berlioz "L'Enfance du Christ," which he will conduct at the weekend concerts. The men in the orchestra also would benefit from rest, to judge by their performance last night.

The program opened with a rather routine traversal of Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon" and closed with the Brahms First Symphony. While the latter had its moments of grandeur, it was by and large an insensitive reading, given a run through as if nobody much cared. Nearly everything was blown up a little larger than it should have been, as if we were seeing it through a magnifying glass, and indeed, it is difficult to remember when the orchestra has played so badly.

But considering the circumstances — the grueling European tour, the long rehearsals this week, and a second season without a vacation—they play amazingly well. The whole orchestra deserves a standing ovation.

Dec 19 '56
Bz Herald

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 19 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Silverstein Is Violin Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played in Symphony Hall, last night the fifth concert of the Tuesday evening series. Richard Burgin conducted. Cherubini: Overture to "Anacreon"; Saint-Saens: Violin Concerto No. 3 in B minor (Joseph Silverstein, soloist); Brahms: Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Tuesday evening Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall for some time have been given largely to music already played in the season. That of last night was different for Joseph Silverstein appeared as soloist in Saint-Saens' B minor Violin Concerto. Richard Burgin conducted in place of Charles Munch, who was reported suffering from a slight indisposition.

Still under the age of 25, Silverstein joined the orchestra last season as its youngest member.

Detroit-born, he was a pupil of Zimbalist, Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He is a member of the Boston Symphony's second violin section.

For this occasion he tackled not one of the familiar and overdone items of the concerto literature but a somewhat quaint and old-fashioned work which had been heard at these concerts but once in more than 25 years. Silverstein played it well, with poise once the first movement was under way, and with refinement all the way through. His technic is solid, his bowing certain and unostentatious.

Last night, Silverstein was said to be playing the "Booth" Stradivarius owned by Mischakoff. From it he produced a silken and singing tone, neither small nor remarkably big. All was in proportion in this performance, all consistent; the phrases "sang" all the way, there was little virtuoso display. It was a matter of music-making, honest and highly competent.

The orchestra under Burgin gave the soloist a firm and never too large accompaniment. For all, at the end, there was sustained, enthusiastic applause. Brahms' Symphony went well enough, too, perhaps with a few untidinesses of detail, but in a performance vigorous, full-bodied, virile.

MUSIC

Joseph Silverstein

Joseph Silverstein, violinist, appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at the fifth Tuesday night concert of the season in Symphony Hall. The program, conducted by Richard Burgin, included: Cherubini: Overture to "Anachreon"; Saint-Saens: Concerto No. 3 in B minor, Op. 61; Brahms: Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Joseph Silverstein, the newest and youngest member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, stepped out of his position in the last chair of the second violins last night to do Saint Saens' B minor Violin Concerto and instantly revealed himself to be a virtuoso of the highest order.

It is hard to convey what it means to do what this 24 year old young man did: the role of the orchestral musician is special. It requires the subjudgation of the individual musical spirit to that of the whole; personal revelation is suppressed in favor of a technical and interpretative unanimity dictated from above. This is not to say the individual loses his individuality but, in the long run, there is no doubt that the discipline of orchestral playing induces a certain sense of collective security, and collective security in turn diminishes both the sense of individual virtuosity and the drive for personal recognition.

Lively Style

With Mr. Silverstein, however, a slight, dark, intense young man, the last chair of the second violins has watered down his individual virtuosity not at all. Using the famous Booth Stradivarius, loaned to him for the occasion by his former teacher Mischa Mischakoff, he quickly revealed both an enormous technical talent and a lively stylistic approach. His tone, especially on the G string, is big and glowing and vibrant, and his bowing is beautifully conceived. His dexterity on the fingerboard is of the fleetest and marked by a fine, just intonation.

His playing is without mannerism, either, yet his appearance is persuasive and attractive. I think it might be said the flute-like harmonics in obligato with the clarinet at the end of the second movement were not completely integrated at the outset, but otherwise it was a flawless performance of a work that, despite its generally inferior character, is certainly grateful enough. The young violinist was received with great enthusiasm.

In the absence of Mr. Munch, out with a cold, the concert was conducted by Richard Burgin with his usual competence.

News
FAIRFIELD, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 2,850
DEC 20 1956

Community Concert Assoc. To Present Concerts Here

W. G. Wilkins, president of the newly organized Community Concert Association, for the area announces the election of the following officers:

Charles S. Brody, vice president; John Molloy, secretary; George J. Ferrio, treasurer, and Jack Bowman, publicity chairman.

Other officers and appointments will be anonunced shortly, along with plans for the membership week. Board members in addition to the officers are Prof. Edward F. Byerly, Catherine Russell, Dr. Robert J. Curley, Prof. W. Earl Sauerwein, Mrs. Alpheus Winter, Norman Pollack, Robert A. Thompson, Grace Sterling, Mrs. Robert Gerrety, Evelyn B. Felton, Raymond D. Builter, Mrs. C. Howard Black, the Rev. Howard Anderson, Rabbi Harry Nelson, Dr. Marie L. Jaeger, and Alice Duckworth. A few additional board members will be announced later.

Wilkins announces on behalf of the Board that the association is proud to be able to present for the benefit and pleasure of Bridgeport-Fairfield area residents an outstanding concert series on an annual basis.

The Boston Symphony with Charles Munch conducting has been booked for the coming season.

Town Crier & Herald
WESTPORT, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 6,200
DEC 20 1956

New Concert Series . . .

Something new has appeared on the musical scene in this area. Just organized is the Community Concert Association of Bridgeport, Inc., which will annually present, in the Klein Memorial, a series of concerts by the very greatest artists and attractions.

For the first season, 1957-1958, the association announces that the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch conducting has already been booked; also announced is a joint recital by the outstanding baritone and soprano artists Todd Duncan and Camilla Williams. The series will consist of at least four, but more probably five concert presentations; the remaining artists and attractions besides those already booked for next year will be chosen and announced by the directors of the association after the completion of the membership week.

The Boston Symphony is regarded by many as the greatest orchestra in the world today. It has only recently returned from its successful tour of Europe which included all the major cities, including those behind the iron curtain. This tour was under the sponsorship of the United States State Department.

Todd Duncan created the role of Porgy in the original production of Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess" and again portrayed Porgy in the Broadway revival a few years later. Both received tremendous acclaim. He is immensely popular in the theatre, in movies, and on the concert stage here in the United States and abroad in Europe and Australia. Camilla Williams, Prima Donna soprano of the Vienna State Opera and the New York City Opera Company, is the darling of the city of Vienna and is a concert favorite in Europe and the United States. Their rare joint concert are a highlight of any concert season anywhere.

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 20 1956

Bender

Giorgio Tozzi will be the bass soloist for the Berlioz "L'Enfance du Christ," to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its open rehearsal in Symphony Hall tonight and at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Town Crier & Herald
WESTPORT, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 6,200
DEC 20 1956

CHARLES MUNCH who will conduct the Boston Symphony when it gives its concert in Bridgeport. Date to be announced.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 1956

Silverstein Soloist at Symphony

Young Violinist Heard In Saint-Saëns Concerto

By Harold Rogers

The concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly distinguished with but one exception. This was the debut of Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. Mr. Silverstein had appeared last spring with the Boston Pops, but this was his first performance during the Boston Symphony's regular season.

Mr. Silverstein, modest in manner, is the youngest member of the orchestra (now 24) and is in his second year with the ensemble. At intermission, after his altogether impressive performance of the Saint-Saëns Concerto No. 3, several in the audience were prognosticating the probable reasons why Mr. Silverstein was singled out for this honor. Was he being groomed for the concertmaster's position? Symphony Hall has given no indications of such a move, though it is interesting to note that Mr. Silverstein has been the assistant concertmaster of the Houston Symphony and concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Denver Symphony Orchestra.

He was probably singled out for the honor because he is an extraordinary violinist. This was evident almost from the first bars of the Saint-Saëns, a pallid piece of writing the time of which has long gone by. But it's a pretty piece, and its problems are complicated enough to challenge the most experienced artists. It was a good test—one that Mr. Silverstein passed with colors flying.

* * *

His tone is big and opulent, eminently appealing in its warmth. A few minor flaws in intonation were ironed out as he quickly found his stride, after which he played with ease. Before he had completed the first movement, it was evident that Mr. Silverstein's artistry exceeds that of some of the younger violinists who are on the concert stage today.

In the Andantino he presented the lovely melody in a buoyant, singing way, ending with a fantastic series of harmonics in arpeggios. In the final movement he played with a dashing bravura, striking off the notes with aplomb. He had earned the resulting ovation.

* * *

Although Charles Munch had been scheduled to conduct, he was spelled last night by Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor. Dr. Munch doubtless desired rest after his several long rehearsals this week for the Berlioz "L'Enfance du Christ," which he will conduct at the weekend concerts. The men in the orchestra also would benefit from rest, to judge by their performance last night.

The program opened with a rather routine traversal of Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon" and closed with the Brahms First Symphony. While the latter had its moments of grandeur, it was by and large an insensitive reading, given a run through as if nobody much cared. Nearly everything was blown up a little larger than it should have been, as if we were seeing it through a magnifying glass, and indeed, it is difficult to remember when the orchestra has played so badly.

But considering the circumstances — the grueling European tour, the long rehearsals this week, and a second season without a vacation—they play amazingly well. The whole orchestra deserves a standing ovation.

Dec 19 '56
Herald

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 19 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Silverstein Is Violin Soloist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played in Symphony Hall, last night, the fifth concert of the Tuesday evening series. Richard Burgin conducted. Cherubini: Overture to "Anacreon"; Saint-Saens: Violin Concerto No. 3, in B minor (Joseph Silverstein, soloist); Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Tuesday evening Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall for some time have been given largely to music already played in the season. That of last night was different for Joseph Silverstein appeared as soloist in Saint-Saens' B minor Violin Concerto. Richard Burgin conducted in place of Charles Munch, who was reported suffering from a slight indisposition.

Still under the age of 25, Silverstein joined the orchestra last season as its youngest member.

Detroit-born, he was a pupil of Zimbalist, Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He is a member of the Boston Symphony's second violin section.

For this occasion he tackled not one of the familiar and overdone items of the concerto literature but a somewhat quaint and old-fashioned work which had been heard at these concerts but once in more than 25 years. Silverstein played it well, with poise once the first movement was under way, and with refinement all the way through. His technic is solid, his bowing certain and unostentatious.

Last night, Silverstein was said to be playing the "Booth" Stradivarius owned by Mischakoff. From it he produced a silken and singing tone, neither small nor remarkably big. All was in proportion in this performance, all consistent; the phrases "sang" all the way, there was little virtuoso display. It was a matter of music-making, honest and highly competent.

The orchestra under Burgin gave the soloist a firm and never too large accompaniment. For all, at the end, there was sustained, enthusiastic applause. Brahms' Symphony went well enough, too, perhaps with a few untidinesses of detail, but in a performance vigorous, full-bodied, virile.

MUSIC

Joseph Silverstein

Joseph Silverstein, violinist, appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at the fifth Tuesday night concert of the season in Symphony Hall. The program, conducted by Richard Burgin, included:
Overture to "Anachreon" — Cherubini
Concerto No. 3 in b minor, Op. 61 — Saint Saens
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 — Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Joseph Silverstein, the newest and youngest member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, stepped out of his position in the last chair of the second violins last night to do Saint Saens' B minor Violin Concerto and instantly revealed himself to be a virtuoso of the highest order.

It is hard to convey what it means to do what this 24 year old young man did: the role of the orchestral musician is special. It requires the subjudgation of the individual musical spirit to that of the whole; personal revelation is suppressed in favor of a technical and interpretative unanimity dictated from above. This is not to say the individual loses his individuality but, in the long run, there is no doubt that the discipline of orchestral playing induces a certain sense of collective security, and collective security in turn diminishes both the sense of individual virtuosity and the drive for personal recognition.

Lively Style

With Mr. Silverstein, however, a slight, dark, intense young man, the last chair of the second violins has watered down his individual virtuosity not at all. Using the famous Booth Stradivarius, loaned to him for the occasion by his former teacher Mischa Mischakoff, he quickly revealed both an enormous technical talent and a lively stylistic approach. His tone, especially on the G string, is big and glowing and vibrant, and his bowing is beautifully conceived. His dexterity on the fingerboard is of the fleetest and marked by a fine, just intonation.

His playing is without mannerism, either, yet his appearance is persuasive and attractive. I think it might be said the flute-like harmonics in obligato with the clarinet at the end of the second movement were not completely integrated at the outset, but otherwise it was a flawless performance of a work that, despite its generally inferior character, is certainly grateful enough. The young violinist was received with great enthusiasm.

In the absence of Mr. Munch, out with a cold, the concert was conducted by Richard Burgin with his usual competence.

News
FAIRFIELD, Conn.
Weekly · Independent
Circ. 2,850

Community Concert Assoc. To Present Concerts Here

W. G. Wilkins, president of the newly organized Community Concert Association, for the area announces the election of the following officers:

Charles S. Brody, vice president; John Molloy, secretary; George J. Ferrio, treasurer, and Jack Bowman, publicity chairman.

Other officers and appointments will be anonunced shortly, along with plans for the membership week. Board members in addition to the officers are Prof. Edward F. Byerly, Catherine Russell, Dr. Robert J. Curley, Prof. W. Earl Sauerwein, Mrs. Alpheus Winter, Norman Pollack, Robert A. Thompson, Grace Sterling, Mrs. Robert Gerrety, Evelyn B. Felton, Raymond D. Builter, Mrs. C. Howard Black, the Rev. Howard Anderson, Rabbi Harry Nelson, Dr. Marie L. Jaeger, and Alice Duckworth. A few additional board members will be announced later.

Wilkins announces on behalf of the Board that the Association is proud to be able to present for the benefit and pleasure of Bridgeport-Fairfield area residents an outstanding concert series on an annual basis.

The Boston Symphony with Charles Munch conducting has been booked for the coming season.

Town Crier & Herald
WESTPORT, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 6,200
DEC 20 1956

Bender

Giorgio Tozzi will be the bass soloist for the Berlioz "L'Enfance du Christ," to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its open rehearsal in Symphony Hall tonight and at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Town Crier & Herald
WESTPORT, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 6,200
DEC 20 1956

CHARLES MUNCH who will conduct the Boston Symphony when it gives its concert in Bridgeport. Date to be announced.

Town Crier & Herald
WESTPORT, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 6,200
DEC 20 1956

New Concert Series . . .

Something new has appeared on the musical scene in this area. Just organized is the Community Concert Association of Bridgeport, Inc., which will annually present, in the Klein Memorial, a series of concerts by the very greatest artists and attractions.

For the first season, 1957-1958, the association announces that the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch conducting has already been booked; also announced is a joint recital by the outstanding baritone and soprano artists Todd Duncan and Camilla Williams. The series will consist of at least four, but more probably five concert presentations; the remaining artists and attractions besides those already booked for next year will be chosen and announced by the directors of the association after the completion of the membership week.

The Boston Symphony is regarded by many as the greatest orchestra in the world today. It has only recently returned from its successful tour of Europe which included all the major cities, including those behind the iron curtain. This tour was under the sponsorship of the United States State Department.

Todd Duncan created the role of Porgy in the original production of Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess" and again portrayed Porgy in the Broadway revival a few years later. Both received tremendous acclaim. He is immensely popular in the theatre, in movies, and on the concert stage here in the United States and abroad in Europe and Australia. Camilla Williams, Prima Donna soprano of the Vienna State Opera and the New York City Opera Company, is the darling of the city of Vienna and is a concert favorite in Europe and the United States. Their rare joint concerts are a highlight of any concert season anywhere.

TIGHT BINDING

172

Christian Science Monitor (S)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 22 1956

Berlioz Trilogy at Symphony

'L'Enfance du Christ' Conducted by Charles Munch

By Harold Rogers

There are at least two occasions when Charles Munch's concerts in Symphony Hall transcend the sensuous beauties of terrestrial sound to touch the fringes of celestial glory—when he conducts either of the Passions by Bach, or "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz.

At this Christmas season Dr. Munch is reviving the Berlioz, introduced by him in its entirety to Boston in December, 1953. It is to be hoped that this production of "L'Enfance du Christ" will be recorded, for he has collected an almost flawless quartet of soloists, and the choral forces of the New England Conservatory of Music are singing superbly.

The performance yesterday afternoon was marked by the loving care and tenderness that Berlioz must have felt when he wrote: "I have often asked myself what could be the possibilities of the mystification called Life: it is to know what is beautiful, it is to love."

There is no question that this music was composed with love, and there was [illegible] no question yesterday that it [illegible] performed with love. In [illegible] serenity it radiated love—[illegible] scene in the Stable in [illegible]hem, with its attendant [illegible] chorus; in the Farewell of [illegible] Shepherds in a joyous pastor[illegible] in the oasis where we find [illegible] Holy Family at Rest on their [illegible]ight into Egypt.

Berlioz chose to write his own text, and in so doing he created an apocryphal [illegible] of his own. He opens [illegible] restless and portentous music as Herod tosses on his bed with troubled dreams of being supplanted by a child. For Berlioz the wise men (here called soothsayers) played a villainous role, that of recommending the slaughter of the innocents.

At this point Giorgio Tozzi, as Herod, poured forth his eloquent and lyrical basso in a ringing outburst. His artistic singing was again heard as he impersonated the father of an Ishmaelite family in Saïs. Here Berlioz fills in the Biblical gaps in his own way by having the Holy Family graciously received by the Ishmaelites and even entertained by their host's musical children.

At this point we become aware that Berlioz, like the Renaissance painters, chose to place the Biblical characters in latter-day surroundings. Thus during a concert by the Ishmaelite trio (a flute duet by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, to Bernard Zighera's mellifious harp) we find the Ishmaelite home turning into something like an 18th-century drawing room.

Cesare Valletti, who sang the solos of the Narrator, is another whose voice is eminently lyrical, easily produced and golden in sound. His tenor was especially buoyant in his final prayer with the chorus. His French pronunciation, however, is inconsistent and shows need of further coaching.

Gérard Souzay, heard as Joseph, gave another of his performances that comes straight from the heart. There is nothing earthborn in his baritone; he can be counted among the few truly poetic singers of our day. His duet with Florence Kopleff, heard as Mary, was an artistic collaboration of rare warmth. Her contralto has a steady, serene, and clear quality especially suitable to the role.

Receiving applause with Dr. Munch were Lorna Cooke deVaron, who trained the choral forces, and Simone Rivier, who coached them in their French.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 134,485
DEC 22 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Berlioz' Christmas Oratorio

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, gave in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the ninth program of the Friday-Saturday series. He conducted Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ." The chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon; the soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone, and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

BY CYRUS DURGIN

Over the past seven years we have had much occasion to thank Charles Munch for musical pleasures received. Not by any means the least is Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Mr. Munch conducted here complete for the first time in 1953. He is presenting this unique masterpiece again at the Symphony concerts this week, and it makes a rare and perfect obeisance to the holiday [illegible]gion of feeling and musical character. Yet all the while are evident those individual qualities of Berlioz: the original rhythmic patterns, the occasionally asymmetrical melodies, the rich colors and descriptive power of an orchestra relatively small and simple for him, chromatic harmony unmistakably his, and choral writing also notably personal.

Yesterday's performance was one of those marvels of near-perfection, which become golden memories. First, the reading of Mr. Munch, which in style and eloquence had an almost indescribable glow. From first to last, the Orchestra outdid itself, producing sounds of celestial beauty and playing with an unflawed smoothness of ensemble.

Chorus Superb

[illegible] chorus was absolutel[illegible] and Mrs. de Varon muc[illegible] the applause she receive[illegible] Mr. Munch escorted he[illegible] stage. You heard both [illegible] and the text. I am sure [illegible]nly Host sounds precise[illegible] the voices which wafted [illegible] backstage regions of [illegible] Hall.

[illegible] were the soloists excep[illegible]ood, both as to individual [illegible] and their balance as a [illegible] Kopleff has a service[illegible], if not one of remark[illegible]th or luster, and she [illegible]ramatic intelligence [illegible]

[illegible] an Italian tenor, [illegible] taken for French, [illegible] of his enunciation [illegible] of his musical [illegible] who, like the [illegible] Souzay, de-serves to be called great. Mr. Souzay's work evoked beauty in every tone and phrase. Mr. Tozzi, singing here for the first time in concert, was similarly a source of high enjoyment. In all its aspects, this "production" of "L'Enfance du Christ" has everything required, technically and as poetic expression. I hope it will be recorded.

Next week Richard Burgin will conduct the Symphony concerts. His program assembles Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and two Fifth Symphonies, those by Beethoven and Shostakovitch.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
DEC 22 1956

Boston Orchestra Performs L'Enfance du Christ

Boston.—Our town could have had no more distinctive musical Christmas gift than the [illegible] Charles Munch [illegible] Symphony gave [illegible] Dec. 21 and [illegible]plete "L'Enfa[illegible]z, a score [illegible] entire [illegible] had ever bee[illegible] that was by [illegible]

"L'Enfan[illegible] essentially Berlioz's Christmas oratorio, though it is not called so, and likely would not meet a precise definition of an oratorio. But as we never see the other side of the moon, so do we but rarely perceive the other side of Hector Berlioz, that unparalleled genius, passionate, flamboyant and not a little tortured.

All is mostly tender, subdued and intimate in this retelling of the story of the birth of Jesus. It is a score which appeals greatly to Mr. Munch and one which he is peculiarly fitted to conduct, for it is so thoroughly French. This time, as three years ago, "L'Enfance du Christ" emerged in readings of near-perfection. Mr. Munch's conducting drew from the score all that is in it; the orchestra outdid itself, technically and in expressive eloquence, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, was absolutely superb. The four soloists were a balanced group and individually excellent: Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor, who sang with fine French enunciation and style; Gerard Souzay, baritone, among the greatest of French vocal artists today; and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

Souzay in Recital

The same Mr. Souzay, little more than a week before, had given one of the season's most distinguished solo concerts at Jordan Hall, Dec. 10, under the patronage of Baron Charles de Pampelonne, Consul General of France. Every item of a carefully chosen and well-varied program received the ultimate in fastidious attention to style and projection, from Mozart's "Mentre di lascio" to lieder by Schubert, Brahms, and songs by Poulenc, Fauré and Ravel. Dalton Baldwin was a most fluent if not always flexible accompanist.

Mr. Munch's mid-season holiday from the heavy schedule of the Boston Symphony began a little earlier than usual, this year. He took off for Paris after the Symphony Hall concerts of Dec. 21 and 22, and a recording session which followed. He will be gone about a month, during which time the orchestra will have played under concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, for a fortnight, have made another trip to New York, and spent a week working with Pierre Monteux as guest.

Mr. Burgin's first appearances on the stand with the orchestra this season (apart from a Tuesday night fill-in last month when Mr. Munch was slightly indisposed) was at Symphony Hall on Dec. 28 and 29, when he presented three familiar scores, the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and two fifth symphonies—those of Beethoven and Shostakovich. All went quite well, save for some coarseness in Beethoven.

Burgin's Second Program

The week following was rather more interesting, although Mr. Burgin's program, in its first half, was a string of mostly unrelated short pieces: the Bach chorale-prelude and chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (which Charles Munch orchestrated and performed at the first concerts of each new year starting with 1952);

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 76th season yesterday afternoon, performing Berlioz' oratorio "l'Enfance du Christ." The soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone; and Giorgio Tozzi, bass. Assisting was the New E. Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cook DeVaron, conductor.

BY RUDOLPH ELIE

"The prevailing characteristics of my music," wrote Hector Berlioz, "are passionate expression, intense ardor, rhythmical animation and unexpected turns."

He couldn't have expressed himself more succinctly yet he omitted another characteristic that is unique to "L'Enfance du Christ," which was given yesterday afternoon: a musico-religious quality so poetic that it stands unique in its century and almost unique in all centuries.

Berlioz was not a man of religious conviction and left the Catholic church, into which he was born, as a young man. And while he belonged to the circle of heathenism, then infecting the romantic movement, he could not as one of the most sensitive men of his day either ignore or fail to meditate on the nature of the meaning of religion. In the Requiem, to be sure, he came no nearer to the central liturgical concept of the form than Verdi did later on: it was for him merely a vehicle to convey sense of catastrophe, of violent drama and of sepulchral cataclysm by means of gigantic musical forces. No more secular view of the Requiem, indeed, has ever been written.

Intrude a Tone

"L'Enfance du Christ" is in a sense secular, too, and Berlioz did not hesitate, in writing his own words for the text, to intrude a tone that does not appear in St. Matthew at all. The magi, for instance, become soothsayers whose conjurations allow the composer to present a wild, grotesque accompaniment to their magic evolutions. Yet the overall mood of awe, of tenderness of Christian mysticism is undeniable from beginning to end. Berlioz, like a good many other creative artists in every field and every level, may not have been a man of the church, but he was certainly profoundly moved by the miracle of the Gospels.

One might assume that a work so long—almost 90 minutes—and one on so generally delicate a level of expression, would prove tiring. On the contrary, it generates an atmosphere all its own that finds the listener entranced to the end. The first meditation of Mary, following the terror of the soothsayers, is increasingly beautiful as she is joined by Joseph in duet, invisible angels imploring them to escape Herod's bloody edict. The Shepherd's farewell is incomparably lovely, too, as is the trio for two flutes and harp celebrating the succor of the holy family by the Ishmaelites, but the whole thing teems with the most delicate effects.

Tone Was Firm

This was a marvelous [illegible]mance which one curious [illegible] in a pitch entrance [illegible] mar in the least. Mr. [illegible] has here assembled one of [illegible] best solo quartets he has [illegible] had, and all sang beautiful[illegible] and in the style. Gerard [illegible]zay's Joseph was outstan[illegible] for th edignity and the s[illegible]tual quality he conveyed, [illegible] Giorgio Tozzi sang his var[illegible] roles in a basso of a rich [illegible]eed tonal sheen rising [illegible]ments of powerful expre[illegible] Ceasare Valletti's clear [illegible] tenor, meanwhile, was just [illegible] for the part of the narrator [illegible] he sounded exceedingly [illegible] The most difficult vocal [illegible] due its odd placement, was [illegible] weell handled by Florence [illegible]leff, who gained in command[illegible] she progressed.

It is not possible to praise [illegible] New England Conserva[illegible] Chorus too highly as it dep[illegible]strated a capacity for [illegible] shadings denied most large groups. Its tone was rich [illegible] of fine texture and its enunciation of the French text was re[illegible]markable throughout. The whole was guided by Mr. Munch [illegible] wiht a special insight into this music, which he introduced here three years ago, and the orchestra responded with all its own sublety. A final word for Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis and Bernard Zighera [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 22 1956

Berlioz Trilogy at Symphony

'L'Enfance du Christ' Conducted by Charles Munch

By Harold Rogers

There are at least two occasions when Charles Munch's concerts in Symphony Hall transcend the sensuous beauties of terrestrial sound to touch the fringes of celestial glory—when he conducts either of the Passions by Bach, or "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz.

At this Christmas season Dr. Munch is reviving the Berlioz, introduced by him in its entirety to Boston in December, 1953. It is to be hoped that this production of "L'Enfance du Christ" will be recorded, for he has collected an almost flawless quartet of soloists, and the choral forces of the New England Conservatory of Music are singing superbly.

The performance yesterday afternoon was marked by the loving care and tenderness that Berlioz must have felt when he wrote: "I have often asked myself what could be the possibilities of the mystification called Life: it is to know what is beautiful; it is to love."

There is no question that this music was composed with love, and there was also no question yesterday that it was performed with love. In quiet serenity it radiated love—in the scene in the Stable in Bethlehem, with its attendant angel chorus; in the Farewell of the Shepherds in a joyous pastoral; in the oasis where we find the Holy Family at Rest on their flight into Egypt.

Berlioz chose to write his own text, and in so doing he created an apocrypha of his own. He opens with restless and portentous music as Herod tosses on his bed with troubled dreams of being supplanted by a child. For Berlioz the wise men (here called soothsayers) played a villainous role, that of recommending the slaughter of the innocents.

At this point Giorgio Tozzi, as Herod, poured forth his eloquent and lyrical basso in a ringing outburst. His artistic singing was again heard as he impersonated the father of an Ishmaelite family in Saïs. Here Berlioz fills in the Biblical gaps in his own way by having the Holy Family graciously received by the Ishmaelites and even entertained by their host's musical children.

At this point we become aware that Berlioz, like the Renaissance painters, chose to place the Biblical characters in latter-day surroundings. Thus during a concert by the Ishmaelite trio (a flute duet by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, to Bernard Zighera's mellifluous harp) we find the Ishmaelite home turning into something like an 18th-century drawing room.

Cesare Valletti, who sang the solos of the Narrator, is another whose voice is eminently lyrical, easily produced and golden in sound. His tenor was especially buoyant in his final prayer with the chorus. His French pronunciation, however, is inconsistent and shows need of further coaching.

Gérard Souzay, heard as Joseph, gave another of his performances that comes straight from the heart. There is nothing earthborn in his baritone; he can be counted among the few truly poetic singers of our day. His duet with Florence Kopleff, heard as Mary, was an artistic collaboration of rare warmth. Her contralto has a steady, serene, and clear quality especially suitable to the role.

Receiving applause with Dr. Munch were Lorna Cooke deVaron, who trained the choral forces, and Simone Rivier, who coached them in their French.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 22 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Berlioz' Christmas Oratorio

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, gave in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the ninth program of the Friday-Saturday series. He conducted Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ." The chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. The soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone, and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Over the past seven years we have had much occasion to thank Charles Munch for musical pleasures received. Not by any means the least is Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Mr. Munch conducted here complete for the first time in 1953. He is presenting this unique masterpiece again at the Symphony concerts this week, and it makes a rare and perfect obeisance to the holiday season.

gion of feeling and musical character. Yet all the while are evident those individual qualities of Berlioz: the original rhythmic patterns, the occasionally assymetrical melodies, the rich colors and descriptive power of an orchestra relatively small and simple for him, chromatic harmony unmistakably his, and choral writing also notably personal.

Yesterday's performance was one of those marvels of near-perfection, which become golden memories. First, the reading of Mr. Munch, which in style and eloquence had an almost indescribable glow. From first to last, the Orchestra outdid itself, producing sounds of celestial beauty and playing with an unflawed smoothness of ensemble.

Chorus Superb

chorus was absolutel and Mrs. de Varon muc
l the applause she received
Ir. Munch escorted he e stage. You heard both c and the text. I am sure renly Host sounds precise-the voices which wafted
e backstage regions of y Hall.

, were the soloists excepgood, both as to individual e and their balance as a liss Kopleff has a service-e, if not one of remarkmth or luster, and she h dramatic intelligence ng.

lletti, an Italian tenor,
e been taken for French,
larity of his enunciation accuracy of his musical is an artist who, like the ersatile Mr. Souzay, deserves to be called great. Mr. Souzay's work evoked beauty in every tone and phrase. Mr. Tozzi, singing here for the first time in concert, was similarly a source of high enjoyment. In all its aspects, this "production" of "L'Enfance du Christ" has everything required, technically and as poetic expression. I hope it will be recorded.

Next week Richard Burgin will conduct the Symphony concerts. His program assembles Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and two Fifth Symphonies, those by Beethoven and Shostakovitch.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1957

Boston Orchestra Performs L'Enfance du Christ

Boston.—Our town could have had no more distinctive musical Christmas gift than the one which Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony gave us at Symphony Hall on Dec. 21 and 22. This was the complete "L'Enfance du Christ" of Berlioz, a score unique and, like Tom, one entire performance of the work had ever been heard here before, and that was by the same forces in 1953.

"L'Enfance du Christ" is essentially Berlioz's Christmas oratorio, though it is not called so, and likely would not meet a precise definition of an oratorio. But as we never see the other side of the moon, so do we but rarely perceive the other side of Hector Berlioz, that unparalleled genius, passionate, flamboyant and not a little tortured.

All is mostly tender, subdued and intimate in this retelling of the story of the birth of Jesus. It is a score which appeals greatly to Mr. Munch and one which he is peculiarly fitted to conduct, for it is so thoroughly French. This time, as three years ago, "L'Enfance du Christ" emerged in readings of near-perfection. Mr. Munch's conducting drew from the score all that is in it; the orchestra outdid itself, technically and in expressive eloquence, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, was absolutely superb. The four soloists were a balanced group and individually excellent: Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor, who sang with fine French enunciation and style; Gerard Souzay, baritone, among the greatest of French vocal artists today; and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

Souzay in Recital

The same Mr. Souzay, little more than a week before, had given one of the season's most distinguished solo concerts at Jordan Hall, Dec. 10, under the patronage of Baron Charles de Pampelonne, Consul General of France. Every item of a carefully chosen and well-varied program received the ultimate in fastidious attention to style and projection, from Mozart's "Mentre di lascio" to lieder by Schubert, Brahms, and songs by Poulenc, Fauré and Ravel. Dalton Baldwin was a most fluent if not always flexible accompanist.

Mr. Munch's mid-season holiday from the heavy schedule of the Boston Symphony began a little earlier than usual, this year. He took off for Paris after the Symphony Hall concerts of Dec. 21 and 22, and a recording session which followed. He will be gone about a month, during which time the orchestra will have played under concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, for a fortnight, have made another trip to New York, and spent a week working with Pierre Monteux as guest.

Mr. Burgin's first appearances on the stand with the orchestra this season (apart from a Tuesday night fill-in last month when Mr. Munch was slightly indisposed) was at Symphony Hall on Dec. 28 and 29, when he presented three familiar scores, the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and two fifth symphonies—those of Beethoven and Shostakovich. All went quite well, save for some coarseness in Beethoven.

Burgin's Second Program

The week following was rather more interesting, although Mr. Burgin's program, in its first half, was a string of mostly unrelated short pieces: the Bach chorale-prelude and chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (which Charles Munch orchestrated and performed at the first concerts of each new year starting with 1952);

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
DEC 22 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 76th season yesterday afternoon, performing Berlioz' "oratoria "l'Enfance du Christ." The soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone; and Gorgio Tozzi, bass. Assisting was the N. E. Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cook DeVaron, conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"The prevailing characteristics of my music," wrote Hector Berliob, "are passionate expression, intense ardor, rhythmical animation and unexpected turns."

He couldn't have expressed himself more succinctly yet he omitted another characteristic that is unique to "L'Enfance du Christ," which was given yesterday afternoon: a musico-religious quality so poetic that it stands unique in its century and almost unique in all centuries.

Berlioz was not a man of religious conviction and left the Catholic church, into which he was born, as a young man. And while he belonged to the circle of heathenism, then infecting the romantic movement, he could not as one of the most sensitive men of his day either ignore or fail to meditate on the nature of the meaning of religion. In the Requiem, to be sure, he came no nearer to the central liturgical concept of the form than Verdi did later on: it was for him merely a vehicle to convey sense of catastrophe, of violent drama and of sepulchral cataclysm by means of gigantic musical forces. No more secular view of the Requiem, indeed, has been written.

Intrude a Tone

"L'Enfance du Christ" is in a sense secular, too, and Berlioz did not hesitate to write his own words for the text to intrude a tone that does not appear in St. Matthew at all. The magi, for instance, become soothsayers whose conjuration allow the composer to present a wild, grotesque accompaniment to their magic evolutions. Yet the overall mood of awe, of tenderness, of Christian mysticism is undeniable from beginning to end. Berlioz, like a good many other creative artists in every fiel dand every level, may not have been a man of the church, but he was certainly profoundly moved by the miracle of the Gospels.

One might assume that a work so long—almost [illegible] minutes—and one on so [illegible] delicate a level of [illegible] would prove tiring. On the contrary, it generates an atmosphere all its own that keeps the listener entranced to the end. The first meditation of [illegible] following the terror of the soothsayers, is [illegible] beautiful as she is joined by Joseph in duet, invisible angels imploring them to escape Herod's bloody edict. The Shepherd's farewell is incomparably lovely, too, as is the trio for two flutes and harp celebrating the succor of the holy family by the Ishmaelites, but the whole thing teems with the most delicate effects.

Tone Was Firm

This was a marvelous performance which one curious flaw in a pitch entrance failed to mar in the least. Mr. Munch has here assembled one of the best solo quartets he has ever had, and all sang beautifully and in the style. Gerard Souzay's Joseph was outstanding for th edignity and the spiritual quality he conveyed, while Giorgio Tozzi sang his various roles in a basso of a rich, rounded tonal sheen rising to moments of powerful expression. Ceasare Valletti's clear ringing tenor, meanwhile, was just right for the part of the narrator and he sounded exceedingly well. The most difficult vocal part, due its odd placement, was very well handled by Florence Kopleff, who gained in command as she progressed.

It is not possible to praise the New England Conservatory Chorus too highly as it demonstrated a capacity for subtle shadings denied most large groups. Its tone was grim but of fine texture and its enunciation of the French text was remarkable throughout. The whole was guided by Mr. Munch with a special insight into this music, which he introduced here three years ago, and the orchestra responded with all its own subtlety. A final word for Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis and Bernard Zighera.

For their [illegible] was a memorable [illegible] manner.

Richard Burgin will conduct next week's concert, offering Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Hallis, Beethoven's Fifth and Shostakovich's Fifth.

TIGHT BINDING

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 22 1956

Berlioz Trilogy at Symphony

'L'Enfance du Christ' Conducted by Charles Munch

By Harold Rogers

There are at least two occasions when Charles Munch's concerts in Symphony Hall transcend the sensuous beauties of terrestrial sound to touch the fringes of celestial glory—when he conducts either of the Passions by Bach, or "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz.

At this Christmas season Dr. Munch is reviving the Berlioz, introduced by him in its entirety to Boston in December, 1953. It is to be hoped that this production of "L'Enfance du Christ" will be recorded, for he has collected an almost flawless quartet of soloists, and the choral forces of the New England Conservatory of Music are singing superbly.

The performance yesterday afternoon was marked by the loving care and tenderness that Berlioz must have felt when he wrote: "I have often asked myself what could be the possibilities of the mystification called Life: it is to know what is beautiful; it is to love."

There is no question that this music was composed with love, and there was also no question yesterday that it was performed with love. In quiet serenity it radiated love—in the scene in the Stable in Bethlehem, with its attendant angel chorus; in the Farewell of the Shepherds in a joyous pastoral; in the oasis where we find the Holy Family at Rest on their flight into Egypt.

Berlioz chose to write his own text, and in so doing he created an apocrypha of his own. He opens with restless and portentous music as Herod tosses on his bed with troubled dreams of being supplanted by a child. For Berlioz the wise men (here called soothsayers) played a villainous role, that of recommending the slaughter of the innocents.

At this point Giorgio Tozzi, as Herod, poured forth his eloquent and lyrical basso in a ringing outburst. His artistic singing was again heard as he impersonated the father of an Ishmaelite family in Saïs. Here Berlioz fills in the Biblical gaps in his own way by having the Holy Family graciously received by the Ishmaelites and even entertained by their host's musical children.

At this point we become aware that Berlioz, like the Renaissance painters, chose to place the Biblical characters in latter-day surroundings. Thus during a concert by the Ishmaelite trio (a flute duet by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, to Bernard Zighera's melliflous harp) we find the Ishmaelite home turning into something like an 18th-century drawing room.

Cesare Valletti, who sang the solos of the Narrator, is another whose voice is eminently lyrical, easily produced and golden in sound. His tenor was especially buoyant in his final prayer with the chorus. His French pronunciation, however, is inconsistent and shows need of further coaching.

Gérard Souzay, heard as Joseph, gave another of his performances that comes straight from the heart. There is nothing earthborn in his baritone; he can be counted among the few truly poetic singers of our day. His duet with Florence Kopleff, heard as Mary, was an artistic collaboration of rare warmth. Her contralto has a steady, serene, and clear quality especially suitable to the role.

Receiving applause with Dr. Munch were Lorna Cooke deVaron, who trained the choral forces, and Simone Rivier, who coached them in their French.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 22 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Berlioz' Christmas Oratorio

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch music director, gave in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the ninth program of the Friday-Saturday series. He conducted Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ." The chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. The soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone, and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Over the past seven years we have had much occasion to thank Charles Munch for musical pleasures received. Not by any means the least is Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Mr. Munch conducted here complete for the first time in 1953. He is presenting this unique masterpiece again at the Symphony concerts this week, and it makes a rare and perfect obeisance to the holiday season.

"L'Enfance du Christ" essentially is Berlioz' Christmas oratorio, though it is not called so and probably would not meet exactly the precise definition of an oratorio. The work is a retelling of the birth of Jesus in an idiom, a style and a form peculiar to Berlioz.

As we never see the other side of the moon, so we rarely perceive the other side of Hector Berlioz, that unparalleled genius, passionate, flamboyant and not a little tortured, who was like a comet in the heavens of 19th Century French music. But there was another side, and it comes to view in "L'Enfance du Christ," quite unlike the Berlioz we know in the "Fantastic" Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," the "Damnation of Faust" or "Harold in Italy."

All is mostly tender, subdued and intimate in "L'Enfance du Christ"; there are few dramatic outbursts in the score, and then only for reasons of underscoring worldly elements of background against which the birth of Jesus took place, as the opening scenes of the encounter between centurion and Polydorous, the Night March, Herod's dream and the black counsel to Herod by the Soothsayers. Therse pages, curiously, are opera without staging.

But thereafter the music soars into a higher and devotional region of feeling and musical character. Yet all the while are evident those individual qualities of Berlioz: the original rhythmic patterns, the occasionally assymetrical melodies, the rich colors and descriptive power of an orchestra relatively small and simple for him, chromatic harmony unmistakably his, and choral writing also notably personal.

Yesterday's performance was one of those marvels of near-perfection which become golden memories. First, the reading of Mr. Munch, which in style and eloquence had an almost indescribable glow. From first to last, the Orchestra outdid itself, producing sounds of celestial beauty and playing with an unflawed smoothness of ensemble.

Chorus Superb

The chorus was absolutely superb, and Mrs. de Varon much deserved the applause she received when Mr. Munch escorted her upon the stage. You heard both the music and the text. I am sure the Heavenly Host sounds precisely like the voices which wafted from the backstage regions of Symphony Hall.

So, too, were the soloists exceptionally good, both as to individual excellence and their balance as a group. Miss Kopleff has a serviceable voice, if not one of remarkable warmth or luster, and she sang with dramatic intelligence and feeling.

Mr. Valletti, an Italian tenor, could have been taken for French, by the clarity of his enunciation and the accuracy of his musical style. He is an artist who, like the equally versatile Mr. Souzay, deserves to be called great. Mr. Souzay's work evoked beauty in every tone and phrase. Mr. Tozzi, singing here for the first time in concert, was similarly a source of high enjoyment. In all its aspects, this "production" of "L'Enfance du Christ" has everything required, technically and as poetic expression. I hope it will be recorded.

Next week Richard Burgin will conduct the Symphony concerts. His program assembles Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and two Fifth Symphonies, those by Beethoven and Shostakovitch.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1957

Il Trovatore

Jan. 26.—This performance of Verdi's perennial "Il Trovatore" was marked by the first appearance this season of Jean Madeira as Azucena and of Ettore Bastianini as the Count di Luna.

Antonietta Stella was not in the best of vocal form, but gave a compelling account of the hapless Leonora nonetheless. There was much to admire in this sterling artist's work: She knew how to spin a dreamlike pianissimo and her wide-ranged soprano was ideally suited to the music. Her manipulation of the florid passages in "Di tale amor" and "D'amour sull'ali rosee" was spotlessly clean and rhythmically accurate. She looked lovely and handled herself with dignity and restraint.

Miss Madeira was dramatically very convincing as the vengeful gypsy. Her singing revealed an occasional unsteadiness in pitch in the upper register. Her low tones, however, were rich and secure, and it was here that her dark-hued contralto sounded best. This, by the way, was Miss Madeira's second performance of the day, since she had sung Erda in the matinee performance of "Das Rheingold". Ettore Bastianini made a handsome and credible Count and his beautiful singing of "Il balen" was a high spot of the evening. Kurt Baum was a robust Manrico.

Max Rudolf was complete master of the situation and it was gratifying to hear some fresh accents, planned ritards and repolished phrasing from the orchestra. —G. F.

$300,000 Offered New Orleans Orchestra sang with fine French enunciation and style; Gerard Souzay, baritone, among the greatest of French vocal artists today; and Giorgio Tozzi, bass.

Souzay in Recital

The same Mr. Souzay, little more than a week before, had given one of the season's most distinguished solo concerts at Jordan Hall, Dec. 10, under the patronage of Baron Charles de Pampelonne, Consul General of France. Every item of a carefully chosen and well-varied program received the ultimate in fastidious attention to style and projection, from Mozart's "Mentre di lascio" to lieder by Schubert, Brahms, and songs by Poulenc, Fauré and Ravel. Dalton

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866
DEC 22 1956

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 76th season yesterday afternoon, performing Berlioz' oratorio "l'Enfance du Christ." The soloists were Florence Kopleff, contralto; Cesare Valletti, tenor; Gerard Souzay, baritone; and Gorgio Tozzi, bass. Assisting was the N. E. Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cook DeVaron, conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"The prevailing characteristics of my music," wrote Hector Berliob, "are passionate expression, intense ardor, rhythmical animation and unexpected turns."

He couldn't have expressed himself more succinctly yet he omitted another characteristic that is unique to "L'Enfance du Christ," which was given yesterday afternoon: a musico-religious quality so poetic that it stands unique in its century and almost unique in all centuries.

Berlioz was not a man of religious conviction and left the Catholic church, into which he was born, as a young man. And while he belonged to the circle of heathenism, then infecting the romantic movement, he could not as one of the most sensitive men of his day either ignore or fail to meditate on the nature of the meaning of religion. In the Requiem, to be sure, he came no nearer to the central liturgical concept of the form than Verdi did later on: it was for him merely a vehicle to convey sense of catastrophe, of violent drama and of sepulchral cataclysm by means of gigantic musical forces. No more secular view of the Requiem, indeed, has ever been written.

Intrude a Tone

"L'Enfance du Christ" is in a sense secular, too, and Berlioz did not hesitate to intrude own words for the text, a tone that does not appear in St. Matthew at all: the magi, for instance, become soothsayers whose conjurations allow the composer to present a wild, grotesque accompaniment to their magic evolutions. Yet the overall mood of awe, tenderness, of Christian mysticism is undeniable from beginning to end. Berlioz, like a good many other creative artists in every fiel dand every level, may not have been a man of the church, but he was certainly profoundly moved by the miracle of the Gospels.

One might assume that a work so long—almost [illegible] minutes—and one on so [illegible] delicate a level of expression would prove tiring. On the contrary, it generates an atmosphere all its own [illegible] listener entranced [illegible] The first meditation of Mary, following the terror [illegible] soothsayers, is [illegible] beautiful as she is joined by Joseph in duet, invisible angels imploring them to escape Herod's bloody edict. The Shepherd's farewell is incomparably lovely, too, as is the trio for two flutes and harp celebrating the succor of the holy family by the Ishmaelites, but the whole thing teems with the most delicate effects.

Tone Was Firm

This was a marvelous performance which one curious flaw in a [illegible] entrance failed to mar in the least. Mr. Munch has here assembled one of the best solo quartets he has ever had, and all sang beautifully and in the style. Gerard Souzay's Joseph was outstanding for th edignity and the spiritual quality he conveyed, while Giorgio Tozzi sang his various roles in a basso of a rich, rounded tonal sheen rising to the moments of powerful expression. Cesare Valletti's clear ringing tenor, meanwhile, was just right for the part of the narrator and he sounded exceedingly well. The most difficult vocal role, due its odd placement, was very woell handled by Florence Kopleff, who gained in command as she progressed.

It is not possible to praise the New England Conservatory Chorus too highly as it demonstrated a capacity for subtle shadings denied most large groups. Its tone was firm but of fine texture and its enunciation of the French text was remarkable throughout. The whole was [illegible] Munch [illegible] music, which he [illegible] three years ago, and the orchestra responded with all its customary ability. A final word for Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis and Bernard Zighera [illegible] their traversal of the [illegible] was a memorable [illegible] performance.

Richard Burgin will conduct next week's concert, [illegible] Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, the Fifth and Shostakovich's Fifth.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 25 19

Boston S

A concert by the Symphony Orchestra Mosque on Thursday Jan. 10, and a recital Bachauer, famed Gre ist, on Sunday a Jan. 13, will be the the 1st of the Griffi Foundation's 1957 at at that house.

Richard Burgin, conductor of the Bos phony, will conduct chestra in the open cert which will be one the Bostonians this year in the fou symphony series.

Burgin, who is kn

TIGHT BINDING

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orff's "Aphrodite"

[illegible] the program notes for the performance of three songs from Paul Hindemith's [illegible] aus dem [illegible] ben," given by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Wednesday [illegible] of last week, there was an extension from a preface the composer to the work, containing [illegible] for a number of changes [illegible] made in it since it was first [illegible] 1923. It is evident from his [illegible] that the original version of this [illegible] provided composition was conceived [illegible] write-tone [illegible] or in an atonal [illegible] it; that he later [illegible] convinced that the style was [illegible] obscure to convey his message [illegible] to rectify the trouble it [illegible] the work; and that he [illegible] felt impelled to rewrite it in [illegible] more at once more communicative [illegible] better suited to the exigencies of performance. In his discussion of the problem, Mr. Hindemith leaves no doubt that he is concerned with a fundamental issue of musical aesthetics, and that he believes his first version to have reflected a mistaken trend in the evolution of musical technique. This bit of soul searching on the part of one of the most respected creative musicians of the present generation is, I think, extremely interesting, since it indicates the disillusionment of a brilliant musical mind with the formulas of atonality, and reveals, in a manner that is quite uncommon among composers nowadays, a deep consideration for both the people who perform his work and the audience that listens to it.

Actually, the songs, which were very ably conducted by Charles Munch and eloquently sung by Irmgard Seefried, remain complex and difficult enough in their revised version. But they are undeniably expressive, and though the structure is elaborate, they undoubtedly hew to certain basic laws. This coincidence of expressiveness and tonality seems, then, to be one of the essentials of musical communication. [illegible] Orff's [illegible] Aphrodite [illegible] a group [illegible] composers during the past fifty years, I have never heard a purely atonal composition that conveyed anything to me, and I have never known one to earn the genuine affection of the musical public.

This observation of mine was further confirmed by the same program [illegible] Mr. [illegible] the late [illegible] Honegger's Symphony No. 2 [illegible] Orchestra during [illegible] 1941, [illegible] that [illegible] in the [illegible] of an abstract musical pattern [illegible] not an atonal composition [illegible] Mr. Honegger [illegible] definite tonality [illegible] in a short [illegible] at the termination of the last movement [illegible] is so different [illegible] the work th[illegible] tacked on arbitrarily [illegible] the sy[illegible] impressed me as a [illegible] exercise [illegible] became distinctly tiresome [illegible] I think that this effect [illegible] part, from the lack of [illegible] that might have been [illegible] by tonal technique. And the same criticism applies to Stravinsky's symphonic poem "The Song of the Nightingale," which Leonard Bernstein [illegible] the New York Philharmonic [illegible] ny on Thursday evening. Here one has a work that consistently avoids tonality and strives to make its point not through intellectual development but through a concatenation of more or less striking sounds. As presented, it had a few moments of mildly amusing theatricality, but it badly needed a ballet to go with it. As a piece of symphonic music, it was, I thought, very dull indeed.

Now, what I have been leading up to with all this dogmatic technical discussion is a consideration of Mr. Carl Orff's "The Triumph of Aphrodite," an altogether different kind of composition, which was given its first New York performance in Carnegie Hall Tuesday night by Eugene Ormandy, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Temple University Choirs and a group [illegible] composers [illegible] how great [illegible] there are [illegible] it is [illegible] y: ence [illegible] other [illegible] seem [illegible] the end [illegible] virtually [illegible] for ten minutes [illegible] you may have guessed.

Note-But not on 250

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 22 1956

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
Circ. D. 255,047 - S. 300,922
DEC 23 1956

Tone Was Firm

This was a marvelous [illegible] mance which one curio[illegible] in a pitch entrance f[illegible] mar in the least. Mr. [illegible] has here assembled one [illegible] best solo quartets he [illegible] had, and all sang be[illegible] and in the style. Ger[illegible] zay's Joseph was out[illegible] for th edignity and t[illegible] tual quality he conveye[illegible] Giorgio Tozzi sang his [illegible] roles in a basso of a ric[illegible] eed tonal sheen rising [illegible] ments of powerful ex[illegible] Ceasare Valletti's clear [illegible] tenor, meanwhile, was i[illegible] for the part of the narr[illegible] he sounded exceeding[illegible] The most difficult vo[illegible] due its odd placement, [illegible] weell handled by Flore[illegible] leff, who gained in con[illegible] she progressed.

It is not possible to p[illegible] New England Con[illegible] Chorus too highly as [illegible] strated a capacity fo[illegible] shadings denied mo[illegible] groups. Its tone was [illegible] of fine texture and its [illegible] tion of the French tex[illegible] markable throughou[illegible] whole was guiled by M[illegible] wiht a special insight [illegible] music, which he introdu[illegible] three years ago, and th[illegible] tra responded with all [illegible] subtlety. A final word [illegible] Anthony Dwyer. Jan[illegible] poulsakis and Bernard [illegible]

Classic and Almost

Anyone for Glockenspiels and Tympani?

By Doris Reno

A FASCINATING non-classifiable recording which has turned up recently is an Angel 12-inch LP disc labeled "Bell, Drum and Cymbal." It probably should be listed as a demonstration recording, since it presents Saul Goodman, the top-notch tympanist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, in an interesting lecture-demonstration of the percussion instruments of the orchestra.

Mr. Goodman introduces all the instruments, beginning with the glockenspiel and finally winding around to his pets, the tympani. He actually performs Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre" recognizably on the percussion instruments alone. He is assisted in the narration by Leonard Sterling.

★ ★ ★

ANOTHER intriguing novelty is a Riverside 12-inch LP presenting New Music of Alec Wilder — a composer who seems to ride the fence intriguingly between popular and serious music. He has not had a recording out, to our knowledge, since his Octets on good old 78's.

Wilder composed all this new music, labeled by one of his friends as "jazz with deep roots of serious music," for Mitchell Lowe and his orchestra, who present a [illegible] plenty of [illegible] up-and-up. Lowe's a picked band of [illegible] some of them [illegible] concert musicians.

ARTHUR FIEDLER
. . . Strauss waltzes

works — which sound wonderful but have no noticeable application that we can see—are "Suggestion for Bored Dancers," "She Never Wore Make-up," "Walk Softly," "Tacet for Neurotics," "Pop, What's a Passacaglia," and the like.

★ ★ ★

A NEW COLLECTION of "Waltzes by the Strauss Family" has been issued by the excellent three-four conductor Arthur Fiedler and his Boston Pops Orchestra on a Victor 12-inch LP. The pieces are by Johann Sr., and his three sons, Johann Jr., Josef and Edward. They're all played with eminent charm by the charming pops conductor.

Some more waltzes and other tunes, in the shape of excerpts from Die Lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow) by Franz Lehar, have been issued on a Telefunken 12-inch LP with Anneliese Rothenberger and Herbert Ernst Groh in the leading roles. The chorus and orchestra are directed by Wilhelm Stephan.

On the other side of this disc appears a collection of "Die Meisteroperette of Leo Fall," whose operettas are seldom heard these days.

Both groups of excerpts are given a gay and lively reading.

★ ★ ★

STILL ANOTHER novelty turns up under the title of "Songs of Harry Lauder" on a London 12-inch LP, which presents George Elrick and the Stargazers imitating Harry in a considerable list of his old favorite presentations.

Popping up here are "Roamin' in the Gloamin'" (Harry's theme song), "It's Time To Get Up in the Morning," "When I was Twenty-one," and others. The group sings them with flair and dash and plenty of thickish Scottish accent, though we doubt whether they'll hit the bulls'-eye every time with folks who've relished the real Lauder.

★ ★ ★

MIKLOS GAFNI, tenor, and Rena Rossini, guitarist, present a group of Neapolitan Folk Songs on a Westminster 12-inch long-play. Gafni has the good Italian throb in the voice, which is mellow and clear, and he goes all-out sentimental on these tunes.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 25 1956

Boston Symphony on 10th

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and a recital by Gina Bachauer, famed Greek pianist, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be the first on the list of the Griffith Music Foundation's 1957 attractions at that house.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in the opening concert which will be the only one the Bostonians will give this year in the foundation's symphony series.

Burgin, who is known both for his ability as a conductor and his brilliant qualities as a violinist, will conduct all the concerts of the orchestra's first tour of the coming year, including two concerts in New York.

N.Y. Concert review
N.Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG & HERALD
DECEMBER 25 '56

Boston Symphony

Pokerspiel, griechische Tragödie und klassisch heitere Stimmung

Alles war Programmmusik in dem Sonnabend-Nachmittags-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchester unter Carl Munch. Es begann mit Igor Stravinskys Ballett-Musik "Jeu de Cartes". Die Charaktere in diesem Ballett sind Karten in einem Pokerspiel. Jede der 3 "Runden" hat die gleiche musikalische etwas pomphafte Einleitung, nach der das Kartenspiel sich abwickelt; es endet mit einem Triumphtanz der siegenden "Herzen". Das Ganze originell, witzig instrumentiert, wurde vom Orchester entsprechend gespielt. Nach dem modernen Kartenspiel folgte die Musik aus einem anderen Ballett, mit antikem Hintergrund, Samuel Barber's "Medea". Das Kernstück [illegible] (erst kürzlich vom Komponisten für die Konzertwiedergabe effektvoll neu orchestriert) ist der Tanz der von Rache fast tollen Medea. Munch führte das Orchester durch alle Schwierigkeiten der Partitur in einer brillanten Wiedergabe. Das Publikum nahm das interessante Werk mit viel Beifall auf, für den der anwesende Komponist sich aus einer Loge dankend verbeugen konnte. — Programmmusik ist schließlich auch Beethovens VI. Symphonie, die Pastorale; aber hier werden andere Töne angestimmt und freudenvollere. Munchs Interpretation enthüllte alle, auch manche ungeahnte Schönheiten des Werkes. Man atmete Landluft, man fühlte das Glück am murmelnden Bach liegen zu können, man war mit beim Fest und Tanz der Landleute. Das Gewitter "sah" man, sah zusammenziehen und entladen. Bei einer solchen Wiedergabe dieses Meisterwerks das Titanen konnte man nur "Freude und dankbare Gefühle" haben. Die Hörer haben das und zeigten es. Es war eine denkwürdige Leistung von Orchester und Dirigenten. G. R.

TIGHT BINDING

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 22 1956

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orff's "Aphrodite"

In the program notes for the performance of songs from Hindemith's "Wir bauen," given by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Wednesday of last week, there was an explanation from a preface the composer wrote to this work, explaining the reasons for a number of changes he had made in it since it was first written in 1923. It is evident from this that the original version of the revised composition was conceived in a write-to-order vein, or in an attempt to approximate it; that he later became convinced that the style was too obscure to convey his message, and that to simplify the trouble he had to perform the work; and that he had finally felt impelled to rewrite it in a manner at once more communicative and better suited to the exigencies of performance. In his discussion of the problem, Mr. Hindemith leaves no doubt that he is concerned with a fundamental issue of musical aesthetics, and that he believes his first version to have reflected a mistaken trend in the evolution of musical technique. This bit of soul searching on the part of one of the most respected creative musicians of the present generation is, I think, extremely interesting, since it indicates the disillusionment of a brilliant musical mind with the formulas of atonality, and reveals, in a manner that is quite uncommon among composers nowadays, a deep consideration for both the people who perform his work and the audience that listens to it.

Actually, the songs, which were very ably conducted by Charles Munch and eloquently sung by Irmgard Seefried, remain complex and difficult enough in their revised version. But they are undeniably expressive, and though their structure is elaborate, they undeniably hew to certain basic laws of music. This coincidence of expressiveness and tonality seems, for some reason, to be one of the essentials of musical communication. It is a mystery I cannot explain; all I know is that despite the enormous prestige of atonal music among composers during the past fifty years, I have never heard a purely atonal composition that conveyed anything to me, and I have never known one to earn the genuine affection of the musical public.

This observation of mine was further confirmed [illegible] the same program when Mr. [illegible] the late Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra, a work dating from 1941, that [illegible] and that displays [illegible] in the development of an abstract musical pattern. Though not an atonal composition in the usual sense, Mr. Honegger's [illegible] avoids definite tonality [illegible] except in a short chorale at the termination of the last movement, and [illegible] is so different in style from the rest of the work that it seems as if it had been tacked on arbitrarily. I am afraid that the symphony, which [illegible] impressed me as a mere exercise in style—an exercise that [illegible] long run became distinctly tiresome—and I think that this effect arose, in part, from the lack of proper [illegible] vigor that might have been provided by a tonal technique. And the same criticism applies to Stravinsky's symphonic [illegible] "The Song of the Nightingale," which Leonard Bernstein [illegible] the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on Thursday evening. Here one has a work that consistently avoids tonality and strives to make its point not through intellectual development but through a concatenation of more or less striking sounds. As presented, it had a few moments of mildly amusing theatricality, but it badly needed a ballet to go with it. As a piece of symphonic music, it was, I thought, very dull indeed.

Now, what I have been leading up to with all this dogmatic technical discussion is a consideration of Mr. Carl Orff's "The Triumph of Aphrodite," an altogether different kind of composition, which was given its first New York performance in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night by Eugene Ormandy, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Temple University Choirs, and a group of vocal [illegible] a composer [illegible] how great [illegible] there are [illegible] of [illegible] about [illegible] it is [illegible] audience [illegible] the other night [illegible] seemed [illegible] the end it virtually howled its approval for ten minutes. As you may have guessed,

Tone Was Firm

This was a marvelous [illegible] mance which one curio[illegible] in a pitch entrance f[illegible] mar in the least. Mr. [illegible] has here assembled one [illegible] best solo quartets he h[illegible] had, and all sang bea[illegible] and in the style. Gera[illegible] zay's Joseph was out[illegible] for th edignity and th[illegible] tual quality he conveye[illegible] Giorgio Tozzi sang his [illegible] roles in a basso of a rich [illegible] eed tonal sheen rising [illegible] ments of powerful ex[illegible] Ceasare Valletti's clear [illegible] tenor, meanwhile, was j[illegible] for the part of the narr[illegible] he sounded exceeding[illegible] The most difficult vo[illegible] due its odd placement, [illegible] weell handled by Flore[illegible] leff, who gained in com[illegible] she progressed.

It is not possible to p[illegible] New England Cons[illegible] Chorus too highly as i[illegible] strated a capacity fo[illegible] shadings denied mos[illegible] groups. Its tone was [illegible] of fine texture and its [illegible] tion of the French text [illegible] markable throughout [illegible] whole was guiled by Mr. [illegible] wiht a special insight [illegible] music, which he introdu[illegible] three years ago, and th[illegible] tra responded with all [illegible] sublety. A final word f[illegible] Anthony Dwyer, Jan[illegible] poutsakis and Bernard [illegible]

[illegible] Richard Burgin will [illegible] next week's concert [illegible] Vaughan Williams' Fan[illegible] a Theme by Thomas Ha[illegible]

NEW YORKER, N. Y.
DEC 29 1956

Boston Symphony on 10th

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque on Thursday evening, Jan. 10, and a recital by Gina Bachauer, famed Greek pianist, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be the first on the list of the Griffith Music Foundation's 1957 attractions at that house.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in the opening concert which will be the only one the Bostonians will give this year in the foundation's symphony series.

Burgin, who is known both for his ability as a conductor and his brilliant qualities as a violinist, will conduct all the concerts of the orchestra's first tour of the coming year, including two concerts in New York.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
Circ. D. 255,047 - S. 300,922
DEC 23 1956

Classic and Almost

Anyone for Glockenspiels and Tympani?

By Doris Reno

A FASCINATING non-classifiable recording which has turned up recently is an Angel 12-inch LP disc labeled "Bell, Drum and Cymbal." It probably should be listed as a demonstration recording, since it presents Saul Goodman, the top-notch tympanist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, in an interesting lecture-demonstration of the percussion instruments of the orchestra.

Mr. Goodman introduces all the instruments, beginning with the glockenspiel and finally winding around to his pets, the tympani. He actually performs Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre" recognizably on the percussion instruments alone. He is assisted in the narration by Leonard Sterling.

★ ★ ★

ANOTHER intriguing novelty is a Riverside 12-inch LP presenting New Music of Alec Wilder — a composer who seems to ride the fence intriguingly between popular and serious music. He has not had a recording out, to our knowledge, since his Octets on good old 78's.

Wilder composed all this new music, labeled by one of his friends as "jazz with deep veins of serious music," for Mundell Lowe and his orchestra, who present it with plenty of get-up-and-go. Lowe's is a picked band of top some of them concert musicians.

[illegible] selected [illegible] these works — which sound wonderful but have no noticeable application that we can see—are "Suggestion for Bored Dancers," "She Never Wore Make-up," "Walk Softly," "Tacet for Neurotics," "Pop, What's a Passacaglia," and the like.

ARTHUR FIEDLER
... Strauss waltzes

★ ★ ★

A NEW COLLECTION of "Waltzes by the Strauss Family" has been issued by the excellent three-four conductor Arthur Fiedler and his Boston Pops Orchestra on a Victor 12-inch LP. The pieces are by Johann Sr., and his three sons, Johann Jr., Josef and Edward. They're all played with eminent charm by this charming pops conductor.

Some more waltzes and other tunes, in the shape of excerpts from Die Lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow) by Franz Lehar, have been issued on a Telefunken 12-inch LP with Anneliese Rothenberger and Herbert Ernst Groh in the leading roles. The chorus and orchestra are directed by Wilhelm Stephan.

On the other side of this disc appears a collection of "Die Meisteroperette of Leo Fall," whose operettas are seldom heard these days.

Both groups of excerpts are given a gay and lively reading.

★ ★ ★

STILL ANOTHER novelty turns up under the title of "Songs of Harry Lauder" on a London 12-inch LP, which presents George Elrick and the Stargazers imitating Harry in a considerable list of his old favorite presentations.

Popping up here are "Roamin' in the Gloamin'," (Harry's theme song), "It's Time To Get Up in the Morning," "When I was Twenty-one," and others. The group sings them with flair and dash and plenty of thickish Scottish accent, though we doubt whether they'll hit the bulls'-eye every time with folks who've relished the real Lauder.

★ ★ ★

MIKLOS GAFNI, tenor, and Rena Rossini, guitarist, present a group of Neapolitan Folk Songs on a Westminster 12-inch long-play. Gafni has the good old Italian throb in the voice, which is mellow and clear, and he goes all-out sentimental on these tunes.

Boston Symphony

Pokerspiel, griechische Tragödie und klassisch heitere Stimmung

Alles war Programmusik in dem Sonnabend - Nachmittags-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchester unter Carl Munch. Es begann mit Igor Stravinskys Ballett-Musik "Jeu de Cartes". Die Charaktere in diesem Ballet sind Karten in einem Pokerspiel. Jede der 3 "Runden" hat die gleiche musikalische etwas pomphafte Einleitung, nach der das Kartenspiel sich abwickelt; es endet mit einem Triumphtanz der siegenden "Herzen". Das Ganze originell, witzig instrumentiert, wurde vom Orchester entsprechend gespielt. Nach dem modernen Kartenspiel folgte die Musik aus einem anderen Ballett, mit antikem Hintergrund, Samuel Barber's "Medea". Das Kernstück "Medeas meditations and dance" (erst kürzlich vom Komponisten für die Konzertwiedergabe effektvoll neu orchestriert) ist der Tanz der vor Rache fast tollen Medea. Munch führte das Orchester durch alle Schwierigkeiten der Partitur zu einer brillanten Wiedergabe. Das Publikum nahm das interessante Werk mit viel Beifall auf, für den der anwesende Komponist sich aus einer Loge dankend verbeugen konnte. — Programmusik ist schließlich auch Beethovens 6. Symphonie, die Pastorale; aber hier werden andere Töne angestimmt und freudenvollere. Munchs Interpretation enthüllte alle, auch manche ungeahnte Schönheiten des Werkes. Man atmete Landluft, man fühlte das Glück am murmelnden Bach liegen zu können, man war mit beim Fest und Tanz der Landleute. Das Gewitter "sah" man sich zusammenziehen und entladen. Bei einer solchen Wiedergabe dieses Meisterwerks des Titanen konnte man nur "frohe und dankbare Gefühle" haben. Die Hörer hatten das und zeigten es. Es war eine denkwürdige Leistung von Orchester und Dirigenten.

G. R.

DECEMBER 25-56 N.Y. Concert review
CITY STAATS-ZEITUNG & HERALD

filene's

dear boston...

this Christmas our holly trimmed wishes go to you with our kiss-tested mistletoe

Our red carpet's out and our candles are lit . . .
'Tis time for our annual message, to wit:

The Yule Spirit's in us, so raise a loud cheer
Dear friends, Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

All four thousand of us in one rousing voice
Proclaim this a day full of cause to rejoice.

From all filene's Boston, both upstairs and down
We wrap up the giftiest Christmas in town.

From Winchester, Wellesley and Hyannis stores
Our seasonal joy and our gladness outpours.

From new bigger Belmont—all shimmer and shine—
From chic Chestnut Hill, the pride of route nine.

From Worcester, Northampton and Needham's filene's
Come cheers for the town of the Cod and the Beans.

From filene's new baby, gay greetings galore
Her birth date—next Autumn—up on the North Shore.

For Jordan's our neighbor, on each cheek a buss
For sharing this new Shopping Center with us.

For all fellow retailers, our warm embrace
Good fellowship oozing all over the place.

To Mayor John Hynes, the Best Christmas of all,
Complete with a breathtaking new City Hall!

Cheer Furcolo, Foster, our state's number one
Just winning the job is a big job well done.

On you it's becoming, this Governor's chair,
The office, the honors the challenges there.

May Yule bells chime sweetly for President Ike
The choice of the people, the man we all like.

And you, Bobby Cutler—we all note with glee
As Ike's special helper you're back in D. C.

To Weeks and to Rabb, and to Saltonstall, L.,
May Christmas be gay. Happy New Year, as well.

John Kennedy and your attractive young wife,
We wish you both happiness, health and long life.

To timeless Joe Martin whose home is nearby,
We praise your fine housekeeping skills to the sky.

McCormack, our Rep, who is whip of the party
May your Christmas goose and its trimmings be hearty.

And, Governor Herter, we know you'll be great
In helping to steer the Department of State.

For Lodge and for all of your friends at U.N.
The wassail we pour and forget to say "when."

Three cheers for the Lowells and Cabots and such;
And Scholars who dignify Boston so much.

Hail, Killian, Pusey and Case of B.U.
If knowledge is power, more power to you.

Hail Brandeis, hail Radcliffe, hail Simmons as well.
Hail sisters from Regis and Emmanuel.

And Wellesley where fair Peggy Clapp brightly reigns
Where beauty enhances the fast-growing brains.

Of course Boston College, Northeastern, for sure,
And Tufts: here's to happiness long to endure!

Dear Red Sox, Tom Yawkey, Joe Cronin and Mike,
You know you're our ball team, it's you that we like.

Hurrah for the Bruins, whose skill with the puck
Makes ice cubes of rivals—yea, Brown team, good luck.

To league leading Celtics, the stars of the hoop,
Cheer Cousy and Sharman, the toasts of the troop.

And cheers for the three with New England home ties
Who won us the foremost Olympic gold prize!

Cheer Jenkins for racing, and Connolly, Hal
Whose hammer could straighten the Suez Canal.

And sweet Tenley Albright, who took to the cleaner
All skating contenders she met at Cortina.

Hail, Wightman, our Hazel, we'll fill up your cup
And drink to the tennis kids you have brought up.

To Tony DeMarco; we still think you're great,
Our favorite guy for a welterweight date.

We toss a Yule peanut and ring a Yule bell
For Swan Boats, of course, and the Mallards as well.

Our chests swell with pride for our hospitals and
Our medicine men who are famed through the land.

A pain in Albania? A fracture in Spain?
In Boston we'll paste you together again.
Step lively. Look sharply! We're growing apace.
Old Boston's acquiring a gorgeous new face.

We're building new highways. Reclaiming our squares
Old Scollay may soon house our civic affairs.

To fabulous re-do for Boston's West End
To parking off street and a fleet traffic trend.

All Boston face-lifters like Bill Zeckendorf
Prudential, Druker, Yule egg-nogs we quaff.

Hail Kelleher, Mike, by the name he has won
"Mr. Boston" he's dubbed, for the fine work he's done.

And Hornblower H., who is urging the nation
To help in restoring the Plimouth Plantation.

All joy and all gladness—and more power, too,
In building your berth for the Mayflower II.

For all that you did for Community Fund
We praise and applaud and extoll you, Joe Lund.

Praise Postmaster Finn for completing his rounds
And Fire Chief Cotter, our warmth knows no bounds.

May hosemen and nozzlemen also be merry
To each his particular red holly berry.

To Thomas the Sullivan and the police
We toss a bouquet for upkeeping the peace.
This plaudit includes every cop on the beat
Especially Harry outside on our street.

And thanks MDC for enforcing the laws
So gently.
You've earned our undying applause.

To traffic boss Reilly and School Super Haley
We shout "Merry Christmas," not yearly, but daily.

Hail Volpe, ex-road boss, now well on his way
To paving the roads for the whole U. S. A.

And cheers to the man who inherits his spot
Carl Sheridan; man, what it takes you have got.

For Bill Callahan who can build a road fast
We wish him a future as bright as his past.

A holiday cheer for the dear M. T. A.
The trustworthy chauffeur of thousands, each day.

Wish joy to the taxis of every good fleet
(Especially cabbies right here on our street.)

Hang stars high for Logan, its planes geared to fly.
On every known airline marked up in the sky.

Ring bells for our harbor whose seamen adore
To ship just where oceans go. Who could ask more?

Toot horns for the Greyhound whose comforts of home
Are neatly in place under each see-through dome.

To Boston and Worcester, and Eastern Mass., too
Our fond salutations, our greetings to you.

Twine tinsel on Budd cars. Hail Boston & Maine
And wrap it round Alpert's New Haven's new train.

A Yule log for Perlman on this Christmas Day
To his New York Central and his B. & A.

Salute to our Maxie, commuters' delight,
Right there with the headlines by day and by night.

To Manthorne and G. Hicks, Dick Treat, Tull et al
We wish each the joy we should wish a good pal.

To Taylor, Hoftyzer and Canham and Choate
We happily warble a carol-type note.

To Reid, Ruggles, Akerson, friendly Jim King
We're also encouraged to stand up and sing.

The Pilot, the Advocate, ditto the Times
Elicit our most joyous holiday chimes.

And so do our columnists, all thinking reeds
Whose pieces are written as well as their leads:

Wish verbs by the dozens, and nouns by the droves
To Elie, the bright-eyed reporter who roves.

An equal endowment to Cunningham, Bill
Le Luce, more assignments to travel at will.

Hail Harriman, Ashby and George Chatter Clarke
Hail Frazer who prowls all the spots after dark.

Of course to O'Hara, whose risible prose
Delights us, a bright-flaming, plum pudding goes.

And reading the papers from last page to first
With rib-splitting laughter we're fitten to burst.

Frank Dahl is so comic, and so is Al Capp
The glad tears of mirth make a pool in our lap.

Hail Editors, Clancy, George Minot, Vic Jones,
L. Winship, O'Brien who just make no bones.

Wm. Brooks, Murphy, Sheldon, Sam Bornstein as well,
You know all there is, and thank heaven, you tell.

And as for the ladies of fashion, what cheer?
To Mugglebee, Bernkopf and Hanes—You are dear.

And Mayo . . . and also the girls on the air
Who daily address us in accents so fair.

Like Marjorie Mills and sweet Morgan (Louise)
And Duncan MacDonald and Chris Evans, please.

To Miss Mildred Albert and Fortescue, P.,
A star for the tippety-top of your tree.

To TV and radio stations we say
(Whose names start with W): "Hip, Hip, Hooray!"

And, speaking of culture, an old Boston trait,
We really must mention our famous and great.

Museums and orchestras, classic and pop;
We love you and think you're the absolute top!

For instance our Symphony traveled abroad
Where ~~Munch's baton packed~~ more weight than the sword.

For young Leonard Bernstein, "Bravo" and "Ole"
Your do is terrific and so is your re.

For Copland and Piston we gladly compose
A ballad entitled, "A Vous Deux La Rose."

To Boris Goldovsky, whose operas speak
In English; a mistletoe smack on the cheek.

To Arthur ("Pops") Fiedler we'll never be deaf
You rate the gold-plated, bejewelled G-clef.

Oh, Lowell, oh, Rathbone, oh, long may you thrive.
(Fine Arts had a fabulous membership drive.)

For all who have helped our Art Festival grow,
For Aldrich, for Temple our heart is aglow.

The Retail Clerks' Local, a walloping cheer
To all of your members, a prosperous year.

To Ad Club and Prexy, Berenson Dick,
We beam and admit you're a mighty smart trick.

To the Chamber of Commerce and Henderson Third
(Well maybe it's second—it won't rhyme with Bird.)

For handsome Dan Bloomfield, a holiday hail
To his Retail Trade Board, much New Year wassail.

To all of the rest if your name has been missed,
Believe us, you still rate sky high on our list.

The heart of our Christmas-time greeting again
Is Peace on the Earth and Goodwill to all men.

filene's

From new bigger Belmont—all shimmer

To timeless Joe Martin whose home is nearby,
We praise your fine housekeeping skills to the sky.

McCormack, our Rep, who is whip of the party
May your Christmas goose and its trimmings be hearty.

And, Governor Herter, we know you'll be great
In helping to steer the Department of State.

For Lodge and for all of your friends at U.N.
The wassail we pour and forget to say "when."

Three cheers for the Lowells and Cabots and such;
And Scholars who dignify Boston so much.

that we like.

Hurrah for the Bruins, whose skill with the puck
Hail Kelleher, Mike, by the name he has won
"Mr. Boston" he's dubbed, for the fine work he's done.

And Hornblower H., who is urging the nation
To help in restoring the Plimouth Plantation.

All joy and all gladness—and more power, too,
In building your berth for the Mayflower II.

For all that you did for Community Fund
We praise and applaud and extoll you, Joe Lund.

Praise Postmaster Finn for completing his rounds
And Fire Chief Cotter, our warmth knows no bounds.

May hosemen and nozzlemen also be merry
To each his particular red holly berry.

To traffic boss Reilly and School Supt Haley
We shout "Merry Christmas," not yearly, but daily.

To Reid, Ruggles, Akerson, friendly Jim King
We're also encouraged to stand up and sing.

The Pilot, the Advocate, ditto the Times
Elicit our most joyous holiday chimes.

And so do our columnists, all thinking reeds
Whose pieces are written as well as their leads:

Wish verbs by the dozens, and nouns by the droves
To Elie, the bright-eyed reporter who roves.

An equal endowment to Cunningham, Bill
Le Luce, more assignments to travel at will.

Hail Harriman, Ashby and George Chatter Clarke
Hail Frazer who prowls all the spots after dark.

Of course to O'Hara, whose risible prose
Delights us, a bright-flaming, plum pudding goes.

L. Winship, O'Brien who just make no bones.

Wm. Brooks, Murphy, Sheldon, Sam Bornstein as well
The Retail Clerks' Local, a whooping cheer
To all of your members, a prosperous year.

To Ad Club and Prexy, Berenson Dick,
We beam and admit you're a mighty smart trick.

To the Chamber of Commerce and Henderson Third
(Well maybe it's second—it won't rhyme with Bird.)

For handsome Dan Bloomfield, a holiday hail
To his Retail Trade Board, much New Year wassail.

To all of the rest if your name has been missed,
Believe us, you still rate sky high on our list.

The heart of our Christmas-time greeting again
Is Peace on the Earth and Goodwill to all men.

From "American-Gridiron Journal"
New York
December 26, 1956

Kleines Potpourri

comfort it was to have seen the Orff's new style, based chiefly on rhythm and dynamic contrasts, holds passed the censors who did not grasp their sense—remain far above suspicion and a vivid document of a "Weltanschauung" that held dictatorial books in gross contempt.

Of different caliber was the fine mid-December concert the Bostonians under Charles Munch's secure baton played in town. How wonderful the sombre mood of Honegger's Second Symphony a work written during the occupation of Paris and first performed in Switzerland under Paul Sacher to whom it was dedicated. How masterful the delightful Wedding Cantata by Bach, containing some five arias and recitatives for soprano accompanied by violin and oboe solo, and harpsichord. How gracefully tender and glowing the three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben" with their timely parallel to the festive Season. How elegant the second suite "Bacchus et Ariane" by Roussel, culminating in the most ravishing bacchanale. The evening's soloist was Irmgard Seefried, ending her ten weeks-tour through this country. Words cannot describe the voice of this artist and the way musical thoughts are conveyed to the listener. This time though, Miss Seefried had chosen her program for personal reasons: in praise of motherhood she, who will be absent for several months from the opera and concert stage, embedded her own feelings with prayerful warmth and womanly tenderness, thus making her voice soaring to lofty heights and radiantly expressing happiness.

Vidi.

Yawkey and the Fast Check Book

All of Tom Yawkey's philanthropic deeds are not known, but even if he did not rescind Ted Williams'

Defenseman Lorne Ferguson, a familiar chariey horse which kept him out of the last period at Chicago, Left wing Fleming Mackell; a some, don't be surprised of defenseman Leo Boivin is shifted to the wing . . . He's a good rushter and performed creditably in mak-

filene's

From new bigger Belmont—all shimmer

To timeless Joe Martin whose home is nearby,
We praise your fine housekeeping skills to the sky.

McCormack, our Rep, who is whip of the party
May your Christmas goose and its trimmings be hearty.

And, Governor Herter, we know you'll be great
In helping to steer the Department of State.

For Lodge and for all of your friends at U.N.
The wassail we pour and forget to say "when."

Three cheers for the Lowells and Cabots and such;
And Scholars who dignify Boston so much.

that we like.

Hurrah for the Bruins, whose skill with the puck
Hail Kelleher, Mike, by the name he has won
"Mr. Boston" he's dubbed, for the fine work he's done.

And Hornblower H., who is urging the nation
To help in restoring the Plimouth Plantation.

All joy and all gladness—and more power, too,
In building your berth for the Mayflower II.

For all that you did for Community Fund
We praise and applaud and extoll you, Joe Lund.

Praise Postmaster Finn for completing his rounds
And Fire Chief Cotter, our warmth knows no bounds.

May hosemen and nozzlemen also be merry
To each his particular red holly berry.

To frame boss Kelly and School Supt Haley
We shout "Merry Christmas," not yearly, but daily.

To Reid, Ruggles, Akerson, friendly Jim King
We're also encouraged to stand up and sing.

The Pilot, the Advocate, ditto the Times
Elicit our most joyous holiday chimes.

And so do our columnists, all thinking reeds
Whose pieces are written as well as their leads:

Wish verbs by the dozens, and nouns by the droves
To Elie, the bright-eyed reporter who roves.

An equal endowment to Cunningham, Bill
Le Luce, more assignments to travel at will.

Hail Harriman, Ashby and George Chatter Clarke
Hail Frazer who prowls all the spots after dark.

Of course to O'Hara, whose risible prose
Delights us, a bright-flaming, plum pudding goes.

L. Winship, O'Brien who just make no bones.

Wm. Brooks, Murphy, Sheldon, Sam Bornstein as well
The Retail Clerks' Local, a whooping cheer
To all of your members, a prosperous year.

To Ad Club and Prexy, Berenson Dick,
We beam and admit you're a mighty smart trick.

To the Chamber of Commerce and Henderson Third
(Well maybe it's second—it won't rhyme with Bird.)

For handsome Dan Bloomfield, a holiday hail
To his Retail Trade Board, much New Year wassail.

To all of the rest if your name has been missed,
Believe us, you still rate sky high on our list.

The heart of our Christmas-time greeting again
Is Peace on the Earth and Goodwill to all men.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Kleines Potpourri

New York's [illegible] year ended with a big sweep—no other place where you could hear three of the world's finest orchestras playing in as many days. On the eve of their departure the Vienna Philharmonic helped celebrate Human Rights Day at the United Nations, and in which in its solemn tone seemed to contrast sharply with the tragic events in many parts of the world where the basic human rights do not find recognition. There is inspiration and hope, however, in such forms of celebration and no small comfort it was to have seen the enthusiastic applause that greeted this eloquent expression of freedom inherent in Beethoven's titanic work.

The Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy not only offered a magnificent new work, but also executed it, assisted by the disciplined chorus of Temple University, and excellent soloists (Hilde Gueden, Rudolf Petrak and Kenneth Smith), in the most magnificent manner. One has to reckon with Carl Orff's eminent position in modern music, and were there any doubts about his creative genius, the première of "Il Trionfo di Afrodite" should have erased them instantly. The great scenic concerto was widely known through records, but its full glory became manifest in this pulsating and vibrant performance rendered by all who took part in it. It may be possible that from Hindemith's "Marienleben" with their timely parallel to the festive Season. How elegant the second suite "Bacchus et Ariane" by Roussel, culminating in the most ravishing bacchanale. The evening's soloist was Irmgard Seefried, ending her ten weeks-tour through this country. Words cannot describe the voice of this artist and the way musical thoughts are conveyed to the listener. This time though, Miss Seefried had chosen her program for personal reasons: in praise of motherhood she, who will be absent for several months from the opera and concert stage, embedded her own feelings with prayerful warmth and womanly tenderness, thus making her voice soaring to lofty heights and radiantly expressing happiness.

Vidi.

[redacted]

Yawkey and the Fast Check Book

All of Tom Yawkey's philanthropic deeds are not known, but even if he did not rescind Ted Williams' charley horse which kept him out of the last period at Chicago, Left Wing Fleming Mackell; a defenseman Lerine Kramaily; a defenseman Leo Boivin is shifted to the wing . . . He's a good rusher and performed creditably in maksome don't be surprised of de-

[redacted]

8—The Berkshire E

The L

By Milton

WHEN you plunk do five dollars for a pro ord, you sometimes w it should cost that m

Well, I just returne recording session of t Symphony Orchestra Boston Hall in Boston only wonder to meet the present [illegible] to market the record there. They took [illegible] was trying to pull a was necessary to deliver cert performance, posi the number of perso amount of equipment was absolutely stagge cording technique has been revolutionized in few years.

THE OBJECT of the session was to record "L'Enfance du Christ" Red Label Division. were the Boston Symp chestra of more than 1 cians under the dire Charles Munch, the 120 the New England Cons Chorus under the dire Lorna Cooke de Varon RCA technicians under rection of William Mi These three directors c in a task force that w cord the music on the ac of combat. The result two days of battle would to RCA headquarters York where some 80 sec would put the finishing on the event before it into history.

Two huge canvas ba were draped across the prevent any echoing in th expanse, and the orches placed on the front of t with the chorus in the r torial sections were to corded in the five session first day because the yo had already given up their Christmas vacation to participate, and ev was trying to get them way as soon as possib work had been split various segments in orders and would not be chronological whole until be edited in New York.

* * *

MR. MILTENBURG to Victor's Red Seal Div couple of years ago and vised technique not only company, but has also a trail for his competition low. Mr. Miltenburg's ground was in the movi ness so he brought stereo triple-track recording te to his division. The whole over involved investing o lion dollars in new equ but now when RCA tells is giving you "Stere Orthophonic Recording," exactly what they are doi

Mr. Miltenburg had hi nicians set up 10 microph they could have full cov the orchestra, the chor four soloists and any ins strument which had to be out from the crowd. The tra was to be recorded two outside tracks of th inch tape and the chorus middle track. After a filene's

From new bigger Belmont—all shimmer with a big sweep—no other place where you could hear three of the world's finest orchestras playing in as many days. On the eve of their departure the Vienna Philharmonic helped celebrate Human Rights Day at the United Nations, and underlined in its solemn tone seemed which in its artistic manifestation to contrast sharply with the tragic events in many parts of the world where the basic human rights do not find recognition. There is inspiration and hope, however, in such forms of celebration and no small comfort it was to have seen the enthusiasm with which the Vienna Philharmonic kept him out of the last period at Chicago. Left, wing Fleming Mackell; a charley horse which kept him out some, don't be surprised of defenseman Leo Boivin is shifted to the wing . . . He's a good rusher and performed creditably in mak-

Yawkey and the Fast Check Book

All of Tom Yawkey's philanthropic deeds are not known, but even if he did not rescind Ted Williams'

Kleines Potpourri

New York's musical year ended with a big sweep—no other place where you could hear three of the world's finest orchestras playing in as many days. On the eve of their departure the Vienna Philharmonic helped celebrate Human Rights Day at the United Nations, and underlined in its solemn tone seemed which in its artistic manifestation to contrast sharply with the tragic events in many parts of the world where the basic human rights do not find recognition. There is inspiration and hope, however, in such forms of celebration and no small comfort it was to have seen the enthusiasm with which the Vienna Philharmonic kept him out of the last period at Chicago.

Other new style based charity on rhythm and dynamic contrasts, holds passed the cerebrots who did not grasp their sense—remain far above suspicion and a vivid document of "Weltanschauung" that held dictatorial boots in gross contempt.

Of different caliber was the Fine mid-December concert the Bostonians under Charles Munch's secure baton played in town. How wonderful the sombre mood of Honegger's Second Symphony a work written during the occupation of Paris and first performed in Switzerland under Paul Sacher to whom it was dedicated. How masterful the delightful Wedding Cantata by Bach, containing some five arias and recitatives for soprano accompanied by violin and oboe soli, and harpsichord. How gracefully tender and glowing the three songs from Hindemith's "Marienleben" with their timely parallel to the festive Season. How elegant the second suite "Bacchus et Ariane" by Roussel, culminating in the most ravishing bacchanale. The evening's soloist was Irmgard Seefried, ending her ten weeks-tour through this country. Words cannot describe the voice of this artist and the way musical thoughts are conveyed to the listener. This time though, Miss Seefried had chosen her program for personal reasons: in praise of motherhood she, who will be absent for several months from the opera and concert stage, embedded her own feelings with prayerful warmth and womanly tenderness, thus making her voice soaring to lofty heights and radiantly expressing happiness.

Vidi.

To timeless Joe Martin whose home is nearby,
We praise your fine housekeeping skills to the sky.

McCormack, our Rep, who is whip of the party
May your Christmas goose and its trimmings be hearty.

And, Governor Herter, we know you'll be great
In helping to steer the Department of State.

For Lodge and for all of your friends at U.N.
The wassail we pour and forget to say "when."

Three cheers for the Lowells and Cabots and such;
And Scholars who dignify Boston so much.

that we like.

Hurrah for the Bruins, whose skill with the puck
Hail Kelleher, Mike, by the name he has won
"Mr. Boston" he's dubbed, for the fine work he's done.

And Hornblower H., who is urging the nation
To help in restoring the Plimouth Plantation.

All joy and all gladness—and more power, too,
In building your berth for the Mayflower II.

For all that you did for Community Fund
We praise and applaud and extoll you, Joe Lund.

Praise Postmaster Finn for completing his rounds
And Fire Chief Cotter, our warmth knows no bounds.

May hosemen and nozzlemen also be merry
To each his particular red holly berry.

To frame Joss Kelly and School Supt Haley
We shout "Merry Christmas," not yearly, but daily.

To Reid, Ruggles, Akerson, friendly Jim King
We're also encouraged to stand up and sing.

The Pilot, the Advocate, ditto the Times
Elicit our most joyous holiday chimes.

And so do our columnists, all thinking reeds
Whose pieces are written as well as their leads:

Wish verbs by the dozens, and nouns by the droves
To Elie, the bright-eyed reporter who roves.

An equal endowment to Cunningham, Bill
Le Luce, more assignments to travel at will.

Hail Harriman, Ashby and George Chatter Clarke
Hail Frazer who prowls all the spots after dark.

Of course to O'Hara, whose risible prose
Delights us, a bright-flaming, plum pudding goes.

L. Winship, O'Brien who just make no bones.

Wm. Brooks, Murphy, Sheldon, Sam Bornstein, all
The Retail Clerks Local, a walloping cheer
To all of your members, a prosperous year.

To Ad Club and Prexy, Berenson Dick,
We beam and admit you're a mighty smart trick.

To the Chamber of Commerce and Henderson Third
(Well maybe it's second—it won't rhyme with Bird.)

For handsome Dan Bloomfield, a holiday hail
To his Retail Trade Board, much New Year wassail.

To all of the rest if your name has been missed,
Believe us, you still rate sky high on our list.

The heart of our Christmas-time greeting again
Is Peace on the Earth and Goodwill to all men.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

8—The Berkshire Eagle, Thursday, Dec. 27, 1956

The Lively Arts

By Milton R. Bass

WHEN you plunk down four or five dollars for a phonograph record, you sometimes wonder why it should cost that much for a hunk of pressed vinylite. Can't be too much trouble to sit a group in front of a microphone and record their specialty. It would seem that somebody was trying to pull a fast one.

Well, I just returned from a recording session of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston, and my only wonder is that they are able to market the records at the present reasonable price. Nobody was trying to pull a fast one there. They took as much time as was necessary to deliver the finest performance possible, and the number of personnel and amount of equipment involved was absolutely staggering. Recording technique has certainly been revolutionized in the past few years.

* * *

THE OBJECT of the two-day session was to record Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" for RCA's Red Label Division. Involved were the Boston Symphony Orchestra of more than 100 musicians under the direction of Charles Munch, the 120 voices of the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon and the RCA technicians under the direction of William Miltenburg. These three directors combined in a task force that would record the music on the actual field of combat. The result of their two days of battle would go back to RCA headquarters in New York where some 80 technicians would put the finishing touches on the event before it sounded into history.

Two huge canvas backdrops were draped across the hall to prevent any echoing in the empty expanse, and the orchestra was placed on the front of the stage with the chorus in the rear. The choral sections were to be recorded in the two sessions of the first day because the youngsters had already given up part of their Christmas vacation in order to participate, and everybody was trying to get them on their way as soon as possible. The work had been split up into various segments in various orders and would not become a chronological whole until it would be edited in New York.

* * *

MR. MILTENBURG took over Victor's Red Seal Division a couple of years ago and has revised technique not only for his company, but has also blazed a trail for his competitors to follow. Mr. Miltenburg's background was in the movie business so he brought stereophonic, triple-track recording technique to his division. The whole changeover involved investing one million dollars in new equipment, but now when RCA tells you it is giving you "Stereophonic Orthophonic Recording," that's exactly what they are doing.

Mr. Miltenburg had his technicians set up 10 microphones so they could have full coverage of the orchestra, the chorus, the four soloists and any single instrument which had to be picked out from the crowd. The orchestra was to be recorded on the two outside tracks of the half-inch tape and the chorus on the middle track. After a series of tests, the engineer signaled he was ready, and Dick Mohr, RCA specialist who had been studying the Berlioz' score for weeks and had attended all the concerts at Symphony Hall, asked Mr. Munch if he was ready to begin.

* * *

I HAD BEEN sitting in the balcony overlooking the orchestra and it was sort of like old-home week to see the familiar faces of the musicians as they drifted onto the stage. When Mr. Munch appeared, there were loud shushes in the orchestra and chorus. He raised his baton for the first choral section and they started. I streaked downstairs and around the auditorium, and up the stairs to the recording room where some $50,000 worth of equipment was grinding away. The four-minute section ended and Mr. Munch came up to the room to give it a listen.

He sat there quietly while the tape was played back, studying the score and holding a hand over one ear to get the desired effect. When it was over, Mr. Mohr asked him how he liked it. Munch grunted. Now a Munch grunt can mean anything, but it turned out that this one meant he wasn't satisfied with the tonal balance and wanted to try it again. The orchestra and chorus went through it again. This time Miss De Varon, director of the chorus, wasn't happy with her charges' pronunciation of vous. So they did it a third and finally satisfactory time.

* * *

AND SO the afternoon and evening went with four or five minute segments being done and redone until Mr. Munch, Miss De Varon, Mr. Mohr, the engineer, the soloists and Mr. Miltenburg were satisfied. The final word on the whole business, of course, is Mr. Munch. If everybody else likes it and he doesn't, it's done over. If nobody else likes it and he does, it goes. Only ship captains, chefs and orchestra conductors are the final authorities on anything nowadays.

The tempo of the recording picked up once the tonal balances had been agreed upon and things went fairly quickly after that. The whole business took about 18 work hours by the orchestra and the tapes were wrapped up by Monday night. From Boston they were sent to New York where the editing and compositing take place at the main laboratory. A new stereophonic tape is made in the regular order of presentation and the triple track is cut down to a double and a final monaural track for the pressing of the records.

* * *

WHEN the final tape is produced, Mr. Munch goes down to New York for a hearing. Usually, it passes, but it is entirely possible for him to find fault and throw the whole thing out. This would be unusual because of the painstaking initial recording, but it is in the realm of possibility. Toscanini would not let some of his performances be released to the public.

It takes about a year for the whole business to be processed and on the market. So be prepared for a wonderful present about Christmas time next year. Because just from what I heard in the rough recording, I am ready to give it my unqualified approval. And Mr. Munch and I haven't disagreed on anything yet.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
DEC 26 1956

Bostonians

Symphony Is Listed for Jan. 10 Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the New Year's series of musical events with a concert at the Mosque Theater Thursday evening, Jan. 10. Gina Bachauer, noted Greek pianist, will give the third concert in the foundation's master piano series on the following Sunday afternoon, Jan. 13.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Bostonians in the opening concert, which will be the only one they will give this year in the foundation's symphony series. He wil also conduct all of the concerts, including two in New York, which the orchestra will give in the first tour of the coming year.

Born in Warsaw in 1891, Burgin studied the violin wtih Izydor Lotto and later with the famous Josef Joachim in Berlin and with Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg. His first public apperance as a violinist was made at 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. Subsequently he became concertmaster successively of the Leningrad, the Helsinki and the Christiana and Stockholm orchestras.

In the fall of 1920, Pierre Monteux appointed Burgen to the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsinki.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 29 1956

Nancy Carr will be the soprano soloist in Mahler's Fourth Symphony, to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Richard Burgin's direction Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 4 and 5.

Burgin Conducts

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque Theater, Newark, on January 10, will be the first event of the New Year on the Griffith Music Foundation's schedule. Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, will conduct the Bostonians at this the only concert they will give this season in the foundation's symphony series.

The program chosen for this concert will include Rossini's overture to the opera, "Semiramide", the Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88, and the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5, Opus 47.

Born in Warsaw, Burgin studied there with Izydor Lotto and subsequently with Josef Joachim in Berlin and with Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg. His first public appearance as a violinist was at the age of 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. Later he became concertmaster successively of the symphony orchestras of Leningrad, Helsinki, Christiania, and Stockholm

In the fall of 1920, Burgin became concertmaster of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Before coming to Boston, however, he had served in Europe under two former conductors of that orchestra, Fiedler and Nikisch. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Georg Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsinki. For his services to music, France honored Burgin 2 years ago by making him a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 27 1956

Fred Fehl

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will guide the Symphony Hall concerts on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and again on Jan. 4 and 5.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
DEC 30 1956

Burgin Leads Boston Orch.

Will Conduct Griffith Event at Mosque Jan. 10

Richard Burgin, associate conductor with Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony, will be on the podium when the orchestra performs a concert at the Mosque Thursday, Jan. 10, under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. Burgin will conduct all the concerts in the approaching tour of the Bostonians, including two in New York. The program chosen for the Mosque will include the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5, Opus 47; the Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88, and Rossini's overture to his opera, "Semiramide."

Burgin, known as a conductor and violinist, was born in Warsaw, Poland, in 1891. He studied there with Izydor Lotto and subsequently in Berlin with Josef Joachim and in St. Petersburg with Leopold Auer. His first public appearance as a violinist was at the age of 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. Later he became concertmaster successfully of the symphony orchestras of Leningrad, Helsinki, Christiana and Stockholm.

In the fall of 1920, Burgin was named concertmaster of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Before coming to Boston, however, he had served under two former conductors of that orchestra, Fiedler and Nikisch. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss and Sibelius.

The Lively Arts

By Milton R. Bass

WHEN you plunk down four or five dollars for a phonograph record, you sometimes wonder why it should cost that much for a hunk of pressed vinylite. Can't be too much trouble to sit a group in front of a microphone and record their specialty. It would seem that somebody was trying to pull a fast one.

Well, I just returned from a recording session of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston, and my only wonder is that they are able to market the records at the present reasonable price. Nobody was trying to pull a fast one there. They took as much time as was necessary to deliver the finest performance possible, and the number of personnel and amount of equipment involved was absolutely staggering. Recording technique has certainly been revolutionized in the past few years.

* * *

THE OBJECT of the two-day session was to record Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" for RCA's Red Label Division. Involved were the Boston Symphony Orchestra of more than 100 musicians under the direction of Charles Munch, the 120 voices of the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon and the RCA technicians under the direction of William Miltenburg. These three directors combined in a task force that would record the music on the actual field of combat. The result of their two days of battle would go back to RCA headquarters in New York where some 80 technicians would put the finishing touches on the event before it sounded into history.

Two huge canvas backdrops were draped across the hall to prevent any echoing in the empty expanse, and the orchestra was placed on the front of the stage with the chorus in the rear. The choral sections were to be recorded in the two sessions of the first day because the youngsters had already given up part of their Christmas vacation in order to participate, and everybody was trying to get them on their way as soon as possible. The work had been split up into various segments in various orders and would not become a chronological whole until it would be edited in New York.

* * *

MR. MILTENBURG took over Victor's Red Seal Division a couple of years ago and has revised technique not only for his company, but has also blazed a trail for his competitors to follow. Mr. Miltenburg's background was in the movie business so he brought stereophonic, triple-track recording technique to his division. The whole changeover involved investing one million dollars in new equipment, but now when RCA tells you it is giving you "Stereophonic Orthophonic Recording," that's exactly what they are doing.

Mr. Miltenburg had his technicians set up 10 microphones so they could have full coverage of the orchestra, the chorus, the four soloists and any single instrument which had to be picked out from the crowd. The orchestra was to be recorded on the two outside tracks of the half-inch tape and the chorus on the middle track. After a series of tests, the engineer signaled he was ready, and Dick Mohr, RCA specialist who had been studying the Berlioz' score for weeks and had attended all the concerts at Symphony Hall, asked Mr. Munch if he was ready to begin.

* * *

I HAD BEEN sitting in the balcony overlooking the orchestra and it was sort of like old-home week to see the familiar faces of the musicians as they drifted onto the stage. When Mr. Munch appeared, there were loud shushes in the orchestra and chorus. He raised his baton for the first choral section and they started. I streaked downstairs and around the auditorium and up the stairs to the recording room where some $50,000 worth of equipment was grinding away. The four-minute section ended and Mr. Munch came up to the room to give it a listen.

He sat there quietly while the tape was played back, studying the score and holding a hand over one ear to get the desired effect. When it was over, Mr. Mohr asked him how he liked it. Munch grunted. Now a Munch grunt can mean anything, but it turned out that this one meant he wasn't satisfied with the tonal balance and wanted to try it again. The orchestra and chorus went through it again. This time Miss De Varon, director of the chorus, wasn't happy with her charges' pronunciation of vous. So they did it a third and finally satisfactory time.

* * *

AND SO the afternoon and evening went with four or five minute segments being done and redone until Mr. Munch, Miss De Varon, Mr. Mohr, the engineer, the soloists and Mr. Miltenburg were satisfied. The final word on the whole business, of course, is Mr. Munch. If everybody else likes it and he doesn't, it's done over. If nobody else likes it and he does, it goes. Only ship captains, chefs and orchestra conductors are the final authorities on anything nowadays.

The tempo of the recording picked up once the tonal balances had been agreed upon and things went fairly quickly after that. The whole business took about 18 work hours by the orchestra and the tapes were wrapped up by Monday night. From Boston they were sent to New York where the editing and compositing take place at the main laboratory. A new stereophonic tape is made in the regular order of presentation and the triple track is cut down to a double and a final monaural track for the pressing of the records.

* * *

WHEN the final tape is produced, Mr. Munch goes down to New York for a hearing. Usually, it passes, but it is entirely possible for him to find fault and throw the whole thing out. This would be unusual because of the painstaking initial recording, but it is in the realm of possibility. Toscanini would not let some of his performances be released to the public.

It takes about a year for the whole business to be processed and on the market. So be prepared for a wonderful present about Christmas time next year. Because just from what I heard in the rough recording, I am ready to give it my unqualified approval. And Mr. Munch and I haven't disagreed on anything yet.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
DEC 26 1956

Bostonians

Symphony Is Listed for Jan. 10 Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the New Year's series of musical events with a concert at the Mosque Theater Thursday evening, Jan. 10. Gina Bachauer, noted Greek pianist, will give the third concert in the foundation's master piano series on the following Sunday afternoon, Jan. 13.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Bostonians in the opening concert, which will be the only one they will give this year in the foundation's symphony series. He wil also conduct all of the concerts, including two in New York, which the orchestra will give in the first tour of the coming year.

Born in Warsaw in 1891, Burgin studied the violin wtih Izydor Lotto and later with the famous Josef Joachim in Berlin and with Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg. His first public apperance as a violinist was made at 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. Subsequently he became concertmaster successively of the Leningrad, the Helsinki and the Christiana and Stockholm orchestras.

In the fall of 1920, Pierre Monteux appointed Burgen to the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsinki.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
Circ. D. 47,836
DEC 29 1956

Burgin Conducts

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque Theater, Newark, on January 10, will be the first event of the New Year on the Griffith Music Foundation's schedule. Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, will conduct the Bostonians at this the only concert they will give this season in the foundation's symphony series.

The program chosen for this concert will include Rossini's overture to the opera, "Semiramide", the Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88, and the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5, Opus 47.

Born in Warsaw, Burgin studied there with Izydor Lotto and subsequently with Josef Joachim in Berlin and with Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg. His first public appearance as a violinist was at the age of 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. Later he became concertmaster successively of the symphony orchestras of Leningrad, Helsinki, Christiania, and Stockholm

In the fall of 1920, Burgin became concertmaster of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Before coming to Boston, however, he had served in Europe under two former conductors of that orchestra, Fiedler and Nikisch. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Georg Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsinki. For his services to music, France honored Burgin 2 years ago by making him a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 29 1956

Nancy Carr will be the soprano soloist in Mahler's Fourth Symphony, to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Richard Burgin's direction Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 4 and 5.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 27 1956

Fred Fehl

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will guide the Symphony Hall concerts on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and again on Jan. 4 and 5.

175

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
DEC 30 1956

Burgin Leads Boston Orch.

Will Conduct Griffith Event at Mosque Jan. 10

Richard Burgin, associate conductor with Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony, will be on the podium when the orchestra performs a concert at the Mosque Thursday, Jan. 10, under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. Burgin will conduct all the concerts in the approaching tour of the Bostonians, including two in New York. The program chosen for the Mosque will include the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5, Opus 47; the Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88, and Rossini's overture to his opera, "Semiramide."

Burgin, known as a conductor and violinist, was born in Warsaw, Poland, in 1891. He studied there with Izydor Lotto and subsequently in Berlin with Josef Joachim and in St. Petersburg with Leopold Auer. His first public appearance as a violinist was at the age of 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. Later he became concertmaster successfully of the symphony orchestras of Leningrad, Helsinki, Christiana and Stockholm.

In the fall of 1920, Burgin was named concertmaster of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Before coming to Boston, however, he had served under two former conductors of that orchestra, Fiedler and Nikisch. He also served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss and Sibelius.

176

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 29 1956

-Burgin Conducting at Symphony

Beethoven and Shostakovitch on Program

By Harold Rogers

When Richard Burgin brought the final blazing bars of the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony to a close yesterday afternoon, he received an ovation punctuated by ecstatic bravos. They were much deserved, not alone for the Shostakovich, but for the whole concert. It included another Fifth Symphony, the one by Beethoven, and Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.

Mr. Burgin, who is conducting the Boston Symphony this week and next during Charles Munch's midwinter vacation, opened with a superb reading of the Vaughan Williams, the strings suavely reminiscent of their halcyon days under Koussevitzky. Since this work is scored only for strings (a large and small orchestra, plus a quartet of soloists), and since Mr. Burgin is preeminently a string man (as concertmaster these many years), the combination was a rare one, and the results flawless.

* * *

In the past Mr. Burgin has favored us with unusual programs imaginatively assembled, such as the one he has planned for next week (Bach, Honegger, Debussy, Ravel, and Mahler). It was therefore something of a surprise to find the Beethoven Fifth on the program this week, Titanic masterwork though it is.

One cannot hear a masterpiece too often, and the performance yesterday was memorable in all respects as Beethoven's architectural logic took shape in cathedrals of sound. Mr. Burgin allowed the music to build stone-upon-stone according to the plans laid down, and Beethoven would surely have approved of Mr. Burgin's ability to follow directions. Mr. Burgin's listeners were quick to inform him of their approbation.

But it was still a bit odd to find Beethoven sandwiched between Vaughan Williams and Shostakowitch. It would have been more like Mr. Burgin to put in something by Stravinsky. There was hardly need in this program to pour the oil of Beethoven on troubled contemporary waters, because the Shostakovitch Fifth is one of the least troubled of modern works, and the Vaughan Williams is neo-Elizabethan.

An untroubled work by Stravinsky (whose music since 1913 is hardly a challenge for the conservative ear) would have done this program no damage. One need not consider the box office when the seats are already sold; and if it's a matter of considering the public's level of appreciation, surely Bostonians are sophisticated enough to take an occasional program of moderns in stride.

* * *

Though one might gently carp at Mr. Murgin's program, there remains nothing but praise for the sonorous and sustained organ tones he elicited from the Vaughan Williams Fantasia and for the stately measures drawn from the Beethoven Fifth. His Shostakovitch, too, though a little rough in a few minor spots, was exciting for the grand impinging harmonies of the Moderato; humorous for the droll, almost straight-faced little waltz in the Allegretto; inspiring for the sighing and longing of the Largo, and exhilarating for the triumphant shouts in the Allegro non troppo.

The percussionists had a real romp.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 29 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Burgin Directs Shostakovitch

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 10th program of the Friday-Saturday series. Richard Burgin, concert-master and associate conductor, presented the following program: Vaughn Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor; Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 5.

By CYRUS DURGIN

This week and next Richard Burgin will be at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra while Charles Munch enjoys a respite. The program of yesterday and tonight contains two works which in the past Mr. Burgin has seemed to favor: the "Tallis" Fantasia and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

There is every reason why Vaughan Williams' ingenious working up of the Tallis theme should appeal to a conductor, and especially if he is also a string player. The two divisions of the strings, plus the solo quartet, make for superb contrasts and balances of sonority, as well as some lovely, shifting colors. When the strings happen to be as fabulously good as ours in Boston, the result inevitably is an interlude of ecstatic delight. So, yesterday, it was.

No doubt young people bowled over by hearing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the first few times, are startled if not revolted when they hear oldsters (including myself, I guess) proclaim the utter boredom of the "V for Victory" Symphony. It is, of course, merely a matter of over-familiarity. But whether or not we oldsters have cooled off with the mighty Fifth, it must be played for the benefit of the young.

The performance yesterday had its moments of splendor, but more when the texture was coarse and the playing perfunctory, as if the orchestra itself was also bored. The tympani were flat in some prominent chords of the first movement and finale, and gave the momentary sound a thick, sagging opacity that only a flat kettledrum can make. But even so, there was no mistaking the fact that Beethoven's Fifth is, of its kind, creative perfection.

Having tossed off two masterpieces in three paragraphs, let us have at the Shostakovitch Fifth, which is no masterpiece, never was and won't be, but which has some fine themes and some pages of true glory. Everything said in this respect is on purely musical terms: that the Shostakovitch Fifth celebrates the bloody muck of Soviet Communism in its first 20 years is another matter.

This symphony has always irritated me, apart from the slow movement, which is remarkably fine both in conception and technic. As time has gone on, the personal irritation has become less, largely, I think, because one has become accustomed to the prevailingly coarse texture of sound. The scoring is very ingenious but, I think, not really original.

The Fifth is a work both of beauty and of deplorable flaws in its first, second and final movements. The most deplorable flaws are found in the cheap, vulgar blatancy of Shostakovitch's marches, even though, in the last big build-up of the finale, the Boston Symphony's marvelous percussionists provide exciting clangor.

Yesterday's performance of Shostakovitch was, in terms of conducting and orchestral execution, really splendid, and drew enthusiastic response from the Friday audience.

Next week Mr. Burgin will present Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (arranged by Charles Munch) Honegger's Symphonic Movement "Rugby"; "Rondes de Printemps" ("Image," No. 3) by Debussy Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and Alborada del gracioso and Mahler's Fourth Symphony with Nancy Carr as soprano soloist.

Back Bay Ledger &
Beacon Hill Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 10,000 Free
JAN 3 1957

NANCY CARR IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall in his second appearance this season.

He will present Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in which the soprano soloist will be Nancy Carr. Miss Carr was born in Springfield, Ohio, educated there and in Chicago. She has sung in Mahler's Second and Fourth Symphonies with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Bruno Walter.

Mr. Burgin will open the program by performing Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year is Past," as orchestrated by Charles Munch. Four French numbers will follow: Honegger's "Rugby, Mouvement symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps," (Image No. 3), Ravel's "Pavane une Infante defunte" and the same composer's "Alborada del gracioso."

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
JAN 4 1957

DUE AT MOSQUE—Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct the orchestra Thursday evening at the Mosque under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 5 - 1957

Two Violins

Boston Symphony concert-goers yesterday afternoon may have been nonplussed when they saw Alfred Krips, acting concertmaster, use one violin in the first movement of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, then pick up another from a chair close by, for the second movement, only to resume the first instrument for the remainder of the piece.

It was not that Mr. Krips was dissatisfied with either instrument. The second movement of the Symphony calls for the concertmaster to play a violin tuned a note higher than usual, to give an effect of a crude village fiddler. It is easier to have two violins handy than to re-tune a single instrument.—C. W. D.

MUSIC Dec 29

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the tenth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The programs:

Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis ... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 ... Shostakovitch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What seemed on paper still another routine program of too-recently heard works (only last April for one of them) proved entirely satisfactory yesterday afternoon due largely to Richard Burgin's fine direction of all three. That and the fact that Shostakovitch's Fifth gains in stature on every hearing.

Few works were ever more severely blasted than this on the occasion of its first American performance in 1939, and it is easy to see, in retrospect, why it was. Indeed, many of the charges levelled against it ("banality," "coarseness," etc.) are certainly in evidence today, but what could not be seen without the perspective of the years is that it reveals an honesty of creative urged denied to many a later, more intellectualized work.

What it has, in all the tumult, in the gigantic utterances for brass and percussion, in the sound and fury, is a quality of emotional drive not to be gainsaid: one might not admire either the materials or the method, but it certainly moves, and is, in fact, often moving.

In 1939 music of passionate utterance was out of favor; the intellectualism of Stravinsky with its lean, stringy neo-classicism and the equally intellectualized dissonant linear counterpoint of the Boulanger school were in high fashion.

Thus the Shostakovitch Fifth, an entirely new departure from the Prokofievian influences of his First Symphony (it is impossible to know his development through the ensuing three as all have been withdrawn), came as a surprise. No one was prepared for so violently personal an utterance, or one employing all the coloristic devices of a Mahler.

Vast Triumph

Today, however, in the passage of nearly 20 years the work seems almost prophetic in foreshadowing the tragedy that was to befall Russia hardly more than a year later. Its final movement in particular, closing on a note of vast triumph, suggests the enormous vitality of the people. But this, of course, is all hindsight; nonetheless, the Fifth Symphony is a work of high drama, of striking contrasts and of direct, forceful communication. And it certainly communicated yesterday as Mr. Burgin, in his first appearance of the season as associate conductor led his forces through a brilliant reading of this huge work. I felt he lingered a little over the slow movement which is pretty lengthy to begin with, but his clear and vigorous beat gave the rest a stunning quality throughout.

His approach to the Beethoven was at once direct and tasteful, discriminating and fastidious. The orchestra responded in kind, playing vigorously and securely, though flawed occasionally to my taste by some rather too strenuous attacks in the cellos. All in all it was what might be called an authentic reading in contrast to the over-conducted performance the work often receives, with everything neat and tidy yet informed with Beethoven's own inner force.

I can find little enthusiasm for Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. Iit is beautiful, to be sure, and the string textures of the double string orchestra are often beguiling, but the work seems somehow soft and over-refined and while dwelling upon its material it meanders—as does the mind of this reviewer contemplating it in performance.

Mr. Burgin's second program next week is a grab-bag of all sorts of odds and ends, with works by Bach, Honegger, Debussy, and two by Ravel. The major offering is Mahler's Fourth Symphony with Nancy Carr soprano, the soloist in its closing movement.

Tribune-Advocate
SANFORD, Maine
Weekly Independent
Circ. 5,848
JAN 3 - 1957

peted for national honors.

Everett J. Firth, 25, son of Mr. and Mrs. Everett E. Firth, was named first tympani player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the youngest "first desk" man, and later in the year went with the orchestra on its tour to Russia.

A special town meeting ...

176

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
DEC 29 1956

-Burgin Conducting at Symphony

Beethoven and Shostakovitch on Program

By Harold Rogers

When Richard Burgin brought the final blazing bars of the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony to a close yesterday afternoon, he received an ovation punctuated by ecstatic bravos. They were much deserved, not alone for the Shostakovich, but for the whole concert. It included another Fifth Symphony, the one by Beethoven, and Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.

Mr. Burgin, who is conducting the Boston Symphony this week and next during Charles Munch's midwinter vacation, opened with a superb reading of the Vaughan Williams, the strings suavely reminiscent of their halcyon days under Koussevitzky. Since this work is scored only for strings (a large and small orchestra, plus a quartet of soloists), and since Mr. Burgin is preeminently a string man (as concertmaster these many years), the combination was a rare one, and the results flawless.

In the past Mr. Burgin has favored us with unusual programs imaginatively assembled, such as the one he has planned for next week (Bach, Honegger, Debussy, Ravel, and Mahler). It was therefore something of a surprise to find the Beethoven Fifth on the program this week, Titanic masterwork though it is.

One cannot hear a masterpiece too often, and the performance yesterday was memorable in all respects as Beethoven's architectural logic took shape in cathedrals of sound. Mr. Burgin allowed the music to build stone-upon-stone according to the plans laid down, and Beethoven would surely have approved of Mr. Burgin's ability to follow directions. Mr. Burgin's listeners were quick to inform him of their approbation.

But it was still a bit odd to find Beethoven sandwiched between Vaughan Williams and Shostakowitch. It would have been more like Mr. Burgin to put in something by Stravinsky. There was hardly need in this program to pour the oil of Beethoven on troubled contemporary waters, because the Shostakovitch Fifth is one of the least troubled of modern works, and the Vaughan Williams is neo-Elizabethan.

An untroubled work by Stravinsky (whose music since 1913 is hardly a challenge for the conservative ear) would have done this program no damage. One need not consider the box office when the seats are already sold; and if it's a matter of considering the public's level of appreciation, surely Bostonians are sophisticated enough to take an occasional program of moderns in stride.

Though one might gently carp at Mr. Murgin's program, there remains nothing but praise for the sonorous and sustained organ tones he elicited from the Vaughan Williams Fantasia and for the stately measures drawn from the Beethoven Fifth. His Shostakovitch, too, though a little rough in a few minor spots, was exciting for the grand impinging harmonies of the Moderato; humorous for the droll, almost straight-faced little waltz in the Allegretto; inspiring for the sighing and longing of the Largo, and exhilarating for the triumphant shouts in the Allegro non troppo.

The percussionists had a real romp.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
DEC 29 1956

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Burgin Directs Shostakovitch

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 10th program of the Friday-Saturday series. Richard Burgin, concert-master and associate conductor, presented the following program: Vaughn Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor; Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 5.

By CYRUS DURGIN

This week and next Richard Burgin will be at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra while Charles Munch enjoys a respite. The program of yesterday and tonight contains two works which in the past Mr. Burgin has seemed to favor: the "Tallis" Fantasia and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

There is every reason why Vaughan Williams' ingenious working-up of the Tallis theme should appeal to a conductor, and especially if he is also a string player. The two divisions of the strings, plus the solo quartet, make for superb contrasts and balances of sonority, as well as some lovely shifting colors. When the strings happen to be so fabulously good as ours in Boston, the result inevitably is an interlude of ecstatic delight. So, yesterday, it was.

No doubt young people bowled over by hearing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the first few times, are startled if not revolted when they hear oldsters (including myself, I guess) proclaim the utter boredom of the "V for Victory" Symphony. It is, of course, merely a matter of over-familiarity. But whether or not we oldsters have cooled off with the mighty Fifth, it must be played for the benefit of the young.

The performance yesterday had its moments of splendor, but more when the texture was coarse and the playing perfunctory, as if the orchestra itself was also bored. The tympani were flat in some prominent chords of the first movement and finale, and gave the momentary sound a thick, sagging opacity that only a flat kettledrum can make. But even so, there was no mistaking the fact that Beethoven's Fifth is, of its kind, creative perfection.

Having tossed off two masterpieces in three paragraphs, let us have at the Shostakovitch Fifth, which is no masterpiece, never was and won't be, but which has some fine themes and some pages of true glory. Everything said in this respect is on purely musical terms: that the Shostakovitch Fifth celebrates the bloody muck of Soviet Communism in its first 20 years is another matter.

This symphony has always irritated me, apart from the slow movement, which is remarkably fine both in conception and technic. As time has gone on, the personal irritation has become less, largely, I think, because one has become accustomed to the prevailingly coarse texture of sound. The scoring is very ingenious but, I think, not really original.

The Fifth is a work both of beauty and of deplorable flaws in its first, second and final movements. The most deplorable flaws are found in the cheap, vulgar blatancy of Shostakovitch's marches, even though, in the last big build-up of the finale, the Boston Symphony's marvelous percussionists provide exciting clangor.

Yesterday's performance of Shostakovitch was, in terms of conducting and orchestral execution, really splendid, and drew enthusiastic response from the Friday audience.

Next week Mr. Burgin will present Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (arranged by Charles Munch) Honegger's Symphonic Movement "Rugby": "Rondes de Printemps" ("Image," No. 3) by Debussy Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and Alborada del gracioso and Mahler's Fourth Symphony with Nancy Carr as soprano soloist

Back Bay Ledger &
Beacon Hill Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 10,000 Free
JAN 3 1957

NANCY CARR IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall in his second appearance this season.

He will present Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in which the soprano soloist will be Nancy Carr. Miss Carr was born in Springfield, Ohio, educated there and in Chicago. She has sung in Mahler's Second and Fourth Symphonies with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Bruno Walter.

Mr. Burgin will open the program by performing Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year is Past," as orchestrated by Charles Munch. Four French numbers will follow: Honegger's "Rugby, Mouvement symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps," (Image No. 3), Ravel's "Pavane une Infante defunte" and the same composer's "Alborada del gracioso."

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
JAN 4 1957

DUE AT MOSQUE—Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct the orchestra Thursday evening at the Mosque under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 5 - 1957

Two Violins

Boston Symphony concert-goers yesterday afternoon may have been nonplussed when they saw Alfred Krips, acting concertmaster, use one violin in the first movement of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, then pick up another from a chair close by, for the second movement, only to resume the first instrument for the remainder of the piece.

It was not that Mr. Krips was dissatisfied with either instrument. The second movement of the Symphony calls for the concertmaster to play a violin tuned a note higher than usual, to give an effect of a crude village fiddler. It is easier to have two violins handy than to re-tune a single instrument.—C. W. D.

MUSIC Dec 29

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the tenth program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis ..... Williams
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47 ..... Shostakovitch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What seemed on paper still another routine program of too-recently heard works (only last April for one of them) proved entirely satisfactory yesterday afternoon due largely to Richard Burgin's fine direction of all three. That and the fact that Shostakovitch's Fifth gains in stature on every hearing.

Few works were ever more severely blasted than this on the occasion of its first American performance in 1939, and it is easy to see, in retrospect, why it was. Indeed, many of the charges levelled against it ("banality," "coarseness," etc.) are certainly in evidence today, but what could not be seen without the perspective of the years is that it reveals an honesty of creative urged denied to many a later, more intellectualized work.

What it has, in all the tumult, in the gigantic utterances for brass and percussion, in the sound and fury, is a quality of emotional drive not to be gainsaid: one might not admire either the materials or the method, but it certainly moves, and is, in fact, often moving.

In 1939 music of passionate utterance was out of favor; the intellectualism of Stravinsky with its lean, stringy neo-classicism and the equally intellectualized dissonant linear counterpoint of the Boulanger school were in high fashion.

Thus the Shostakovitch Fifth, an entirely new departure from the Prokofievian influences of his First Symphony (it is impossible to know his development through the ensuing three as all have been withdrawn), came as a surprise. No one was prepared for so violently personal an utterance, or one employing all the coloristic devices of a Mahler.

Vast Triumph

Today, however, in the passage of nearly 20 years the work seems almost prophetic in foreshadowing the tragedy that was to befall Russia hardly more than a year later. Its final movement in particular, closing on a note of vast triumph, suggests the enormous vitality of the people. But this, of course, is all hindsight: nonetheless, the Fifth Symphony is a work of high drama, of striking contrasts and of direct, forceful communication. And it certainly communicated yesterday as Mr. Burgin, in his first appearance of the season as associate conductor led his forces through a brilliant reading of this huge work. I felt he lingered a little over the slow movement which is pretty lengthy to begin with, but his clear and vigorous beat gave the rest a stunning quality throughout.

His approach to the Beethoven was at once direct and tasteful, discriminating and fastidious. The orchestra responded in kind, playing vigorously and securely, though flawed occasionally to my taste by some rather too strenuous attacks in the cellos. All in all it was what might be called an authentic reading in contrast to the over-conducted performance the work often receives, with everything neat and tidy yet informed with Beethoven's own inner force.

I can find little enthusiasm for Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. It is beautiful, to be sure, and the string textures of the double string orchestra are often beguiling, but the work seems somehow soft and over-refined and while dwelling upon its material it meanders—as does the mind of this reviewer contemplating it in performance.

Mr. Burgin's second program next week is a grab-bag of all sorts of odds and ends, with works by Bach, Honegger, Debussy, and two by Ravel. The major offering is Mahler's Fourth Symphony with Nancy Carr soprano, the soloist in its closing movement.

Tribune-Advocate
SANFORD, Maine
Weekly Independent
Circ. 5,848
JAN 3 - 1957

peted for national honors.

Everett J. Firth, 25, son of Mr. and Mrs. Everett E. Firth, was named first tympani player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the youngest "first desk" man, and later in the year went with the orchestra on its tour to Russia.

A special town meeting

Burgin Conducts Mahler's Fourth

Nancy Carr Acclaimed as Soprano Soloist

By Harold Rogers

With but little imagination one could hear, ringing through the bars of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, the laughter of childhood, the sounds of games and the guileless songs that go with them, the skipping of children inspired by spontaneous joy. It is remarkable how Mahler infused so much childlike wonderment into a work lasting almost an hour, and sustaining, with but few lapses, his own and his listeners' interest through his flow of ingenuous melody, his musical skies flooded with limpid sunshine.

* * *

The man who conducts the Mahler Fourth, it goes without saying, should be sympathetic and kindly; and it was obvious yesterday afternoon that Richard Burgin poured a heart full of love into this performance. He is the Mahler champion in New England, though Mahler Mr. Burgin has his turn on the podium. His performance yesterday was superb.

And not only to Mr. Burgin go the honors, but also to Nancy Carr, a soprano whose opulent, lucid, and artistic singing in the final movement was true to the smile of the poetry. "So delightful are the joys of Heaven," she sang, that "we have no need of earthly ones"!

Formerly of Chicago (where she was often starred on the Chicago Theater of the Air), Miss Carr now lives in Boston. We hope this debut with the Boston Symphony will mark the beginning of an active musical life for her in this community.

Mr. Burgin has chosen a fascinating program for the Symphony Hall concerts this weekend. Four composers are represented on the first half (with Mahler, of course, taking up the last half). Yesterday he led with Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," as arranged by Charles Munch. His reading was sturdy forthright, yet appropriately religioso.

Then came Honegger's one-movement piece called "Rugby," the meaning of which is obvious. This was a companion to "Pacific 231," the meaning of which is less obvious until the music is heard, at which time one has no doubt a locomotive is involved. The "Rugby" music is less explicit, but it is obviously sinuous and athletic. It is an entertaining reminiscence from the composer's young and clever days, before he became the leading French symphonist of this century.

* * *

Mr. Burgin continued with Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," as lovely a little idyll as one could wish for, and he then turned to Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," the sweet nostalgia of which is about all that supports the title.

But this decorous respite lasted no longer than the pavane itself, for Mr. Burgin launched into the flashingly arresting rhythms of Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," a superb example of the composer's talent in handling the orchestra brilliantly.

It was a program of great variety, with the ebullience of childhood, youth, games, dancing, and song prevailing. It gave us Mr. Burgin at his best.

---

france amerique

20 Janvier 1957

RICHARD BURGIN dirige le "Boston Symphony"

EST-CE parce que c'est l'Année Lafayette? Ou un rappel discret aux politiciens? Toujours est-il que la musique française figure en bonne place, à Boston, dans de nombreux concerts ces derniers temps, sans parler de deux pièces de théâtre qui remportent un immense succès: Fanny, inspiré de Pagnol, et une version "anglicisée" de La Valse des Toréadors, de Jean Anouilh.

En l'absence de Charles Münch, actuellement en France, Richard Burgin a dirigé un tour d'horizon musical qui l'a fait aller de Bach —dans un arrangement de Charles Münch — à Mahler en passant par... Honegger, Debussy et Ravel. C'est devenu une tradition à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston de commencer la première série de concerts de l'année avec le Prélude et Choral "Das Alte Jahr vergangen ist" (dont les paroles auraient aussi bien pu être écrites aujourd'hui qu'il y a près de quatre siècles: "Nous Te remercions, Seigneur Jésus, de nous avoir protégés d'un si grand danger tout au long de la longue année..."). L'arrangement orchestral qu'en a fait Charles Münch montre qu'il a touché l'orgue dans sa jeunesse et qu'il connaît à fond cet instrument et celui, tout aussi compliqué, qu'est un orchestre.

Le mouvement symphonique "Rugby" a été écrit par Honegger en 1928, à l'âge de 36 ans, cinq ans après son "Pacific 231" et cherche à exprimer musicalement "les assauts et contre-assauts, le rythme et la couleur d'un match (de rugby) au Stade de Colombes." Et, à ce point de vue, nous sommes bien servis; même sans percussion — en contraste avec "Pacific", qui en avait beaucoup — on entend l'enthousiasme de la foule, on "voit" les passes savantes des joueurs, on se "sent" envahi par l'air froid des gradins et la chaleur intérieure de la victoire. Honegger a, toutefois, écrit de la meilleure musique, avant et après "Rugby".

Les "Rondes de Printemps" de Claude Debussy sont d'un tout autre genre, musique éthérée et abstraite, tout "en couleurs et en rythmes" dans laquelle passe à chaque instant ce motif emprunté au Mai florentin: "Vive le Mai, bienvenu soit le Mai avec son gonfalon sauvage".

Un des thèmes de ces "Rondes" est le populaire "Nous n'irons plus au bois...", sculpté, ciselé pour notre plaisir. Dommage que l'exécution en ait été plutôt plate: une excellente lecture, sans interprétation.

La Pavane et l'Alborado sont des pièces pleines d'une grâce que seul Ravel savait exprimer avec autant d'élégance. Bien que moins difficiles à interpréter que Debussy, il nous a semblé que l'orchestre manquait de brillant: les solistes étaient excellents, par contre, et ont bien mérité les applaudissements qui leur furent prodigués.

Dans la Symphonie n° 4 de Gustav Mahler, M. Richard Burgin est plus à l'aise, davantage dans son élément, peut-être à cause de sa formation germanique. Il nous a donné de cette oeuvre majeure une interprétation fouillée, bien comprise, à laquelle Mlle Nancy Carr prêtait son beau soprano.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 5 - 1957

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Burgin Leads Mahler Fourth

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 11th program of the Friday–Saturday series. Richard Burgin, associate conductor, presented: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (arranged by Charles Munch); Honegger: "Rugby," Symphonic Movement; Debussy: "Rondes de Printemps" ("Image" No. 3); Ravel: "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," Alborada del gracioso; Mahler: Symphony No. 4, in G major (soloist: Nancy Carr, soprano).

By CYRUS DURGIN

Thanks to Richard Burgin, we are enjoying at the Boston Symphony concerts this week the only music by Gustav Mahler that we are likely to have there all season. Mr. Burgin leads again the Fourth Symphony, a work of which, evidently, he is very fond, and one which brings out his finest attributes as conductor.

Since this is a very beautiful Symphony, indeed, we are much in Mr. Burgin's debt.

Having always in mind, when Mahler is played, some of the old public prejudice against his often very long scores, it was bracing yesterday to hear a good deal of favorable lobby comment. While this is not evidence enough to warrant assumption that the tide has turned strongly in Mahler's favor, it has its own significance. It must mean that the public at last has seen the light which shines in the tissues of song which are Mahler's music.

The G major Symphony is all song, all radiance, shunning the turbulence which racked Mahler's inner spirit much of the time, and free of the dark moods which so often must have tortured him. In the G major, also, are steady motion and a fascinating undulation of rhythms, gentle and strong. In short, a Symphony which touches the milder emotions, and is delight all the way.

It was played superbly, and conducted with genuine mastery. The vocal soloist for the fourth movement was Nancy Carr, a young Ohio-born soprano who, says the record, has appeared here only once before, in Brahms' Requiem during the Boston Arts Festival of 1955. She has a gorgeous voice, of a somewhat — and peculiarly — "dark" color. Miss Carr may have been nervous at the outset, yesterday, for she failed to summon much resonance in the first two stanzas. Thereafter, things went better. She sang, too, with the childlike naivete which is so important to the veracious expression of this fanciful description of all the goodies in Heaven.

A Curious Assemblage

The first half of the program was a curious assemblage of five relatively short pieces, starting with the Munch orchestration of the Bach Chorale and Chorale Prelude, "The Old Year Is Past," which, by pleasant custom, has been played at the first concerts of every new year since 1952.

None of these pieces had much relation to its fellows, and you might have thought they had been chosen by lot. But individually they are good pieces, and yesterday they were all played to the nines. Up to a point this was a selection of "first chair" pieces, for Mr. Burgin singled out for merited solo bows Mr. Stagliano, for his horn playing in Ravel's Pavane, and Mr. Walt for his bassoon work in the Alborada del gracioso.

Honegger's "Rugby" evidently had been kept on the Symphony's library shelf since its Boston premiere, under the composer's baton, in 1929. Little wonder. "Rugby" seems old-fashioned today, abstract and mechanistic, even when considered in the light of the composer's intent to express, in a non-programmatic way, "the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game." Honegger wrote much better music later in his life. Indeed, after the rush of opposing rhythms in "Rugby," and the clashes of his wild dissonance, it is almost amusing to hear the piece end upon a tonic chord.

Next week the Orchestra goes again to New York. Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor at the Symphony Hall concerts of Jan. 18 and 19, in Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Ballet Suite; instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 5 - 1957

Music

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 11th program of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Nancy Carr, soprano. The program:

"The Old Year Is Past" ..... Bach
"Rugby" ..... Honegger
"Rondes de printemps" ..... Debussy
"Pavane;" "Alborado del gracioso" Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in G ..... Mahler

Richard Burgin's second appearance as associate conductor of the season found him offering an unusual and, by and large, save for the Mahler Symphony, a not very successful program.

It's the first time in a good many years five different works have been given before the intermission and it is not too wise a move, at least if yesterday's experience may be considered typical of such an occasion. The Bach chorale prelude was, to be sure, a gesture to the season and a pleasant one in Mr. Munch's simple transcription for orchestra. The other four just didn't go well together.

Tame to Ear

Honegger's "Rugby," a piece in which the composer sought to "express the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game, the rhythm and color of a match in the stadium," has not been heard here since 1929. It is an interesting essay and one that in 1929 was probably found harsh, dissonant and aggressive. Today its textures are relatively tame to the ear, and the work does not have the impact one expects of it. It may be because the same composer's "Pacific 2-3-1" has so much, and while there is little point in comparing the two pieces, one familiar with "Pacific" is bound to be let down by "Rugby."

Debussy's "[illegible] temps," in its first performance here since 1923, is also something of a let-down. It suggests this and that in other works of Debussy and the orchestral textures are typical impressionistic, but it is a weak and tenuous composition, interesting only for the infrequency of its performance.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunt," is charming in its antique gravity, but it was left for the same composer's "Alborado del gracioso" to restore the sense of fulfillment to the concert. Mr. Burgin sought out its fiery Spanish rhythms and colorations vividly and the beautiful recitative for solo bassoon in the inner section gave us a chance to realize how superb an instrumentalist Sherman Walt, the orchestra's first bassoonist, is. He produces the finest tone quality on this instrument I have ever heard.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony, long one of Mr. Burgin's favorites, introduced a distinguished soprano soloist in Nancy Carr, making her first appearance here. Tall, slim, attractive, Miss Carr's traversal of the exquisite last movement was exceedingly tasteful. Her voice is a little on the light side but it is well produced and has a clear, silvery quality that becomes the role. She was warmly received by the audience, which was obviously enchanted by the touching naivete of the closing movement.

Melody Flows Out

The work itself is Mahler's most genial as one melody flows out of another in an endless procession. Now they are long-flowing strains of the most sensuous character, again they [illegible] most ingenious, as in the [illegible] now they reflect the [illegible] simplicity of the peasant air, again they suggest Viennese gemutlichkeit. [illegible]

The scherzo is particularly interesting for the use in it of two violins for the first violinist. Thus Mr. Krips had deployed on a chair in front of him his usual instrument conventionally tuned while he played another tuned a whole tone higher. This is known as "scordatura," and it is an ancient device though not often employed today. Saint Saens does it in "Danse Macabre" and it appears also in works by Stravinsky and Strauss. In Mahler's case, as in Saint Saens' it lends the quaint rustic quality of the country fiddler.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 18 with Pierre Monteux the guest conductor. Mr. Monteux will do Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite; scenes instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

Burgin Conducts Mahler's Fourth

Nancy Carr Acclaimed as Soprano Soloist

By Harold Rogers

With but little imagination one could hear, ringing through the bars of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, the laughter of childhood, the sounds of games and the guileless songs that go with them, the skipping of children inspired by spontaneous joy. It is remarkable how Mahler infused so much childlike wonderment into a work lasting almost an hour, and sustaining, with but few lapses, his own and his listeners' interest through his flow of ingenuous melody, his musical skies flooded with limpid sunshine.

* * *

The man who conducts the Mahler Fourth, it goes without saying, should be sympathetic and kindly; and it was obvious yesterday afternoon that Richard Burgin poured a heart full of love into this performance. He is the Mahler champion in New England, though Mahler Mr. Burgin has his turn on the podium. His performance yesterday was superb.

And not only to Mr. Burgin go the honors, but also to Nancy Carr, a soprano whose opulent, lucid, and artistic singing in the final movement was true to the smile of the poetry. "So delightful are the joys of Heaven," she sang, that "we have no need of earthly ones"!

Formerly of Chicago (where she was often starred on the Chicago Theater of the Air), Miss Carr now lives in Boston. We hope this debut with the Boston Symphony will mark the beginning of an active musical life for her in this community.

Mr. Burgin has chosen a fascinating program for the Symphony Hall concerts this weekend. Four composers are represented on the first half (with Mahler, of course, taking up the last half). Yesterday he led with Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," as arranged by Charles Munch. His reading was sturdy forthright, yet appropriately religioso.

Then came Honegger's one-movement piece called "Rugby," the meaning of which is obvious. This was a companion to "Pacific 231," the meaning of which is less obvious until the music is heard, at which time one has no doubt a locomotive is involved. The "Rugby" music is less explicit, but it is obviously sinuous and athletic. It is an entertaining reminiscence from the composer's young and clever days, before he became the leading French symphonist of this century.

* * *

Mr. Burgin continued with Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," as lovely a little idyll as one could wish for, and he then turned to Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," the sweet nostalgia of which is about all that supports the title.

But this decorous respite lasted no longer than the pavane itself, for Mr. Burgin launched into the flashingly arresting rhythms of Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," a superb example of the composer's talent in handling the orchestra brilliantly.

It was a program of great variety, with the ebullience of childhood, youth, games, dancing, and song prevailing. It gave us Mr. Burgin at his best.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 5 - 1957

Music

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 11th program of the 75th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Nancy Carr, soprano. The program:

"The Old Year Is Past" ..... Bach
"Rugby" ..... Honegger
"Rondes de printemps" ..... Debussy
"Pavane;" "Alborado del gracioso" Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in G ..... Mahler

Richard Burgin's second appearance as associate conductor of the season found him offering an unusual and, by and large, save for the Mahler Symphony, a not very successful program.

It's the first time in a good many years five different works have been given before the intermission and it is not too wise a move, at least if yesterday's experience may be considered typical of such an occasion. The Bach chorale prelude was, to be sure, a gesture to the season and a pleasant one in Mr. Munch's simple transcription for orchestra. The other four just didn't go well together.

Tame to Ear

Honegger's "Rugby,' a piece in which the composer sought to "express the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game, the rhythm and color of a match in the stadium," has not been heard here since 1929. It is an interesting essay and one that in 1929 was probably found harsh, dissonant and aggressive. Today its textures are relatively tame to the ear, and the work does not have the impact one expects of it. It may be because the same composer's "Pacific 2-3-1" has so much, and while there is little point in comparing the two pieces, one familiar with "Pacific" is bound to be let down by "Rugby."

Debussy's "[illegible] temps," in its first performance here since 1923, is also something of a let-down. It suggests this and that in other works of Debussy and the orchestral textures are typical impressionistic, but it is a weak and tenuous composition, interesting only for the infrequency of its performance.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunt," is charming in its antique gravity, but it was left for the same composer's "Alborado del gracioso" to restore the sense of fulfillment to the concert. Mr. Burgin sought out its fiery Spanish rhythms and colorations vividly and the beautiful recitative for solo bassoon in the inner section gave us a chance to realize how superb an instrumentalist Sherman Wallt, the orchestra's first bassoonist, is. He produces the finest tone quality on this instrument I have ever heard.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony, long one of Mr. Burgin's favorites, introduced a distinguished soprano soloist in Nancy Carr, making her first appearance here. Tall, slim, attractive, Miss Carr's traversal of the exquisite last movement was exceedingly tasteful. Her voice is a little on the light side but it is well produced and has a clear, silvery quality that becomes the role. She was warmly received by the audience, which was obviously enchanted by the touching naivete of the closing movement.

Melody Flows Out

The work itself is Mahler's most genial as one melody flows out of another in an endless procession. Now they are long-flowing strains of the most sensuous character, again they are almost lugubrious, as in the [illegible] now they reflect the [illegible] simplicity of the peasant air, again they suggest Viennese gemuthlichkeit.

The scherzo is particularly interesting for the use in it of two violins for the first violinist. Thus Mr. Krips had deployed on a chair in front of him his usual instrument conventionally tuned while he played another tuned a whole tone higher. This is known as "scordatura," and it is an ancient device though not often employed today. Saint Saens does it in "Danse Macabre" and it appears also in works by Stravinsky and Strauss. In Mahler's case, as in Saint Saens' it lends the quaint rustic quality of the country fiddler.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 18 with Pierre Monteux the guest conductor. Mr. Monteux will do Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite, scenes instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

franco amerique

20 Janvier 1957

RICHARD BURGIN dirige le "Boston Symphony"

EST-CE parce que c'est l'Année Lafayette? Ou un rappel discret aux politiciens? Toujours est-il que la musique française figure en bonne place, à Boston, dans de nombreux concerts ces derniers temps, sans parler de deux pièces de théâtre qui remportent un immense succès: Fanny, inspiré de Pagnol, et une version "anglicisée" de La Valse des Toréadors, de Jean Anouilh.

En l'absence de Charles Münch, actuellement en France, Richard Burgin a dirigé un tour d'horizon musical qui l'a fait aller de Bach — dans un arrangement de Charles Münch — à Mahler en passant par... Honegger, Debussy et Ravel. C'est devenu une tradition à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston de commencer la première série de concerts de l'année avec le Prélude et Choral "Das Alte Jahr vergangen ist" (dont les paroles auraient aussi bien pu être écrites aujourd'hui qu'il y a près de quatre siècles: "Nous Te remercions, Seigneur Jésus, de nous avoir protégés d'un si grand danger tout au long de la longue année..."). L'arrangement orchestral qu'en a fait Charles Münch montre qu'il a touché l'orgue dans sa jeunesse et qu'il connaît à fond cet instrument et celui, tout aussi compliqué, qu'est un orchestre.

Le mouvement symphonique "Rugby" a été écrit par Honegger en 1928, à l'âge de 36 ans, cinq ans après son "Pacific 231" et cherche à exprimer musicalement "les assauts et contre-assauts, le rythme et la couleur d'un match (de rugby) au Stade de Colombes." Et, à ce point de vue, nous sommes bien servis; même sans percussion — en contraste avec "Pacific", qui en avait beaucoup — on entend l'enthousiasme de la foule, on "voit" les passes savantes des joueurs, on se "sent" envahi par l'air froid des gradins et la chaleur intérieure de la victoire. Honegger a, toutefois, écrit de la meilleure musique, avant et après "Rugby".

Les "Rondes de Printemps" de Claude Debussy sont d'un tout autre genre, musique éthérée et abstraite, tout "en couleurs et en rythmes" dans laquelle passe à chaque instant ce motif emprunté au Mai florentin: "Vive le Mai, bienvenu soit le Mai avec son gonfalon sauvage".

Un des thèmes de ces "Rondes" est le populaire "Nous n'irons plus au bois...", sculpté, ciselé pour notre plaisir. Dommage que l'exécution en ait été plutôt plate: une excellente lecture, sans interprétation.

La Pavane et l'Alborado sont des pièces pleines d'une grâce que seul Ravel savait exprimer avec autant d'élégance. Bien que moins difficiles à interpréter que Debussy, il nous a semblé que l'orchestre manquait de brillant: les solistes étaient excellents, par contre, et ont bien mérité les applaudissements qui leur furent prodigués.

Dans la Symphonie n° 4 de Gustav Mahler, M. Richard Burgin est plus à l'aise, davantage dans son élément, peut-être à cause de sa formation germanique. Il nous a donné de cette oeuvre majeure une interprétation fouillée, bien comprise, à laquelle Mlle Nancy Carr prêtait son beau soprano.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 5 - 1957

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Burgin Leads Mahler Fourth

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 11th program of the Friday-Saturday series. Richard Burgin, associate conductor, presented: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (arranged by Charles Munch); Honegger: "Rugby," Symphonic Movement; Debussy: "Rondes de Printemps" ("Image" No. 3); Ravel: "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," Alborada del gracioso; Mahler: Symphony No. 4 in G major (soloist: Nancy Carr, soprano).

By CYRUS DURGIN

Thanks to Richard Burgin, we are enjoying at the Boston Symphony concerts this week the only music by Gustav Mahler that we are likely to have there all season. Mr. Burgin leads again the Fourth Symphony, a work of which, evidently, he is very fond, and one which brings out his finest attributes as conductor.

Since this is a very beautiful Symphony, indeed, we are much in Mr. Burgin's debt.

Having always in mind, when Mahler is played, some of the old public prejudice against his often very long scores, it was bracing yesterday to hear a good deal of favorable lobby comment. While this is not evidence enough to warrant assumption that the tide has turned strongly in Mahler's favor, it has its own significance. It must mean that the public at last has seen the light which shines in the tissues of song which are Mahler's music.

The G major Symphony is all song, all radiance, shunning the turbulence which racked Mahler's inner spirit much of the time, and free of the dark moods which so often must have tortured him. In the G major, also, are steady motion and a fascinating undulation of rhythms, gentle and strong. In short, a Symphony which touches the milder emotions, and is delight all the way.

It was played superbly, and conducted with genuine mastery. The vocal soloist for the fourth movement was Nancy Carr, a young Ohio-born soprano who, says the record, has appeared here only once before, in Brahms' Requiem during the Boston Arts Festival of 1955. She has a gorgeous voice, of a somewhat — and peculiarly — "dark" color. Miss Carr may have been nervous at the outset, yesterday, for she failed to summon much resonance in the first two stanzas. Thereafter, things went better. She sang, too, with the childlike naivete which is so important to the veracious expression of this fanciful description of all the goodies in Heaven.

A Curious Assemblage

The first half of the program was a curious assemblage of five relatively short pieces, starting with the Munch orchestration of the Bach Chorale and Chorale Prelude, "The Old Year Is Past," which, by pleasant custom, has been played at the first concerts of every new year since 1952.

None of these pieces had much relation to its fellows, and you might have thought they had been chosen by lot. But individually they are good pieces, and yesterday they were all played to the nines. Up to a point this was a selection of "first chair" pieces, for Mr. Burgin singled out for merited solo bows Mr. Stagliano, for his horn playing in Ravel's Pavane, and Mr. Walt for his bassoon work in the Alborada del gracioso.

Honegger's "Rugby" evidently had been kept on the Symphony's library shelf since its Boston premiere, under the composer's baton, in 1929. Little wonder. "Rugby" seems old-fashioned today, abstract and mechanistic, even when considered in the light of the composer's intent to express, in a nonprogrammatic way, "the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game." Honegger wrote much better music later in his life. Indeed, after the rush of opposing rhythms in "Rugby," and the clashes of his wild dissonance, it is almost amusing to hear the piece end upon a tonic chord.

Next week the Orchestra goes again to New York. Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor at the Symphony Hall concerts of Jan. 18 and 19, in Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Ballet Suite; instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

Burgin Conducts Mahler's Fourth

Nancy Carr Acclaimed as Soprano Soloist

By Harold Rogers

With but little imagination one could hear, ringing through the bars of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, the laughter of childhood, the sounds of games and the guileless songs that go with them, the skipping of children inspired by spontaneous joy. It is remarkable how Mahler infused so much childlike wonderment into a work lasting almost an hour, and sustaining, with but few lapses, his own and his listeners' interest through his flow of ingenuous melody, his musical skies flooded with limpid sunshine.

The man who conducts the Mahler Fourth, it goes without saying, should be sympathetic and kindly; and it was obvious yesterday afternoon that Richard Burgin poured a heart full of love into this performance. He is the Mahler champion in New England, though Mahler need be championed no longer. If we can't hear Mahler more often, at least we can hear him about once a season when Mr. Burgin has his turn on the podium. His performance yesterday was superb.

And not only to Mr. Burgin go the honors, but also to Nancy Carr, a soprano whose opulent, lucid, and artistic singing in the final movement was true to the smile of the poetry. "So delightful are the joys of Heaven," she sang, that "we have no need of earthly ones"!

Formerly of Chicago (where she was often starred on the Chicago Theater of the Air), Miss Carr now lives in Boston. We hope this debut with the Boston Symphony will mark the beginning of an active musical life for her in this community.

Mr. Burgin has chosen a fascinating program for the Symphony Hall concerts this weekend. Four composers are represented on the first half (with Mahler, of course, taking up the last half). Yesterday he led with Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," as arranged by Charles Munch. His reading was sturdy and forthright, yet appropriately religioso.

Then came Honegger's one-movement piece called "Rugby," the meaning of which is obvious. This was a companion to "Pacific 231," the meaning of which is less obvious until the music is heard, at which time one has no doubt a locomotive is involved. The "Rugby" music is less explicit, but it is obviously sinuous and athletic. It is an entertaining reminiscence from the composer's young and clever days, before he became the leading French symphonist of this century.

Mr. Burgin continued with Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," as lovely a little idyll as one could wish for, and he then turned to Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," the sweet nostalgia of which is about all that supports the title.

But this decorous respite lasted no longer than the pavane itself, for Mr. Burgin launched into the flashingly arresting rhythms of Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," a superb example of the composer's talent in handling the orchestra brilliantly.

It was a program of great variety, with the ebullience of childhood, youth, games, dancing, and song prevailing. It gave us Mr. Burgin at his best.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 5 - 1957

Music

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 11th program of the 75th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Nancy Carr, soprano. The program:

"The Old Year Is Past" ..... Bach
"Rugby" ..... Honegger
"Rondes de printemps" ..... Debussy
"Pavane;" "Alborado del gracioso" Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in G ..... Mahler

Richard Burgin's second appearance as associate conductor of the season found him offering an unusual and, by and large, save for the Mahler Symphony, a not very successful program.

It's the first time in a good many years five different works have been given before the intermission and it is not too wise a move, at least if yesterday's experience may be considered typical of such an occasion. The Bach chorale prelude was, to be sure, a gesture to the season and a pleasant one in Mr. Munch's simple transcription for orchestra. The other four just didn't go well together.

Tame to Ear

Honegger's "Rugby," a piece in which the composer sought to "express the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game, the rhythm and color of a match in the stadium," has not been heard here since 1929. It is an interesting essay and one that in 1929 was probably found harsh, dissonant and aggressive. Today its textures are relatively tame to the ear, and the work does not have the impact one expects of it. It may be because the same composer's "Pacific 2-3-1" has so much, and while there is little point in comparing the two pieces, one familiar with "Pacific" is bound to be let down by "Rugby."

Debussy's "[illegible] temps," in its first [illegible] here since 1923, is also something of a let-down. It suggests this and that in other works of Debussy and the orchestral textures are typical impressionistic, but it is a weak and tenuous composition, interesting only for the infrequency of its performance.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunt," is charming in its antique gravity, but it was left for the same composer's "Alborado del gracioso" to restore the sense of fulfillment to the concert. Mr. Burgin sought out its fiery Spanish rhythms and colorations vividly and the beautiful recitative for solo bassoon in the inner section gave us a chance to realize how superb an instrumentalist Sherman Walt, the orchestra's first bassoonist, is. He produces the finest tone quality on this instrument I have ever heard.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony, long one of Mr. Burgin's favorites, introduced a distinguished soprano soloist in Nancy Carr, making her first appearance here. Tall, slim, attractive, Miss Carr's traversal of the exquisite last movement was exceedingly tasteful. Her voice is a little on the light side but it is well produced and has a clear, silvery quality that becomes the role. She was warmly received by the audience, which was obviously enchanted by the touching naivete of the closing movement.

Melody Flows Out

The work itself is Mahler's most genial as one melody flows out of another in an endless procession. Now they are long-flowing strains of the most sensuous character, again they [illegible] most lugubrious, as in the [illegible] they reflect the [illegible] simplicity of the peasant air, again they suggest Viennese gemutlichkeit. [illegible]

The scherzo is particularly interesting for the use in it of two violins for the first violinist. Thus Mr. Krips had deployed on a chair in front of him his usual instrument conventionally tuned while he played another tuned a whole tone higher. This is known as "scordatura," and it is an ancient device though not often employed today. Saint Saens does it in "Danse Macabre" and it appears also in works by Stravinsky and Strauss. In Mahler's case, as in Saint Saens' it lends the quaint rustic quality of the country fiddler.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 18 with Pierre Monteux the guest conductor. Mr. Monteux will do Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite, scenes instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 5 - 1957

EST-[illegible] Lafayette? Ou [illegible] cret aux politiciens? Toujours est-il que la musique française figure en bonne place, à Boston, dans de nombreux concerts ces derniers temps, sans parler de deux pièces de théâtre qui remportent un immense succès: Fanny, inspiré de Pagnol, et une version "anglicisée" de La Valse des Toréadors, de Jean Anouilh.

En l'absence de Charles Münch, actuellement en France, Richard Burgin a dirigé un tour d'horizon musical qui l'a fait aller de Bach — dans un arrangement de Charles Münch — à Mahler en passant par... Honegger, Debussy et Ravel. C'est devenu une tradition à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston de commencer la première série de concerts de l'année avec le Prélude et Choral "Das Alte Jahr vergangen ist" (dont les paroles auraient aussi bien pu être écrites aujourd'hui qu'il y a près de quatre siècles: "Nous Te remercions, Seigneur Jésus, de nous avoir protégés d'un si grand danger tout au long de la longue année..."). L'arrangement orchestral qu'en a fait Charles Münch montre qu'il a touché l'orgue dans sa jeunesse et qu'il connaît à fond cet instrument et celui, tout aussi compliqué, qu'est un orchestre.

Le mouvement symphonique "Rugby" a été écrit par Honegger en 1928, à l'âge de 36 ans, cinq ans après son "Pacific 231" et cherche à exprimer musicalement "les assauts et contre-assauts, le rythme et la couleur d'un match (de rugby) au Stade de Colombes." Et, à ce point de vue, nous sommes bien servis; même sans percussion — en contraste avec "Pacific", qui en avait beaucoup — on entend l'enthousiasme de la foule, on "voit" les passes savantes des joueurs, on se "sent" envahi par l'air froid des gradins et la chaleur intérieure de la victoire. Honegger a, toutefois, écrit de la meilleure musique, avant et après "Rugby".

Les "Rondes de Printemps" de Claude Debussy sont d'un tout autre genre, musique éthérée et abstraite, tout "en couleurs et en rythmes" dans laquelle passe à chaque instant ce motif emprunté au Mai florentin: "Vive le Mai, bienvenu soit le Mai avec son gonfalon sauvage".

Un des thèmes de ces "Rondes" est le populaire "Nous n'irons plus au bois...", sculpté, ciselé pour notre plaisir. Dommage que l'exécution en ait été plutôt plate: une excellente lecture, sans interprétation.

La Pavane et l'Alborado sont des pièces pleines d'une grâce que seul Ravel savait exprimer avec autant d'élégance. Bien que moins difficiles à interpréter que Debussy, il nous a semblé que l'orchestre manquait de brillant: les solistes étaient excellents, par contre, et ont bien mérité les applaudissements qui leur furent prodigués.

Dans la Symphonie n° 4 de Gustav Mahler, M. Richard Burgin est plus à l'aise, davantage dans son élément, peut-être à cause de sa formation germanique. Il nous a donné de cette oeuvre majeure une interprétation fouillée, bien comprise, à laquelle Mlle Nancy Carr prêtait son beau soprano.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Burgin Leads Mahler Fourth

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 11th program of the Friday-Saturday series. Richard Burgin, associate conductor, presented: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (arranged by Charles Munch); Honegger: "Rugby," Symphonic Movement; Debussy: "Rondes de Printemps" ("Image" No. 3); Ravel: "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," Alborada del gracioso; Mahler: Symphony No. 4, in G major (soloist: Nancy Carr, soprano).

By CYRUS DURGIN

Thanks to Richard Burgin, we are enjoying at the Boston Symphony concerts this week the only music by Gustav Mahler that we are likely to have there all season. Mr. Burgin leads again the Fourth Symphony, a work of which, evidently, he is very fond, and one which brings out his finest attributes as conductor.

Since this is a very beautiful Symphony, indeed, we are much in Mr. Burgin's debt.

Having always in mind, when Mahler is played, some of the old public prejudice against his often very long scores, it was bracing yesterday to hear a good deal of favorable lobby comment. While this is not evidence enough to warrant assumption that the tide has turned strongly in Mahler's favor, it has its own significance. It must mean that the public at last has seen the light which shines in the tissues of song which are Mahler's music.

The G major Symphony is all song, all radiance, shunning the turbulence which racked Mahler's inner spirit much of the time, and free of the dark moods which so often must have tortured him. In the G major, also, are steady motion and a fascinating undulation of rhythms, gentle and strong. In short, a Symphony which touches the milder emotions, and is delight all the way.

It was played superbly, and conducted with genuine mastery. The vocal soloist for the fourth movement was Nancy Carr, a young Ohio-born soprano who, says the record, has appeared here only once before, in Brahms' Requiem during the Boston Arts Festival of 1955. She has a gorgeous voice, of a somewhat — and peculiarly — "dark" color. Miss Carr may have been nervous at the outset, yesterday, for she failed to summon much resonance in the first two stanzas. Thereafter, things went better. She sang, too, with the childlike naivete which is so important to the veracious expression of this fanciful description of all the goodies in Heaven.

A Curious Assemblage

The first half of the program was a curious assemblage of five relatively short pieces, starting with the Munch orchestration of the Bach Chorale and Chorale Prelude, "The Old Year Is Past," which, by pleasant custom, has been played at the first concerts of every new year since 1[illegible].

None of these pieces had much relation to its fellows, and you might have thought they had been chosen by lot. But individually they are good pieces, and yesterday they were all played to the nines. Up to a point this was a selection of "first chair" pieces, for Mr. Burgin singled out for merited solo bows Mr. Stagliano, for his horn playing in Ravel's Pavane, and Mr. Walt for his bassoon work in the Alborada del gracioso.

Honegger's "Rugby" evidently had been kept on the Symphony's library shelf since its Boston premiere, under the composer's baton, in 1929. Little wonder. "Rugby" seems old-fashioned today, abstract and mechanistic, even when considered in the light of the composer's intent to express, in a non-programmatic way, "the thrusts and counter-thrusts of the game." Honegger wrote much better music later in his life. Indeed, after the rush of opposing rhythms in "Rugby," and the clashes of his wild dissonance, it is almost amusing to hear the piece end upon a tonic chord.

Next week the Orchestra goes again to New York. Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor at the Symphony Hall concerts of Jan. 18 and 19, in Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Ballet Suite; instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

TIGHT BINDING

178

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN - 6 1957

Are Symphony Programs Now at a Low Ebb?

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A correspondent, noting that I have lately been suggesting that the programs of the Boston Symphony are not all that they might be (which is putting it mildly), asks me what I would do if I had any part in the making of programs. The first thing I would do is exactly what the program makers at Symphony Hall now do: ignore the suggestions of amateur program makers like myself. Nonetheless, having looked pretty thoroughly into the matter, I am of the opinion that a great deal could be done to present more interesting programs than are the rule today, and still place the emphasis on the standard repertoire, which is to say no one would be deprived of the regular fare of Beethoven, Brahams and so on.

As I have had occasion to point out before, program making is a fine art and one besetting the program maker with many difficulties. There are all manner of complications. There is first of all the choice of the principal work, the meat and potatoes of the occasion so to speak. This would generally be a symphony of large dimensions and of established character, say a symphony by Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky and so on, though it might be an extended work by almost any one.

Mr. Munch himself, in his exceedingly interesting "I Am a Conductor," says that the "big" symphony should be preceded first by a classical symphony, a baroque concerto or an overtone and then by a "difficult" or a contemporary work such as a new symphony.

"First," he continues, "we prepare the terrain and sharpen the receptivity. Then we can try to make the public love music whose tartness may still be disturbing. Finally, the classical, rich and solid, relaxes the atmosphere." All in all, he says, a program should not offer much more than 75 minutes of music "if you do not want to hear the rustling of inattention behind you."

Such matters as the choice of key is important in program making. Two works in B flat should not be programmed side by side, for example. The question of time is also obviously important, and the choice of 75 minutes of music brings up many a difficulty in time alone. The national character of the music—French, German, etc.—is important too. And, not least, the disposition of the musical forces is a big factor. The programming of Schoenberg's "Gurrilleder," for instance, or Mahler's Eighth means a vast increase in the personnel as well as a gigantic choral assembly.

Obtaining unusual scores not in the orchestra's library is often a problem while the question of rentals and royalties may also be mentioned, as may problems in rehearsal time and so on. So the life of the program maker is not easy and he is more than likely to be criticized by someone no matter what he does.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET

Yet I feel there is considerable room for improvement in view of the fact so many works have been overlooked, neglected and forgotten. It is no less than 59 years, for example, since Beethoven's Triple Concerto for violin, piano and orchestra has been performed at these concerts. There are those who deem it an inferior work and perhaps true, but it is never less a beautiful work and serves a hearing. Why not with the Trieste Trio or a outstanding chamber group

Twenty years or so Mitropoulos did Beethoven sharp minor Quartet for string orchestra. It was a ning experience. Why no peat that?

The name of Delius ever appears on these prog and while this English poser's music is generally s in character it is well wo occasional performance. C Bach composed two symp and there is a Sinfonia brother, J. C. Bach. They surely make charming pr openers, but then so wou Handel Concerto Gross well as those by Corelli golesi (the lovely F minor certino, for instance) and of the Italian baroque, they rarely appear on ou grams.

The earlier symphoni Haydn are remarkable fo ingenuity and freshness. S are the numberless mentos, cassations and fonias concertante of Mo various forms. Two or have been done recently, sure, but certainly this is for exploration.

MORE REVIVALS

Equally worthy of exploration, too, are such forgotten composers as Dittersdorf, Clementi and Spohr. Dittersdorf's "Rescue" Symphony is perfectly charming, as is Clementi's D major Symphony. And might it not be amusing to hear Spohr's Double Symphony for Two orchestras? Then there's Weber, who wrote two symphonies. Has anyone ever heard them?

Also neglected in the city he chose as his home is Martin Loeffler. His "Pagan Poem" is decidedly worth an occasional airing. Rachmaninoff's Second and Third symphonies do not

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

JAN 6 1957

BURGIN ON PODIUM

Concertmaster in Boston for 36 Years Will Conduct the Orchestra This Week

By JOHN BRIGGS

RICHARD BURGIN, for thirty-six years a familiar figure in the concertmaster's chair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make one of his occasional appearances as its conductor when the orchestra plays at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

The transition from playing to conducting is one that has been made by a number of concertmasters, including Eugene Ormandy and Alexander Hilsberg. The concertmaster is in fact an assistant conductor, one of his duties in most orchestras being that of rehearsing the string section.

In Mr. Burgin's case, according to knowledgeable music circles, the concertmaster's function also included that of diplomat, interpreter and peacemaker.

Such was the impact, in the early days, of the late Serge Koussevitzky upon the Boston Symphony, and vice versa, that the whole enterprise was in danger of flying apart from sheer centrifugal force.

Sparks Flew

He also pointed out that over the years orchestra and conductor had come to know each other, and had learned to work together.

"Close association brings the best results," Mr. Burgin observed. "That is true of anything from a string quartet on up. An orchestra with a constant turnover of conductors is like a football team with a new head coach every year. An orchestra plays best, and develops its own personality best, when it plays under the same conductor and has little change in personnel. In Boston we have averaged—let me see—perhaps five or six weeks of guest conductors out of a thirty-week season. The rest of the time, it has been the regular conductor — Dr. Koussevitzky and his very able successor, Charles Munch."

Same Face

Mr. Burgin was reminded that one school of thought maintains that conductors should be changed frequently, on the theory that the public grows tired of looking at the same face—

So generally is this fa known, Mr. Burgin says, th most experienced guest condu tors don't waste time on chang in a standard repertory wo unless they regard the chang as of life-or-death importance.

A native of Warsaw, Mr. B gin studied in Berlin with Jose Joachim, and in St. Petersbu with Leopold Auer. He was co certmaster of the symphony chestras of St. Petersburg, H sinki, Christiania and Stockho before joining the Boston Sy phony in 1920. He doesn't kn whether the length of his tenu in Boston has been matched anyone else. Certainly the rec is not matched by the conc master of any other

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)

FEB 1957

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, Jan. 9, E—The Boston Symphony presented a substantial program of three masterworks: Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, and the Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovitch.

Richard Burgin, an outstanding nonflamboyant type of musician and conductor, gave to the music of the various scores an impressive interpretive reading. The orchestra also gave its usual splendid exhibition of smooth and sophisticated playing throughout the evening.

The "Fantasia" was performed by the strings with a beautifully integrated singing tone, while the playing of the Beethoven Fifth was traditional. The Shostakovitch Fifth, a work of breadth, power, and gentleness, was executed with commendable zeal and a flair which brought out its many facets of color, lyricism, and brilliance.

L.C.

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

JAN - 6 1957

B. S. O. Instruments Challenge Brookline Youngsters

Giving out with the down beat of the kettledrum is Jimmy Kenland, 7, at the recent Brookline Youth Concert.

Globe Photos by Edison Farrand

Brookline youngsters are not only early introduced to classical and semi-classical music at the Youth Concerts, but learn about the instruments of an orchestra. Kathleen MacAdam, 11, is dwarfed by the cello which B. S. O. player Martin Hoherman is explaining to her.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE, JANUARY 6, 1957

Ricky Frank, 4, tries out a French horn with the help of Harry Shapiro, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, prior to the second Brookline Youth Concert of the seventh season at the Roberts Auditorium in Brookline High School.

Richard Ratzkoff, 8, gets the 'feel' of a violin under the watchful eye of Sheldon Rotenberg of the Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 258,604
JAN - 6 1957

Are Symphony Programs Now at a Low Ebb?

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A correspondent, noting that I have lately been suggesting that the programs of the Boston Symphony are not all that they might be (which is putting it mildly), asks me what I would do if I had any part in the making of programs. The first thing I would do is exactly what the program makers at Symphony Hall now do: ignore the suggestions of amateur program makers like myself. Nonetheless, having looked pretty thoroughly into the matter, I am of the opinion that a great deal could be done to present more interesting programs than are the rule today, and still place the emphasis on the standard repertoire, which is to say no one would be deprived of the regular fare of Beethoven, Brahams and so on.

As I have had occasion to point out before, program making is a fine art and one besetting the program maker with many difficulties. There are all manner of complications. There is first of all the choice of the principal work, the meat and potatoes of the occasion so to speak. This would generally be a symphony of large dimensions and of established character, say a symphony by Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky and so on, though it might be an extended work by almost any one.

Mr. Munch himself, in his exceedingly interesting "I Am a Conductor," says that the "big" symphony should be preceded first by a classical symphony, a baroque concerto or an overtone and then by a "difficult" or a contemporary work such as a new symphony.

"First," he continues, "we prepare the terrain and sharpen the receptivity. Then we can try to make the public love music whose tartness may still be disturbing. Finally, the classical, rich and solid, relaxes the atmosphere." All in all, he says, a program should not offer much more than 75 minutes of music "if you do not want to hear the rustling of inattention behind you."

Such matters as the choice of key is important in program making. Two works in B flat should not be programmed side by side, for example. The question of time is also obviously important, and the choice of 75 minutes of music brings up many a difficulty in time alone. The national character of the music—French, German, etc.—is important too. And, not least, the disposition of the musical forces is a big factor. The programming of Schoenberg's "Gurrilleder," for instance, or Mahler's Eighth means a vast increase in the personnel as well as a gigantic choral assembly.

Obtaining unusual scores not in the orchestra's library is often a problem while the question of rentals and royalties may also be mentioned, as may problems of rehearsal time and so on. So the life of the program maker is not easy and he is more than likely to be criticized by someone no matter what he does.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET

Yet I feel there is considerable room for improvement in view of the fact so many works have been overlooked, neglected and forgotten. It is no less than 59 years, for example, since Beethoven's Triple Concerto for violin, piano and orchestra has been performed at these concerts. There are those who deem it an inferior work and it is perhaps true, but it is nevertheless a beautiful work and it deserves a hearing. Why not do it with the Trieste Trio or another outstanding chamber group?

Twenty years or so ago Mitropoulos did Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet for full string orchestra. It was a stunning experience. Why not repeat that?

The name of Delius hardly ever appears on these programs, and while this English composer's music is generally special in character it is well worth an occasional performance. C. P. E. Bach composed two symphonies and there is a Sinfonia by his brother, J. C. Bach. They would surely make charming program openers, but then so would the Handel Concerto Grossos as well as those by Corelli. Pergolesi (the lovely F minor Concertino, for instance) and others of the Italian baroque, yet they rarely appear on our programs.

The earlier symphonies of Haydn are remarkable for their ingenuity and freshness. So, too, are the numberless divertimentos, cassations and sinfonias concertante of Mozart in various forms. Two or three have been done recently, to be sure, but certainly this is a field for exploration.

MORE REVIVALS

Equally worthy of exploration, too, are such forgotten composers as Dittersdorf, Clementi and Spohr. Dittersdorf's "Rescue" Symphony is perfectly charming, as is Clementi's D major Symphony. And might it not be amusing to hear Spohr's Double Symphony for Two orchestras? Then there's Weber, who wrote two symphonies. Has anyone ever heard them?

Also neglected in the city he chose as his home is Martin Loeffler. His "Pagan Poem" is decidedly worth an occasional airing. Rachmaninoff's Second and Third symphonies do not deserve obscurity, nor do the Brahms' Serenades. Surely, among the works of our own composers of an earlier generation, Paine, Converse, Hill and Foote, there are worthy representatives also.

Among other neglected works, Suk's Serenade for Strings, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart, Rimsky Korsakoff's Suite from "The Tales of the Tsar Saltan," Bloch's Concerto Grosso, Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Glazounov's Symphony No. 7, D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air and Holst's "The Planets." And it would be possible for Mr. Munch to arrange for the preparation of a suite from Dukas' "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu"? Such a work may already exist. In any case, this opera was considered at the time as remarkable as Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande."

A good many revivals of fairly recent works are in order too, it seems to me. Copland's "Appalachian Spring," for one, but there are many outstanding new works ready for re-hearing. And it may also be said that this orchestra's tradition for playing new music is dimming in recent years.

In short, from my point of view, with the orchestra at its very peak today, its programs are at a low ebb. I see no reason why it should be so.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
JAN 6 1957

BURGIN ON PODIUM

Concertmaster in Boston for 36 Years Will Conduct the Orchestra This Week

By JOHN BRIGGS

RICHARD BURGIN, for thirty-six years a familiar figure in the concertmaster's chair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make one of his occasional appearances as its conductor when the orchestra plays at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

The transition from playing to conducting is one that has been made by a number of concertmasters, including Eugene Ormandy and Alexander Hilsberg. The concertmaster is in fact an assistant conductor, one of his duties in most orchestras being that of rehearsing the string section.

In Mr. Burgin's case, according to knowledgeable music circles, the concertmaster's function also included that of diplomat, interpreter and peacemaker.

Such was the impact, in the early days, of the late Serge Koussevitzky upon the Boston Symphony, and vice versa, that the whole enterprise was in danger of flying apart from sheer centrifugal force.

Sparks Flew

Koussevitzky, legend says, was a genius but not a conducting technician. He knew what he wanted from the orchestra, and screamed until he got it. Inevitably, sparks flew at rehearsals, and feelings were hurt.

It was tactful Concertmaster Burgin who served as go-between for conductor and orchestra, soothing bruised egos and explaining that when Koussevitzky asked for pianissimo, he really meant a loud pianissimo.

When Mr. Burgin was questioned about this tale, he proved his reputation for diplomacy.

"Such things are part of the concertmaster's job," Mr. Burgin said. "I am not a mind reader, but I happened to be personally rather close to Dr. Koussevitzky."

He also pointed out that over the years orchestra and conductor had come to know each other, and had learned to work together.

"Close association brings the best results," Mr. Burgin observed. "That is true of anything from a string quartet on up. An orchestra with a constant turnover of conductors is like a football team with a new head coach every year. An orchestra plays best, and develops its own personality best, when it plays under the same conductor and has little change in personnel. In Boston we have averaged—let me see—perhaps five or six weeks of guest conductors out of a thirty-week season. The rest of the time, it has been the regular conductor — Dr. Koussevitzky and his very able successor, Charles Munch."

Same Face

Mr. Burgin was reminded that one school of thought maintains that conductors should be changed frequently, on the theory that the public grows tired of looking at the same face—or rather, the back of the same head—week after week.

"If that is so," Mr. Burgin replied tartly, "the audience is looking too much, instead of listening."

As for the players themselves, they view the arrival of a guest conductor with little enthusiasm.

"A first-rate orchestra will adapt itself to any conductor," Mr. Burgin said, "but it takes time. Especially difficult is playing with the new man a piece which you have already learned with the regular conductor. It is like being an actor in a Shakespearean play. You have learned your lines under one director. Now another director wants you to speak the lines differently."

So generally is this fact known, Mr. Burgin says, that most experienced guest conductors don't waste time on changes in a standard repertory work unless they regard the changes as of life-or-death importance.

A native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin studied in Berlin with Joseph Joachim, and in St. Petersburg, with Leopold Auer. He was concertmaster of the symphony orchestras of St. Petersburg, Helsinki, Christiania and Stockholm before joining the Boston Symphony in 1920. He doesn't know whether the length of his tenure in Boston has been matched by anyone else. Certainly the record is not matched by the concertmaster of any other major orchestra in the East.

First Performances

Mr. Burgin's wife is Ruth Posselt, a native of Medford, Mass., who is also a fine violinist and has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony and other orchestras. With the Boston Symphony, Miss Posselt played first performances of violin concertos by Samuel Barber, Vladimir Dukelsky and Edward Burlingame Hill.

Mr. Burgin was asked whether he agreed with the old saying that every orchestra derives its personality from its conductor, that "there are no orchestras, only conductors."

Mr. Burgin was not amused. "That may be true to a limited extent," he said. "But it's the musicians who do the playing."

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
JAN - 6 1957

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, Jan. 9, E—The Boston Symphony presented a substantial program of three masterworks: Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, and the Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovitch.

Richard Burgin, an outstanding nonflamboyant type of musician and conductor, gave to the music of the various scores an impressive interpretive reading. The orchestra also gave its usual splendid exhibition of smooth and sophisticated playing throughout the evening.

The "Fantasia" was performed by the strings with a beautifully integrated singing tone, while the playing of the Beethoven Fifth was traditional. The Shostakovitch Fifth, a work of breadth, power, and gentleness, was executed with commendable zeal and a flair which brought out its many facets of color, lyricism, and brilliance.

L.C.

Joe Allison's Cargo of Fate

Continued From Page 24

to the rancho soon; so we take the packs down the hill, where no one can see. Then we hear the car coming back. It stop. Then it fall over the bank, roll down the hill and is all broken. Before we go on, we look at this machine. It is nothing much. But the driver did not fall with it. His tracks are in the dust of the road, going toward Cuyamac."

KANE scowled heavily over Luis' story. He could not believe that Allison would be riding in a car with Cultus Collins, but it was a story of the Yaqui's brain.

However, with all his cross-questioning, he was unable to shake the Yaqui's story, and it began to dawn upon him that everything was not just all right. If Allison was in that machine with Cultus Collins, it might behoove him to find out why, he thought.

Kane knew that Cultus Collins was dangerous. In fact, he was more dangerous than the revenue officers, because Cultus had no headquarters. He was always just where he was not expected to be.

So Jim Kane, in his own mind, decided that Collins was altogether too much bother, and that they had better stop him permanently. He dismissed the Yaqui, after getting him a bottle of tequila, and watched him bowleg his way out of the saloon.

Several men were at the bar and Kane joined them. One of them was a tinhorn gambler, who spent part of his time north of the line. He nodded affably to Kane, who joined them in a drink. "Just came in from Cuyamac."

"How's Cuyamac?" asked Kane indifferently.

"Dead as ever, Kane. Nothin' doin'. Why, I even seen a cow-puncher walk into town yesterday. That was a novelty. He had walked a long ways, too, by the looks of him."

Kane drank thoughtfully, paying little attention to the gambler's narrative, until the man said, "Somebody said his name was Collins and that he probably worked for the government."

Kane ordered another round of drinks before he asked, "What time of day was it when Collins came in?"

"I dunno just what time it was. Must have been about 10 or half past."

Kane nodded. It fitted in with the Yaqui's story. Cultus had dumped his machine over the grade and walked back to Cuyamac.

But what was Allison doing with Collins, he wondered. Was Allison playing crooked with them? The Rancho del Robledo was the receiving house for all their smuggling. It was from there that the stuff was sent north.

Kane had always considered Allison a weak-kneed sort of a person, but he had always played fair with him. If he had turned traitor, it would be reasonable to suppose that he might have shot Pablo and Diego. In fact, Pablo might have accused him of turning traitor. Or it might be that Allison had turned hijacker and wanted that big cargo for himself.

Kane spent the rest of the afternoon trying to plan out his next move. He realized that it was going to be difficult to get the Yaqui to tell where the cache had been made. The Yaqui was no fool, Kane decided. He knew he had the upper hand.

And Kane was aware that it behooved him to keep an eye on Luis. If anything happened to Luis, they could kiss fifty thousand dollars good-by, because no other person had any idea where the crafty Indian had hidden those five packs.

To Be Continued Next Week

Joe Allison's Sunday Painter

A few weeks ago we had a deal of interest a couple of primitive paintings displayed in the North Shore which were prisingly valuable.

It served to remind me paintings around the house deal of difficulty we had.

These were "early" paintings duced six or seven years Sunday painter.

The spasm lasted for a it was a lot of fun. We subjects became exhausted the whole field of art. people in action and portraits.

How it all began was afternoon we went to Casimer Shea, who was Boston schools, and told

He applauded the idea colors, but we insisted was a sincere and dedicated a block of paper and of five colors and said:

"Now you've got two brandt. Go ahead and P

That night we were

Well, about two weeks charming wife, Rose, c for a visit. He didn't c cause we showed him o

These oils were lik

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN - 6 1957

Are Symphony Programs Now at a Low Ebb?

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A correspondent, noting that I have lately been suggesting that the programs of the Boston Symphony are not all that they might be (which is putting it mildly), asks me what I would do if I had any part in the making of programs. The first thing I would do is exactly what the program makers at Symphony Hall now do: ignore the suggestions of amateur program makers like myself. Nonetheless, having looked pretty thoroughly into the matter, I am of the opinion that a great deal could be done to present more interesting programs than are the rule today, and still place the emphasis on the standard repertoire, which is to say no one would be deprived of the regular fare of Beethoven, Brahams and so on.

As I have had occasion to point out before, program making is a fine art and one besetting the program maker with many difficulties. There are all manner of complications. There is first of all the choice of the principal work, the meat and potatoes of the occasion so to speak. This would generally be a symphony of large dimensions and of established character, say a symphony by Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky and so on, though it might be an extended work by almost any one.

Mr. Munch himself, in his exceedingly interesting "I Am a Conductor," says that the "big" symphony should be preceded first by a classical symphony, a baroque concerto or an overtone and then by a "difficult" or a contemporary work such as a new symphony.

"First," he continues, "we prepare the terrain and sharpen the receptivity. Then we can try to make the public love music whose tartness may still be disturbing. Finally, the classical, rich and solid, relaxes the atmosphere." All in all, he says, a program should not offer much more than 75 minutes of music "if you do not want to hear the rustling of inattention behind you."

Such matters as the choice of key is important in program making. Two works in B flat should not be programmed side by side, for example. The question of time is also obviously important, and the choice of 75 minutes of music brings up many a difficulty in time alone. The national character of the music—French, German, etc.—is important too. And, not least, the disposition of the musical forces is a big factor. The programming of Schoenberg's "Gurrilieder," for instance, or Mahler's Eighth means a vast increase in the personnel as well as a gigantic choral assembly.

Obtaining unusual scores not in the orchestra's library is often a problem while the question of rentals and royalties may also be mentioned, as may problems in rehearsal time and so on. So the life of the program maker is not easy and he is more than likely to be criticized by someone no matter what he does.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET

Yet I feel there is considerable room for improvement in view of the fact so many works have been overlooked, neglected and forgotten. It is no less than 59 years, for example, since Beethoven's Triple Concerto for violin, piano and orchestra has been performed at these concerts. There are those who deem it an inferior work and it is perhaps true, but it is nevertheless a beautiful work and it deserves a hearing. Why not do it with the Trieste Trio or another outstanding chamber group?

Twenty years or so ago Mitropoulos did Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet for full string orchestra. It was a stunning experience. Why not repeat that?

The name of Delius hardly ever appears on these programs, and while this English composer's music is generally special in character it is well worth an occasional performance. C. P. E. Bach composed two symphonies and there is a Sinfonia by his brother, J. C. Bach. They would surely make charming program openers, but then so would the Handel Concerto Grossos as well as those by Corelli, Pergolesi (the lovely F minor Concertino, for instance) and others of the Italian baroque, yet they rarely appear on our programs.

The earlier symphonies of Haydn are remarkable for their ingenuity and freshness. So, too, are the numberless divertimentos, cassations and sinfonias concertante of Mozart in various forms. Two or three have been done recently, to be sure, but certainly this is a field for exploration.

MORE REVIVALS

Equally worthy of exploration, too, are such forgotten composers as Dittersdorf, Clementi and Spohr. Dittersdorf's "Rescue" Symphony is perfectly charming, as is Clementi's D major Symphony. And might it not be amusing to hear Spohr's Double Symphony for Two orchestras? Then there's Weber, who wrote two symphonies. Has anyone ever heard them?

Also neglected in the city he chose as his home is Martin Loeffler. His "Pagan Poem" is decidedly worth an occasional airing. Rachmaninoff's Second and Third symphonies do not deserve obscurity, nor do the Brahms' Serenades. Surely, among the works of our own composers of an earlier generation, Paine, Converse, Hill and Foote, there are worthy representatives also.

Among other neglected works, Suk's Serenade for Strings, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart, Rimsky Korsakoff's Suite from "The Tales of the Tsar Saltan," Bloch's Concerto Grosso, Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Glazounov's Symphony No. 7, D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air and Holst's "The Planets." And it would be possible for Mr. Munch to arrange for the preparation of a suite from Dukas' "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu"? Such a work may already exist. In any case, this opera was considered at the time as remarkable as Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande."

A good many revivals of fairly recent works are in order too, it seems to me. Copland's "Appalachian Spring," for one, but there are many outstanding new works ready for re-hearing. And it may also be said that this orchestra's tradition for playing new music is dimming in recent years.

In short, from my point of view, with the orchestra at its very peak today, its programs are at a low ebb. I see no reason why it should be so.

MUSICAL COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY)
FEB 1957

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, Jan. 9, E—The Boston Symphony presented a substantial program of three masterworks: Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, and the Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovitch.

Richard Burgin, an outstanding nonflamboyant type of musician and conductor, gave to the music of the various scores an impressive interpretive reading. The orchestra also gave its usual splendid exhibition of smooth and sophisticated playing throughout the evening.

The "Fantasia" was performed by the strings with a beautifully integrated singing tone, while the playing of the Beethoven Fifth was traditional. The Shostakovitch Fifth, a work of breadth, power, and gentleness, was executed with commendable zeal and a flair which brought out its many facets of color, lyricism, and brilliance.

L.C.

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544
JAN - 6 1957

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467
JAN 6 1957

BURGIN ON PODIUM

Concertmaster in Boston for 36 Years Will Conduct the Orchestra This Week

By JOHN BRIGGS

RICHARD BURGIN, for thirty-six years a familiar figure in the concertmaster's chair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make one of his occasional appearances as its conductor when the orchestra plays at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

The transition from playing to conducting is one that has been made by a number of concertmasters, including Eugene Ormandy and Alexander Hilsberg. The concertmaster is in fact an assistant conductor, one of his duties in most orchestras being that of rehearsing the string section.

In Mr. Burgin's case, according to knowledgeable music circles, the concertmaster's function also included that of diplomat, interpreter and peacemaker.

Such was the impact, in the early days, of the late Serge Koussevitzky upon the Boston Symphony, and vice versa, that the whole enterprise was in danger of flying apart from sheer centrifugal force.

Sparks Flew

Koussevitzky, legend says, was a genius but not a conducting technician. He knew what he wanted from the orchestra, and screamed until he got it. Inevitably, sparks flew at rehearsals, and feeelings were hurt.

It was tactful Concertmaster Burgin who served as go-between for conductor and orchestra, soothing bruised egos and explaining that when Koussevitzky asked for pianissimo, he really meant a loud pianissimo.

When Mr. Burgin was questioned about this tale, he proved his reputation for diplomacy.

"Such things are part of the concertmaster's job," Mr. Burgin said. "I am not a mind reader, but I happened to be personally rather close to Dr. Koussevitzy."

He also pointed out that over the years orchestra and conductor had come to know each other, and had learned to work together.

"Close association brings the best results," Mr. Burgin observed. "That is true of anything from a string quartet on up. An orchestra with a constant turnover of conductors is like a football team with a new head coach every year. An orchestra plays best, and develops its own personality best, when it plays under the same conductor and has little change in personnel. In Boston we have averaged—let me see—perhaps five or six weeks of guest conductors out of a thirty-week season. The rest of the time, it has been the regular conductor — Dr. Koussevitzky and his very able successor, Charles Munch."

Same Face

Mr. Burgin was reminded that one school of thought maintains that conductors should be changed frequently, on the theory that the public grows tired of looking at the same face—or rather, the back of the same head—week after week.

"If that is so," Mr. Burgin replied tartly, "the audience is looking too much, instead of listening."

As for the players themselves, they view the arrival of a guest conductor with little enthusiasm.

"A first-rate orchestra will adapt itself to any conductor," Mr. Burgin said, "but it takes time. Especially difficult is playing with the new man a piece which you have already learned with the regular conductor. It is like being an actor in a Shakespearean play. You have learned your lines under one director. Now another director wants you to speak the lines differently."

So generally is this fact known, Mr. Burgin says, that most experienced guest conductors don't waste time on changes in a standard repertory work unless they regard the changes as of life-or-death importance.

A native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin studied in Berlin with Joseph Joachim, and in St. Petersburg, with Leopold Auer. He was concertmaster of the symphony orchestras of St. Petersburg, Helsinki, Christiania and Stockholm before joining the Boston Symphony in 1920. He doesn't know whether the length of his tenure in Boston has been matched by anyone else. Certainly the record is not matched by the concertmaster of any other major orchestra in the East.

First Performances

Mr. Burgin's wife is Ruth Posselt, a native of Medford, Mass., who is also a fine violinist and has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony and other orchestras. With the Boston Symphony, Miss Posselt played first performances of violin concertos by Samuel Barber, Vladimir Dukelsky and Edward Burlingame Hill.

Mr. Burgin was asked whether he agreed with the old saying that every orchestra derives its personality from its conductor, that "there are no orchestras, only conductors."

Mr. Burgin was not amused. "That may be true to a limited extent," he said. "But it's the musicians who do the playing."

Cargo of Fate

Continued From Page 24

to the rancho soon; so we take the packs down the hill, where no one can see. Then we hear the car coming back. It stop. Then it fall over the bank, roll down the hill and is all broken. Before we go on, we look at this machine. It is nothing much. But the driver did not fall with it. His tracks are in the dust of the road, going toward Cuyamac."

KANE scowled heavily over Luis' story. He could not believe that Allison would be riding in a car with Cultus Collins, but it was a story of the Yaqui's brain.

However, with all his cross-questioning, he was unable to shake the Yaqui's story, and it began to dawn upon him that everything was not just all right. If Allison was in that machine with Cultus Collins, it might behoove him to find out why, he thought.

Kane knew that Cultus Collins was dangerous. In fact, he was more dangerous than the revenue officers, because Cultus had no headquarters. He was always just where he was not expected to be.

So Jim Kane, in his own mind, decided that Collins was altogether too much bother, and that they had better stop him permanently. He dismissed the Yaqui, after getting him a bottle of tequila, and watched him bowleg his way out of the saloon.

Several men were at the bar and Kane joined them. [illegible] was a linhorn named [illegible] part of his time north of the [illegible] He nodded affably to [illegible] joined them in a drink. [illegible] in from Cuyamac [illegible]

"How's Cuyamac, Kane? [illegible] indifferently.

"Dead as ever. [illegible] doin'. Why, I even seen a cougar puncher walk into town yesterday. That was a novelty. He had walked a long ways, too, by the looks of him."

Kane drank thoughtfully, paying little attention to the gambler's narrative, until the man said, "Somebody said his name was Collins and that he probably worked for the government.

Kane ordered another round of drinks before he asked, "What time of day was it when Collins came in?"

"I dunno just what time it was. Must have been about 10 or half past."

Kane nodded. It fitted in with the Yaqui's story. Cultus had dumped his machine over the grade and walked back to Cuyamac.

But what was Allison doing with Collins, he wondered. Was Allison playing crooked with them? The Rancho del Robledo was the receiving house for all their smuggling. It was from there that the stuff was sent north.

Kane had always considered Allison a weak-kneed sort of a person, but he had always played fair with him. If he had turned traitor, it would be reasonable to suppose that he might have shot Pablo and Diego. In fact, Pablo might have accused him of turning traitor. Or it might be that Allison had turned hijacker and wanted that big cargo for himself.

Kane spent the rest of the afternoon trying to plan out his next move. He realized that it was going to be difficult to get the Yaqui to tell where the cache had been made. The Yaqui was no fool. Kane decided. He knew he had the upper hand [illegible] Pablo was aware that it be- [illegible] but [illegible] on [illegible] the [illegible] observed [illegible] fully [illegible] Colinas [illegible] no [illegible] sea where [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] those [illegible]

To be Continued Next Week

A few weeks ago w[illegible] deal of interest a cou[illegible] primitive paintings dis[illegible] the North Shore which [illegible] prisingly valuable.

It served to remind [illegible] paintings around the h[illegible] deal of difficulty we lo[illegible]

These were "early" p[illegible] duced six or seven yea[illegible] Sunday painter.

The spasm lasted for [illegible] it was a lot of fun. W[illegible] subjects became exhaust[illegible] the whole field of art [illegible] people in action and po[illegible]

How it all began w[illegible] afternoon we went to [illegible] Capitan Shea, who was [illegible] Boston schools, and told [illegible]

He applauded the ide[illegible] colors [illegible] insisted [illegible] and dedic[illegible] a block [illegible] paper and [illegible] of five colors and said: "Now you've got two [illegible] brandt. Go ahead and p[illegible] That night we were [illegible]

Well, about two week[illegible] charming wife, Rose, ca[illegible] for a visit. He didn't e[illegible] cause we showed him o[illegible] These oils were like more (German on page 185 + pg 183 + Time mag.)

179

Day (e)
NEW LONDON, Conn.
Independent Republican
Circ. 24,020

JAN 9 - 1957

Boston Symphony Performs In College Concert Series

By HARRY R. HAZARD

Nothing unexpected turned up last night during the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Palmer Auditorium—third event in the current Connecticut College concert series. Under the able direction of Richard Burgin, its concert master for 36 years, the orchestra performed with its accustomed consummate skill and impeccable musicianship three works from the standard repertory — Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and, after intermission, Symphony No. Five, Op 47, by Shostakovitch.

Burgin's interpretive way with these pieces was, for the most part, thoroughly sound and straightforward, though hardly inspired. Missing from the evening's activity was that rare, electric quality of communication which characterized the recent appearance of William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Most satisfying to this listener was the reading of Vaughan Williams' great Fantasia. Scored for full string ensemble divided into a large and a small group plus a string quartet, this composition benefited vastly in performance by the wonderful string tone and articulation of the Boston. The pacing and dynamics were just. Had a bit more attention been given to projection of the inner voicing in places, the performance would have been outstanding.

Fifth Symphony

In contrast to the Thomas Tallis, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony, to quote B. H. Haggin, is most certainly "a fluent, slick and pretentiously arid" composition. Com-

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.

ORCHESTRAS in New York

Burgin Conducts Shostakovich Fifth

Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 9:

Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 ..... Shostakovich

An inspired performance of Shostakovich's magnificant Fifth Symphony, once of the indubitable masterpieces of 20th-century music, elicited cheers from the audience at this concert and applause from the Boston Symphony itself for the superb conducting of Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin has been concertmaster of the orchestra for many years, even decades, but he is still full of youthful ardor and imagination, whether at his desk with the first violins or on the podium. The men played for him as they used to play for Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance was something that few orchestras today could approach.

Of all major symphonists of our time, Shostakovich has wrested the richest heritage from Mahler and Bruckner, learning from the one his parodistic wit and clean, biting orchestral palette, and from the other his monumental architecture, coupled with majesty of spirit.

The performance of the noble Vaughan Williams piece brought out the sumptuous tone of the Boston strings as well as their fine taste. It was the acme of sensuous elegance, but never slick or sentimental. As for Beethoven's Fifth, the story is less happy, but, truth to tell, we are all tired to death of this great but all-too-familiar music, and we can scarcely blame the orchestra for nodding in it a bit, despite some superb playing, especially in the last movement.

—R. S.

Burgin Conducts Mahler

Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting. Nancy Carr, soprano. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 12:

"Rugby" ..... Honegger
"Rondes de printemps" ..... Debussy
"Pavane pour une Infante défunte"; "Alborada del gracioso" ..... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 ..... Mahler

Although [illegible] Burgin did nothing [illegible] to match his superb [illegible] of the Shostakovich [illegible] Wedn[illegible] nonetheless had prepared [illegible] program very skillfully [illegible] "Rugby", composed in 19[illegible] for the game, but [illegible] completely lackin[illegible] the spir[illegible] second [illegible] softness of footbal[illegible] along with more [illegible] than [illegible] herent buoyancy. But the orchestra warmed upon it happily and [illegible] gave an exquisite performance of Debussy's "Rondes de printemps," the third of the "Images" for orchestra.

Hymn to Demeter. In its first form, the role of Perséphone was mimed. [illegible] This work is the epitome of sensuous subtlety and emotional evocativeness, and it is hard to see why conductors neglect it, except that it must be played perfectly or it loses its perfume. The Ravel pieces also displayed the Boston Symphony winds and brasses in their full glory. What a priceless lesson in orchestration they afford us!

Mr. Burgin's conception of the Mahler Fourth was in a sense more French than Austrian. It did not have the rhapsodic freedom, the surging attacks, the uninhibited sentiment of a Bruno Walter performance. But in its cooler, more temperate way, it was curiously eloquent. The orchestra achieved some fabulously finished detail, and [illegible] Carr captured the quaint[illegible], the mystic wonder, and the rapture of the vocal part.—R. S.

Richard Burgin

the musical tradition of this as well as a good [illegible] countries he remains at best controversial. Even the redoubtable Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians is constrained to voice its aesthetic estimate of the man in much the same gingerly manner that newspapers report on, say, domestic religious tensions. Thus its appraisal of Mahler is made not by one but by two opposing critical anlyses. The first speaks to that view which dilates upon his excessive emotionalism, his unbearable length and turgidity, the disjointedness of his forms, his unrestrained impetuosity, the unsettled quality of his moods. The other, with whom this reviewer agrees, tends to find in Mahler a great evocation of the Viennese classical school through Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Bruckner. This side sees the simplicity and loveliness of his melodies, the breadth of his slow movements, the profusion of his unexpected usages in instrumentation, his exploitation of psychological nuances, the monumentality of his stormy exaltation.

By now exponents of either point of view would agree that in two works Mahler's positive qualities achieve a synthesis that is something close to perfection. These two are "Das Lied von der Erde" and the Fourth Symphony in G major. For me the rendition of either of these two works is always a very special occasion. But were it not for Richard Burgin such occasions would be few indeed in Boston. Fortunately Mr. Burgin has championed Mahler with consistency and thus it is that the G major turns up every few years, as on last week-end. Mr. Burgin is more than Mahler's exponent. His knowledge of, and love for, the haunting and melifluous score of the G major resulted in a performance as soundly conceived as those of some of the more celebrated Mahler specialists whom I have heard perform this work. The orchestra's response to this was notable, and as was that of the soprano soloist, Nancy Carr, and all told it was an hour of compelling beauty.

Whether, that hour, which comprised the second half of the program, warranted anyone's sitting through the first half could be debated, and in fact it seems that it quite violently was by the moiety of those present. This first half consisted of five short works that included Dr. Munch's familiar arrangement of Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," Honnegger's "Rugby, Mouvement symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps" (Image No. 3) and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" and "Alborada del gracioso." Taken individually, there was something of interest in most of them and they have rarely been played here. Though each may be overshadowed by a superior companion work of the same composer — Honegger's by his "Pacific 2-3-1," Debussy's by his "Iberia," Ravel's by his "Rapsodie Espagnole," for example — much exists in each that nevertheless warrants a revival. It was their profusion that did them in, for in the aggregate they rather tended to resemble a collection of Mr. Fiedler's discards. Moreover, each was the kind of piece in which Dr. Munch specializes. Mr. Burgin has considerable taste and talent of his own. He should remain, or be allowed to remain, steadfast to them.

The orchestra is away this week-end on its mid-winter tour. On its return next week Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor and will present a program of Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations."

[illegible] Burgin, concert mas[illegible] [illegible]chestra for 36 years, [illegible] his white tie before [illegible]ast night at Connecti-

[illegible]ARY 10, 1957. 5

[illegible] Conducts

Richard Burgin

their regular conductor, Charles Munch, in response or spirit, through the greater part of the season when he is in charge. But Mr. Burgin has been first violinist of this orchestra since the fall of 1920. He is like a first sergeant with more service stripes than he cares to wear on his sleeve, who has been at the forefront of every battle with his companions. In orchestras, as in the ranks, there is an affectionate loyalty for such a colleague.

•

Mr. Burgin for his part imposed no special problems when he took the baton in hand. His program was substantial and familiar, and the orchestra played it heartily and spaciously. There were several momentary ragged spots in the Beethoven symphony as the players, cooperative in principle though they meant to be, relaxed just a mite. Then they dug in more determinedly and went on to finish the program brilliantly.

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis is a noble curtain-raiser. Thanks to its evocation of a sixteenth - century England through the enlarging imagination of an Englishman of our century this score has won a special place in the repertory. The Boston strings played it with sustained singing tone.

•

In bracketing the Fifth symphonies of Beethoven and Shostakovich Mr. Burgin went one step in a direction that someone, in a seizure of wild programming, might turn into quite a thing—a festival of fifth symphonies. Not counting the youthful and jejune specimens by Haydn and Mozart, there would be candidates from the workshops of Schubert, Bruckner, Mahler, Sibelius, Vaughan Williams, Honegger, Prokofieff, William Schuman, Peter Mennin, et al. These are random suggestions; many others could be found. Helpful hints would be available in abundance for anyone who would want to try the idea.

•

Mr. Burgin's handling of the Beethoven Fifth was along traditional lines. As an old hand he knows that an associate conductor—another title he holds with the Boston Symphony—does not make radical changes, even if he wishes to.

With the Shostakovich symphony he was much more on his own. He conducted the first Boston performance of the work in 1939, and he has an appreciation of its generous proportions, its personal lyricism, its jauntiness and its gravity. Think what you will of Shostakovich's creative ups and downs, this is the symphony of a big talent not afraid of an exacting form and large utterance.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
JAN 10 1957

AT CARNEGIE:

Burgin Conducts Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TWO SYMPHONIC masterpieces graced the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night: Beethoven's Fifth and Shostakovitch's Fifth. Richard Burgin conducted. The concert opened with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis.

This was a well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-beloved work; the Shostakovitch a fresh, challenging work which grows more and more compelling, as the absorption of the audience testified.

The Vaughan Williams appeals through grateful writing for strings and for melodic charm.

Burgin conducted the concert with the assurance of the fine musician he is and with the splendid cooperation of a great body of musicians. Each work was clearly and faithfully set forth, if not with overwhelming projection of its emotional depths at least with understanding of its content. There was a solid quality about the whole concert.

Abreast of Times

As a contemporary masterpiece the Shostakovitch has weathered almost a score of years quite impressively. The second theme of the first movement remains one of the most beautiful in contemporary music, the genuine feeling expressed in the meditative third movement conveys a deep emotional feeling, the vitality of the finale takes note of the generative force of this century.

This is a communicative work, abreast the times. It commanded attention and brought satisfaction again last night.

The straight-forward presentation of the Beethoven had some fine moments, especially in the strings in the third movement. The pacing was judicious as everywhere else. The brasses sounded especially good in the Shostakovitch.

Not asked to give their utmost, the musicians provided tonal beauty that assured a quality performance. This made the Shostakovitch the high point of the evening.

Day (e)
NEW LONDON, Conn.
Independent Republican
Circ. 24,020

179

more (German on page 185 + pg 183 + Time mag.)

Boston Symphony Performs In College Concert Series

By HARRY R. HAZARD

Nothing unexpected turned up last night during the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Palmer Auditorium—third event in the current Connecticut College concert series. Under the able direction of Richard Burgin, its concert master for 36 years, the orchestra performed with its accustomed consummate skill and impeccable musicianship three works from the standard repertory — Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and, after intermission, Symphony No. Five, Op 47, by Shostakovitch.

Burgin's interpretive way with these pieces was, for the most part, thoroughly sound and straightforward, though hardly inspired. Missing from the evening's activity was that rare, electric quality of communication which characterized the recent appearance of William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Most satisfying to this listener was the reading of Vaughan Williams' great Fantasia. Scored for full string ensemble divided into a large and a small group plus a string quartet, this composition benefited vastly in performance by the wonderful string tone and articulation of the Boston. The pacing and dynamics were just. Had a bit more attention been given to projection of the inner voicing in places, the performance would have been outstanding.

Fifth Symphony

In contrast to the Thomas Tallis, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony, to quote B. H. Haggin, is most certainly "a fluent, slick and pretentiously arid" composition. Com-

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1957

ORCHESTRAS in New York

Burgin Conducts Shostakovich Fifth

Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 9:

Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 ..... Shostakovich

An inspired performance of Shostakovich's magnificant Fifth Symphony, once of the indubitable masterpieces of 20th-century music, elicited cheers from the audience at this concert and applause from the Boston Symphony itself for the superb conducting of Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin has been concertmaster of the orchestra for many years, even decades, but he is still full of youthful ardor and imagination, whether at his desk with the first violins or on the podium. The men played for him as they used to play for Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance was something that few orchestras today could approach.

Of all major symphonists of our time, Shostakovich has wrested the richest heritage from Mahler and Bruckner, learning from the one his parodistic wit and clean, biting orchestral palette, and from the other his monumental architecture, coupled with majesty of spirit.

The performance of the noble Vaughan Williams piece brought out the sumptuous tone of the Boston strings as well as their fine taste. It was the acme of sensuous elegance, but never slick or sentimental. As for Beethoven's Fifth, the story is less happy, but, truth to tell, we are all tired to death of this great but all-too-familiar music, and we can scarcely blame the orchestra for nodding in it a bit, despite some superb playing, especially in the last movement. —R. S.

Burgin Conducts Mahler Fourth

Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting. Nancy Carr, soprano. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 12:

"Rugby" ..... Honegger
"Rondes de printemps" ..... Debussy
"Pavane pour une Infante défunte"; "Alborada del gracioso" ..... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 ..... Mahler

Although Richard Burgin did nothing at this concert to match his superb interpretation of the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony the previous Wednesday, he nonetheless had prepared an unusual program very skillfully. Honegger's "Rugby", composed in 1928, was named for the game, but unfortunately it is completely lacking in the excitement, the split-second timing, and the deftness of a football game. It pleds along with more grim determination than inherent buoyancy. But the orchestra warmed upon it happily and then gave an exquisite performance of Debussy's "Rondes de printemps", the third of the "Images" for orchestra. Hymn to Demeter. In its first form, the role of Perséphone was mimed. This work is the epitome of sensuous subtlety, and emotional evocativeness, and it is hard to see why conductors neglect it, except that it must be played perfectly or it loses its perfume. The Ravel pieces also displayed the Boston Symphony winds and brasses in their full glory. What a priceless lesson in orchestration they afford us!

Mr. Burgin's conception of the Mahler Fourth was in a sense more French than Austrian. It did not have the rhapsodic freedom, the surging attacks, the uninhibited sentiment of a Bruno Walter performance. But in its cooler, more temperate way, it was curiously eloquent. The orchestra achieved some fabulously finished detail, and Miss Carr captured the quaintness, the mystic wonder, and the rapture of the vocal part.—R. S.

Richard Burgin

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

AT CARNEGIE:

Burgin Conducts Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TWO SYMPHONIC masterpieces graced the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night: Beethoven's Fifth and Shostakovitch's Fifth. Richard Burgin conducted. The concert opened with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis.

This was a well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-beloved work; the Shostakovitch a fresh, challenging work which grows more and more compelling, as the absorption of the audience testified.

The Vaughan Williams appeals through grateful writing for strings and for melodic charm.

Burgin conducted the concert with the assurance of the fine musician he is and with the splendid cooperation of a great body of musicians. Each work was clearly and faithfully set forth, if not with overwhelming projection of its emotional depths at least with understanding of its content. There was a solid quality about the whole concert.

Abreast of Times

As a contemporary masterpiece the Shostakovitch has weathered almost a score of years quite impressively. The second theme of the first movement remains one of the most beautiful in contemporary music, the genuine feeling expressed in the meditative third movement conveys a deep emotional feeling, the vitality of the finale takes note of the generative force of the century.

This is a communicative work, abreast the times. It commanded attention and brought satisfaction again last night.

The straight-forward presentation of the Beethoven had some fine moments, especially in the strings in the third movement. The pacing was judicious as everywhere else. The brasses sounded especially good in the Shostakovitch.

Not asked to give their utmost, the musicians provided tonal beauty that assured a quality performance. This made the Shostakovitch the high point of the evening.

ARY 10, 1957. E

Conducts

rd Burgin, concert mas-rchestra for 36 years, o his white tie before last night at Connecti-

Richard Burgin

their regular conductor, Charles Munch, in response or spirit through the greater part of the season when he is in charge. But Mr. Burgin has been first violinist of this orchestra since the fall of 1920. He is like a first sergeant with more service stripes than he cares to wear on his sleeve, who has been at the forefront of every battle with his companions. In orchestras, as in the ranks, there is an affectionate loyalty for such a colleague.

•

Mr. Burgin for his part imposed no special problems when he took the baton in hand. His program was substantial and familiar, and the orchestra played it heartily and spaciously. There were several momentary ragged spots in the Beethoven symphony as the players, cooperative in principle though they meant to be, relaxed just a mite. Then they dug in more determinedly and went on to finish the program brilliantly.

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis is a noble curtain-raiser. Thanks to its evocation of a sixteenth - century England through the enlarging imagination of an Englishman of our century this score has won a special place in the repertory. The Boston strings played it with sustained singing tone.

•

In bracketing the Fifth symphonies of Beethoven and Shostakovich Mr. Burgin went one step in a direction that someone, in a seizure of wild programming, might turn into quite a thing—a festival of fifth symphonies. Not counting the youthful and jejune specimens by Haydn and Mozart, there would be candidates from the workshops of Schubert, Bruckner, Mahler, Sibelius, Vaughan Williams, Honegger, Prokofieff, William Schuman, Peter Mennin, et al. These are random suggestions; many others could be found. Helpful hints would be available in abundance for anyone who would want to try the idea.

•

Mr. Burgin's handling of the Beethoven Fifth was along traditional lines. As an old hand he knows that an associate conductor—another title he holds with the Boston Symphony—does not make radical changes, even if he wishes to.

With the Shostakovich symphony he was much more on his own. He conducted the first Boston performance of the work in 1939, and he has an appreciation of its generous proportions, its personal lyricism, its jauntiness and its gravity. Think what you will of Shostakovich's creative ups and downs, this is the symphony of a big talent not afraid of an exacting form and large utterance.

y the musical tradition of this as well as a good many other countries he remains at best controversial. Even the redoubtable Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians is constrained to voice its aesthetic estimate of the man in much the same gingerly manner that newspapers report on, say, domestic religious tensions. Thus its appraisal of Mahler is made not by one but by two opposing critical anlyses. The first speaks to that view which dilates upon his excessive emotionalism, his unbearable length and turgidity, the disjointedness of his forms, his unrestrained impetuosity, the unsettled quality of his moods. The other, with whom this reviewer agrees, tends to find in Mahler a great evocation of the Viennese classical school through Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Bruckner. This side sees the simplicity and loveliness of his melodies, the breadth of his slow movements, the profusion of his unexpected usages in instrumentation, his exploitation of psychological nuances, the monumentality of his stormy exaltation.

By now exponents of either point of view would agree that in two works Mahler's positive qualities achieve a synthesis that is something close to perfection. These two are "Das Lied von der Erde" and the Fourth Symphony in G major. For me the rendition of either of these two works is always a very special occasion. But were it not for Richard Burgin such occasions would be few indeed in Boston. Fortunately Mr. Burgin has championed Mahler with consistency and thus it is that the G major turns up every few years, as on last week-end. Mr. Burgin is more than Mahler's exponent. His knowledge of, and love for, the haunting and melifluous score of the G major resulted in a performance as soundly conceived as those of some of the more celebrated Mahler specialists whom I have heard perform this work. The orchestra's response to this was notable, and as was that of the soprano soloist, Nancy Carr, and all told it was an hour of compelling beauty.

Whether, that hour, which comprised the second half of the program, warranted anyone's sitting through the first half could be debated, and in fact it seems that it quite violently was by the moiety of those present. This first half consisted of five short works that included Dr. Munch's familiar arrangement of Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," Honegger's "Rugby, Mouvement symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps" (Image No. 3) and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" and "Alborada del gracioso." Taken individually, there was something of interest in most of them and they have rarely been played here. Though each may be overshadowed by a superior companion work of the same composer — Honegger's by his "Pacific 2-3-1," Debussy's by his "Iberia," Ravel's by his "Rapsodie Espagnole," for example — much exists in each that nevertheless warrants a revival. It was their profusion that did them in, for in the aggregate they rather tended to resemble a collection of Mr. Fiedler's discards. Moreover, each was the kind of piece in which Dr. Munch specializes. Mr. Burgin has considerable taste and talent of his own. He should remain, or be allowed to remain, steadfast to them.

The orchestra is away this week-end on its mid-winter tour. On its return next week Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor and will present a program of Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations."

DEAN
KERTSEN
Conductor
y — Opera — Oratorio — Concert
VOX RECORDS
International Press Hails A Brilliant Young Maestro
"Conductor of the highest class."
chosen with care, his style is of a great pu
table."—DISQUES MAGAZINE—PARIS nces, besides having vitality, and elevation grandeur and verve for the sprightliness."
of expression."—NEW YORK TIMES he hearts of all concerned" and persuasive."—MUSICAL AMERICA the sensitive direction of you satisfying."—HIGH FIDELITY MAGAZ ed by Dean Eckertsen are first rate.
ON
ainly knows how this music should sound."— ED COLUMN
bsolutely magnificent and a great credit to

Day (e)
NEW LONDON, Conn.
Independent Republican
Circ. 24,020

179 more (German on page 185 + Time mag.) + pg 83

Boston Symphony Performs In College Concert Series

By HARRY R. HAZARD

Nothing unexpected turned up last night during the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Palmer Auditorium—third event in the current Connecticut College concert series. Under the able direction of Richard Burgin, its concert master for 36 years, the orchestra performed with its accustomed consummate skill and impeccable musicianship three works from the standard repertory — Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and, after intermission, Symphony No. Five Op 47, by Shostakovitch.

Burgin's interpretive way with these pieces was, for the most part, thoroughly sound and straightforward, though hardly inspired. Missing from the evening's activity was that rare, electric quality of communication which characterized the recent appearance of William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Most satisfying to this listener was the reading of Vaughan Williams' great Fantasia. Scored for full string ensemble divided into a large and a small group plus a string quartet, this composition benefited vastly in performance by the wonderful string tone and articulation of the Boston. The pacing and dynamics were just. Had a bit more attention been given to projection of the inner voicing in places, the performance would have been outstanding.

Fifth Symphony

In contrast to the Thomas Tallis, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony, to quote B. H. Haggin, is most certainly "a fluent, slick and pretentiously arid" composition. Composed in 1937 to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Russian Revolution, the symphony is supposed to be infused with Soviet political ideology, and to exhibit to a minimum decadent Western influence. Actually, in listening to this music, one becomes increasingly aware of its large measure of dependence upon the work of men like Jean Sibelius, Gustav Mahler (witness the allegretto second movement), and Richard Strauss. There is little real warmth, but there is plenty of grimacing glitter. Wearing power is small. The demands on the resources of a modern virtuoso orchestra are considerable. Of course the Bostonians took all of the hurdles with ease. Only under the hand of a Stokowski or a Rodzinski would the thing have come off more effectively.

The first two movements of the Beethoven seemed a bit sluggish, but the scherzo and finale went well enough. One wonders how many times in 36 years Burgin has participated in a performance of this war horse with the orchestra.

This same program will be repeated by Burgin and the orchestra tomorrow night in New York's Carnegie Hall.

CONCERT MASTER—Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 36 years, makes a last--minute adjustment to his white tie before leading the orchestra in a concert last night at Connecticut College.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1957

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 20,000

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BURGIN CONDUCTS MAHLER

Gustav Mahler has been dead nearly fifty years, but in the musical tradition of this as well as a good many other countries he remains at best controversial. Even the redoubtable Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians is constrained to voice its aesthetic estimate of the man in much the same gingerly manner that newspapers report on, say, domestic religious tensions. Thus its appraisal of Mahler is made not by one but by two opposing critical anlyses. The first speaks to that view which dilates upon his excessive emotionalism, his unbearable length and turgidity, the disjointedness of his forms, his unrestrained impetuosity, the unsettled quality of his moods. The other, with whom this reviewer agrees, tends to find in Mahler a great evocation of the Viennese classical school through Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Bruckner. This side sees the simplicity and loveliness of his melodies, the breadth of his slow movements, the profusion of his unexpected usages in instrumentation, his exploitation of psychological nuances, the monumentality of his stormy exaltation.

By now exponents of either point of view would agree that in two works Mahler's positive qualities achieve a synthesis that is something close to perfection. These two are "Das Lied von der Erde" and the Fourth Symphony in G major. For me the rendition of either of these two works is always a very special occasion. But were it not for Richard Burgin such occasions would be few indeed in Boston. Fortunately Mr. Burgin has championed Mahler with consistency and thus it is that the G major turns up every few years, as on last week-end. Mr. Burgin is more than Mahler's exponent. His knowledge of, and love for, the haunting and melifluous score of the G major resulted in a performance as soundly conceived as those of some of the more celebrated Mahler specialists whom I have heard perform this work. The orchestra's response to this was notable, and as was that of the soprano soloist, Nancy Carr, and all told it was an hour of compelling beauty.

Whether, that hour, which comprised the second half of the program, warranted anyone's sitting through the first half could be debated, and in fact it seems that it quite violently was by the moiety of those present. This first half consisted of five short works that included Dr. Munch's familiar arrangement of Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," Honegger's "Rugby, Mouvement symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps" (Image No. 3) and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" and "Alborada del gracioso." Taken individually, there was something of interest in most of them and they have rarely been played here. Though each may be overshadowed by a superior companion work of the same composer — Honegger's by his "Pacific 2-3-1," Debussy's by his "Iberia," Ravel's by his "Rapsodie Espagnole," for example — much exists in each that nevertheless warrants a revival. It was their profusion that did them in, for in the aggregate they rather tended to resemble a collection of Mr. Fiedler's discards. Moreover, each was the kind of piece in which Dr. Munch specializes. Mr. Burgin has considerable taste and talent of his own. He should remain, or be allowed to remain, steadfast to them.

The orchestra is away this week-end on its mid-winter tour. On its return next week Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor and will present a program of Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), instrumental excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations."

NEW YORK TIMES, JANUARY 10, 1957. E

Music: Burgin Conducts

Boston Symphony Led By Concertmaster

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Richard Burgin conducting. At Carnegie Hall.
Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra, Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 5.....Shostakovich

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

AN orchestra shows a special goodwill when one of its own steps on the podium. This was certainly the case last night at Carnegie Hall when Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, assumed the role of conductor.

Not that the Bostonions fail their regular conductor, Charles Munch, in response or spirit through the greater part of the season when he is in charge. But Mr. Burgin has been first violinist of this orchestra since the fall of 1920. He is like a first sergeant with more service stripes than he cares to wear on his sleeve, who has been at the forefront of every battle with his companions. In orchestras, as in the ranks, there is an affectionate loyalty for such a colleague.

•

Mr. Burgin for his part imposed no special problems when he took the baton in hand. His program was substantial and familiar, and the orchestra played it heartily and spaciously. There were several momentary ragged spots in the Beethoven symphony as the players, cooperative in principle though they meant to be, relaxed just a mite. Then they dug in more determinedly and went on to finish the program brilliantly.

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis is a noble curtain-raiser. Thanks to its evocation of a sixteenth - century England through the enlarging imagination of an Englishman of our century this score has won a special place in the repertory. The Boston strings played it with sustained singing tone.

•

In bracketing the Fifth symphonies of Beethoven and Shostakovich Mr. Burgin went one step in a direction that someone, in a seizure of wild programming, might turn into quite a thing—a festival of fifth symphonies. Not counting the youthful and jejune specimens by Haydn and Mozart, there would be candidates from the workshops of Schubert, Bruckner, Mahler, Sibelius, Vaughan Williams, Honegger, Prokofieff, William Schuman, Peter Mennin, et al. These are random suggestions; many others could be found. Helpful hints would be available in abundance for anyone who would want to try the idea.

Richard Burgin

•

Mr. Burgin's handling of the Beethoven Fifth was along traditional lines. As an old hand he knows that an associate conductor—another title he holds with the Boston Symphony—does not make radical changes, even if he wishes to.

With the Shostakovich symphony he was much more on his own. He conducted the first Boston performance of the work in 1939, and he has an appreciation of its generous proportions, its personal lyricism, its jauntiness and its gravity. Think what you will of Shostakovich's creative ups and downs, this is the symphony of a big talent not afraid of an exacting form and large utterance.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

AT CARNEGIE:

Burgin Conducts Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TWO SYMPHONIC masterpieces graced the Boston Symphony's program in Carnegie Hall last night: Beethoven's Fifth and Shostakovitch's Fifth. Richard Burgin conducted. The concert opened with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis.

This was a well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-constructed program. The Beethoven represented a long-accepted, well-beloved work; the Shostakovitch a fresh, challenging work which grows more and more compelling, as the absorption of the audience testified.

The Vaughan Williams appeals through grateful writing for strings and for melodic charm.

Burgin conducted the concert with the assurance of the fine musician he is and with the splendid cooperation of a great body of musicians. Each work was clearly and faithfully set forth, if not with overwhelming projection of its emotional depths at least with understanding of its content. There was a solid quality about the whole concert.

Abreast of Times

As a contemporary masterpiece the Shostakovitch has weathered almost a score of years quite impressively. The second theme of the first movement remains one of the most beautiful in contemporary music, the genuine feeling expressed in the meditative third movement conveys a deep emotional feeling, the vitality of the finale takes note of the generative force of the century.

This is a communicative work, abreast the times. It commanded attention and brought satisfaction again last night.

The straight-forward presentation of the Beethoven had some fine moments, especially in the strings in the third movement. The pacing was judicious as everywhere else. The brasses sounded especially good in the Shostakovitch.

Not asked to give their utmost, the musicians provided tonal beauty that assured a quality performance. This made the Shostakovitch the high point of the evening.

180

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253
JAN 10 1957

MUSIC

Boston Symphony

By PAUL HENRY LANG

Carnegie Hall
Richard Burgin conducting. The program: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra.Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 . . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47. . . Shostakovitch

The Boston Symphony came to town last night with a novel twist in program making. In the scramble to offer the public a rich fare all sorts of curious combinations appear on programs, but I have never seen Beethoven's Fifth Symphony sandwiched in the middle of a program. It is the kind of work (like the third "Leonora" overture) that does not tolerate competition and annihilates pretty nearly everything that follows it—those C major chords at the end will continue to ring in your ears for a long time.

Now the "Fifth" is so hackneyed that it is very hard for a professional musician or critic to listen to it with a fresh and relaxed mind. It is probably difficult even for the players to be alert about it; one stand of fiddlers on the port side got lost and played while they should have kept quiet. But once the symphony gets under way it becomes irresistible and sweeps away the bad memories of pop concerts and victory slogans.

The performance was far from outstanding. For some reason the rhythm in the first movement was logy; all the strings as well as the horns tarried too long on the rest that precedes the famous motif and periodically this lag accumulated to a perceptible rhythmic limp. The slow movement was decent but routine, the scherzo again a bit turgid, but the rousing finale did make things pretty difficult for Mr. Shostakovitch, whose own "Fifth" followed Beethoven's.

The concert began with Vaughan Williams' fine Fantasia on a theme by Tallis, which the Boston strings played superlatively. The antiphonal string choirs mashed beautifully and the sond was full-bodied and warm without any hint of lushness.

Then, after the intermission we heard a work that is the antithesis of the positive and very personal utterances of the composers heard in the first half of the evening. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony does not sweep you off your feet, it does not identify itself with a nation as does Vaughan Williams' very English music, and does not leave you exhilarated. Perhaps this sounds a little paradoxical; after all, Shostakovitch is a Russian and his music sounds Russian, but it is not proud and self-confident.

Richard Burgin

The trouble with this music is that while it demonstrates both skill and considerable talent, its Russian quality is local color rather than a birthright. The composer has good ideas but is constantly groping and struggling, with just what I do not know. Movements will start very promisingly, then bog down in rhapsodic meditation that is very unsymphonic. But the fast movements are well carried by their Rimsky-like momentum.

Mr. Burgin, last night's conductor, is not the flamboyant type of maestro but a sound, solid, and reliable musician. While the Beethoven symphony was a bit dull, the other works received excellent interpretations. He conducts from a score—even "the" Fifth—to which I say bravo. That's what scores are for, and no one can accuse Mr. Burgin of not being able to read a full score—something I occasionally doubt when listening to certain conductors who play by heart.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382
JAN 11 1957

Boston Concert

Burgin Conducts Visiting Symphony at Mosque in Program for Griffith Foundation

By ALAN BRANIGAN

The rare spectacle of a concertmaster taking over the conductor's job held considerable fascination for the huge audience that attended last night's concert by the Boston Symphony at the Mosque Theater under sponsorship of Griffith Music Foundation. The concertmaster is traditionally the leader of the first violin section, a position in which he translates the conductor's wishes to the other players and in general serves as executive officer.

The Boston's concertmaster, Richard Burgin, does not seem to be content merely to follow other men's baton-waving. When he took up his own last night and led his players through a program (Dr. Charles Munch, the regular conductor, was nowhere in sight), Burgin demonstrated that the Napoleonic axiom was right and that a private can carry a marshal's baton in his knapsack.

The Bostonians never could play badly, even on purpose, and although they committed a few bloopers last night the response to Burgin's leadership was warm and wholehearted. He has a baton technique of a highly developed sort. He apparently has definite ideas of how the music should go and, best of all, he gives his orchestra its head whenever the occasion demands. The result was a highly successful performance.

Most of the concert's more interesting portions were centered in that huge and diverse work, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5. The musical style of this modern (1937) Russian work was 20th Century without being ultra-modernistic. Some of the tried and true Soviet cliches were there, naturally—the march of the revolutionaries, the idyllic strophes of the collectives and other bits of propaganda that USSR composers are fond of building — perhaps by request — into their compositions.

But the listener could not fail to be transported by the wonderfully sound developments sections in Shostakovich's moody and often entertaining work. The long lines of [illegible] themes, the oddly conceived and delicate clashes of counterpoint, the vast turbulence of percussion and brass, the nostalgic [illegible]

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Bostonians to Play Mahler Fourth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here for its third visit of the season under the aegis of its concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin. Having officiated in the former capacity for 36 years, he illustrates on the podium as well as in his first-chair the benefits of long experience.

Last night's concert in Carnegie Hall was an example of excellent programming and enjoyable listening.

The combine of Vaughan-Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra" and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony proved a dual choice that represented significant and (in different ways) powerful works by two living composers. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, appeasement for the conservative subscription holders who relish the unashedly familiar, completed the list.

Before discussing these pieces, it is well to mention that Burgin will not repeat either of them during his program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night or at Saturday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall, but will perform, instead, Mahler's rarely heard Fourth Symphony.

Being a Mahler enthusiast, I feel any opportunity to hear the inspired creativity of this great Viennese is an occasion and should be highlighted. Scored for large orchestra and soprano soloist, the ensemble will be assisted by Nancy Carr, Ohio-born artist, who has sung the work previously under the direction of Bruno Walter. Ruth Posselt, violinist and Burgin's wife, will be a further addition to the Brooklyn concert, where she will perform the Bruch Concerto No. 1 in G.

The Bostonians played the entire program last night as if they were, at once, relaxed and yet eager to do their best for their old friend and colleague of many years. Both contemporary works were played with more personalized intensity and communicative power than Beethoven's Fifth. The latter must have practically the divine fire of Prometheus to generate electricity for the cognoscenti these days, particularly as we have had more than our share of performances during the current season.

Possibly, the dramatic and eerily imaginative Shostakovich fared best of all, because Burgin conducted the first performance by the Bostonians in 1939. He balanced the solo instruments with expressiveness in relation to the ensemble and managed his dynamics so sensitively that the climaxes had a compelling forcefulness. The precision of the musicians was also more taut and disciplined here than it had been during the Beethoven.

The Tallis-Vaughan-Williams is a happy match of 16th century and contemporary England and makes us nostalgic for spring and all that goes with it, including green fields. The Bostonians played it as if they felt that way, too. A pleasant beginning to an evening that spelled satisfaction through music more than personality.

1/10/57
Staats Herald Corp.
[illegible] Broadway
[illegible] 17, N. Y.

R. Burgin dirigiert Boston Symphony Orchester

Richard Burgin, Konzertmeister und Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, der mit seinem gestrigen ersten Gastkonzert — Phantasie von Vaughan Williams, Schostakovitch, Fünfte Symphonie und die "Fünfte" von Beethoven — stärkste Eindrücke erzielte, hat für sein zweites Konzert am Samstag nachmittag 2.30 Uhr in der Carnegie Hall folgendes Programm gewählt: "Rugby" von Honegger, "Rondes de Printemps" von Debussy, Ravels "Pavane" sowie "Alborada del Gracioso" und als Hauptwerk nach der Pause, die Vierte Symphonie von Gustav Mahler, wobei das Sopransolo im Finale von Nancy Carr übernommen wird.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
Circ. D. 200,371 - S. 297,328
JAN 11 1957

AT THE MOSQUE

Shostakovich offered by Boston Symphony

By VIC de KEYSERLING

A capacity audience at the Mosque Theater last night heard one of this country's greatest orchestras interpreting one of the most controversial works of recent years.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Rich- Boston Orchestra displayed the qualities [illegible]

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 1957

New York

Editor and Critic: SHIRLEY CECILLE CASH, 42 Cloverfield Road, So. Valley Stream, N. Y. Tel: LOcust 1-8192
Other Critics: Harry L. Fuchs, Sherman Gottesman, Walter F. Loeb

With the Orchestras

. . . Andre Kostelanetz conducted his third special concert of the season, Jan. 19. In addition to works by Rossini, Debussy and Stravinsky, Kostelanetz devoted the latter half of his program to Music of Spain, works by Granados, Falla, Albeniz-Arbos and Marquina.

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony in a most enjoyable program at Carnegie Hall, Jan. 12. The first half of the program was French: Honegger's "Rugby, Mouvement Symphonique," Debussy's "Rondes de printemps," (Image No. 3), Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante defunte" and "Alborada del gracioso." But the real heart of the program was the second half, Mahler's Symphony No. 4, with Nancy Carr as soprano soloist. Miss Carr's voice sounded clear and fresh. It is perhaps Mahler's most lyrical work, and it was a pleasure to bask in its sunny mood.

[illegible] ture is symphonic, even the proper wow technique in its sizzling climaxes and brisk rhythms, and the other was Haydn's G Major Symphony, No. 88. This was a marvelous exercise in string playing, the Boston's violins, violas and cellos making the most of Haydn's decorative lacework of thematic material. The woodwinds were cast into the shade, but that seems to be today's custom in playing Haydn and Mozart with massive strings. The slow movement was especially memorable for its tracceries of beautiful tone.

There were several ovations during the evening, the largest being elicited by the Shostakovich symphony.

[illegible] ex- [illegible] usic him [illegible] ence to great heights, even when some of Shostakovitch's inspirations by themselves might not have achieved this result.

The program was rounded out with Rossini's overture to the opera, "Semiramide," and Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 88. Here also the

Juilliard Dance Theater

The Juilliard Dance Theater gave performances at the Juilliard Concert Hall, Jan. 11 and 12, of three works choreographed by Doris Humphrey who is its director. "Dawn in New York" is set to Hunter Johnson's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, and Joseph Bloch performed the piano solo. "Descent Into The Dream," which had its premiere performance, is set to Goffredo Petrassi's "Recreation Concertante"; the music, at this time, had its U. S. premiere. "Life of the Bee" is set to Paul Hindemith's Kammermusic No. 1, Op. 24, No. 1. Under the direction of Frederick Prausnitz, the Juilliard Orchestra played the accompaniments.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 12 1957

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 28 and 29. His program will consist of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovich. — Boston Herald.

Shostakovich? He invented the electric-light bulb.

WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.
[Adv. in the Cleveland Plain Dealer]

Going places? There's a limit to the compliments you'll get or the places you'll go in this smart coat.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253

JAN 10 1957

MUSIC

Boston Symphony

By PAUL HENRY LANG

Carnegie Hall
Richard Burgin conducting. The program: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra.Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op 67 Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, Op. 47....Shostakovitch

The Boston Symphony came to town last night with a novel twist in program making. In the scramble to offer the public a rich fare all sorts of curious combinations appear on programs, but I have never seen Beethoven's Fifth Symphony sandwiched in the middle of a program. It is the kind of work (like the third "Leonora" overture) that does not tolerate competition and annihilates pretty nearly everything that follows it—those C major chords at the end will continue to ring in your ears for a long time.

Now the "Fifth" is so hackneyed that it is very hard for a professional musician or critic to listen to it with a fresh and relaxed mind. It is probably difficult even for the players to be alert about it; one stand of fiddlers on the port side got lost and played while they should have kept quiet. But once the symphony gets under way it becomes irresistible and sweeps away the bad memories of pop concerts and victory slogans.

The performance was far from outstanding. For some reason the rhythm in the first movement was logy; all the strings as well as the horns tarried too long on the rest that precedes the famous motif and periodically this lag accumulated to a perceptible rhythmic limp. The slow movement was decent but routine, the scherzo again a bit turgid, but the rousing finale did make things pretty difficult for Mr. Shostakovitch, whose own "Fifth" followed Beethoven's.

The concert began with Vaughan Williams' fine Fantasia on a theme by Tallis, which the Boston strings played superlatively The antiphonal string choirs mashed beautifully and the sond was full-bodied and warm without any hint of lushness

Then, after the intermission we heard a work that is the antithesis of the positive and very personal utterances of the composers heard in the first half of the evening. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony does not sweep you off your feet, it does not identify itself with a liams' very English music, and does not leave you exhilarated. Perhaps this sounds a little paradoxical; after all, Shostakovitch is a Russian and his music sounds Russian, but it is not proud and self-confident

Richard Burgin

The trouble with this music is that while it demonstrates both skill and considerable talent, its Russian quality is local color rather than a birthright. The composer has good ideas but is constantly groping and struggling, with just what I do not know. Movements will start very promisingly, then bog down in rhapsodic meditation that is very unsymphonic. But the fast movements are well carried by their Rimsky-like momentum.

Mr. Burgin, last night's conductor, is not the flamboyant type of maestro but a sound, solid, and reliable musician. While the Beethoven symphony was a bit dull, the other works received excellent interpretations. He conducts from a score —even "the" Fifth—to which I say bravo. That's what scores are for, and no one can accuse Mr. Burgin of not being able to read a full score—something I occasionally doubt when listening to certain conductors who play by heart.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 389,011 - S. 258,545

JAN 10 1957

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Bostonians to Play Mahler Fourth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here for its third visit of the season under the aegis of its concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin. Having officiated in the former capacity for 36 years, he illustrates on the podium as well as in his first-chair the benefits of long experience.

Last night's concert in Carnegie Hall was an example of excellent programming and enjoyable listening.

The combine of Vaughan-Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra" and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony proved a dual choice that represented significant and (in different ways) powerful works by two living composers. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, appeasement for the conservative subscription holders who relish the unabashedly familiar, completed the list.

Before discussing these pieces, it is well to mention that Burgin will not repeat either of them during his program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night or at Saturday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall, but will perform, instead, Mahler's rarely heard Fourth Symphony.

Being a Mahler enthusiast, I feel any opportunity to hear the inspired creativity of this great Viennese is an occasion and should be highlighted. Scored for large orchestra and soprano soloist, the ensemble will be assisted by Nancy Carr, Ohio-born artist, who has sung the work previously under the direction of Bruno Walter. Ruth Posselt, violinist and Burgin's wife, will be a further addition to the Brooklyn concert, where she will perform the Bruch Concerto No. 1 in G.

The Bostonians played the entire program last night as if they were, at once, relaxed and yet eager to do their best for their old friend and colleague of many years. Both contemporary works were played with more personalized intensity and communicative power than Beethoven's Fifth. The latter must have practically the divine fire of Prometheus to generate electricity for the cognoscenti these days, particularly as we have had more than our share of performances during the current season.

Possibly, the dramatic and eerily imaginative Shostakovich fared best of all, because Burgin conducted the first performance by the Bostonians in 1939. He balanced the solo instruments with expressiveness in relation to the ensemble and managed his dynamics so sensitively that the climaxes had a compelling forcefulness. The precision of the musicians was also more taut and disciplined here than it had been during the Beethoven.

The Tallis-Vaughan-Williams is a happy match of 16th century and contemporary England and makes us nostalgic for spring and all that goes with it, including green fields. The Bostonians played it as if they felt that way, too. A pleasant beginning to an evening that spelled satisfaction through music more than personality.

R. Burgin dirigiert Boston Symphony Orchester

Richard Burgin, Konzertmeister und Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, der mit seinem gestrigen ersten Gastkonzert — Phantasie von Vaughan Williams, Schostakovitch. Fünfte Symphonie und die "Fünfte" von Beethoven — stärkste Eindrücke erzielte, hat für sein zweites Konzert am Samstag nachmittag 2.30 Uhr in der Carnegie Hall folgendes Programm gewählt: "Rugby" von Honegger, "Rondes de Printemps" von Debussy, Ravels "Pavane" sowie "Alborada del Gracioso" und als Hauptwerk nach der Pause, die Vierte Symphonie von Gustav Mahler, wobei das Sopransolo im Finale von Nancy Carr übernommen wird.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
Circ. D. 200,371 - S. 297,328

AT THE MOSQUE

Shostakovich offered by Boston Symphony

By VIC de KEYSERLING

A capacity audience at the Mosque Theater last night heard one of this country's greatest orchestras interpreting one of the most controversial works of recent years.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, made it clear in the playing of passages of great beauty why some years ago Dmitri Shostakovitch met with the most violent and bitter attacks in Pravda. The "Occidental deviation," of which he was accused, delighted the Occidental ears of an audience which heard the concert, sponsored by the Griffith Music Foundation.

In the Russian composer's "Symphony No. 5, Op. 47" such beauty was, however, not ever-present.

The orchestra gave a masterful interpretation of a difficult and interesting composition.

* * *

CONDUCTOR BURGIN'S background, including an unusually varied and rich experience of Russian music and audiences, enabled him to carry last night's audience to great heights, even when some of Shostakovitch's inspirations by themselves might not have achieved this result.

The program was rounded out with Rossini's overture to the opera, "Semiramide," and Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 88. Here also the Boston Orchestra displayed the qualities which have earned it its world-wide reputation, and which must be credited in large measure to its music director, Charles Munch.

FORTHCOMING events, also under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation, include Gina Bachauer in the Master Piano Series on Jan. 13; Youth Concert No. 2 on Jan. 26; the famous Quartetto Italiano in the Chamber Music Series at the Griffith Auditorium on Jan. 29, and Youth Concert No. 3 on Feb. [illegible]

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 1957

FEBRU

Periscopics

Do you want the Lyon-Healy Young Artists Series to be continued? This is the question the famous Chicago music house would like to be answered by music teachers throughout the area. Drop a card to Miss Cecilia McVean, the recently appointed manager of the hall, and give your reaction to the Monday evening concerts presented by talented young musicians, selected through auditions conducted during the summer and judged by prominent artists and teachers. Every teacher is invited to enter outstanding students . . . Dr. Rudolph Ganz will be honored by the Chicago Artists' Asso- cert by the Boston Symphony at the Mosque Theater under sponsorship of Griffith Music Foundation. The concertmaster is traditionally the leader of the first violin section, a position in which he translates the conductor's wishes to the other players and in general serves as executive officer.

The Boston's concertmaster, Richard Burgin, does not seem to be content merely to follow other men's baton-waving. When he took up his own baton last night and led his fellow players through a complex program (Dr. Charles Munch, the regular conductor, was nowhere in sight), Burgin demonstrated that the Napoleonic axiom was right and that a private can carry a marshal's baton in his knapsack.

The Bostonians never could play badly, even on purpose, and although they committed a few should go and, best of a gives his orchestra its whenever the occasion den The result was a highly su ful performance.

Most of the concert's more interesting portions were centered in that huge and diverse work, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5. The musical style of this modern (1937) Russian work was 20th Century without being ultra-modernistic. Some of the tried and true Soviet cliches were there, naturally—the march of the revolutionaries, the idyllic atmosphere of the collectives and other bits of propaganda that USSR composers are fond of building — perhaps by request — into their compositions.

But the listener could not fail to be transported by the wonderfully sound developments sections in Shostakovich's moody and often entertaining work. The long lines of intriguing themes, the oddly conceived and delicate clashes of counterpoint, the vast turbulence of percussion and brass, the nostalgic this month's meeting. Among th Blythe Owen, pianist, Dorcas Geh bard, soprano, Glennis Stout, flau Harbisan and Gwendolyn Roberts Biossat, social chairman, will be and Mrs. Robert Vanek.

Mrs. Lewis Myers Enter

The Cordon Club benefited mat Mrs. Lewis Myers, who on Jan. 13 at a delightfully informal musi apartment on Lake Shore Drive. by a brilliant young baritone, Joh vivacious pianist, Florence Henlin artists who gave an amusing sk possesses a beautiful voice and si fects, but he chose the type of so sion, melodious favorites. He won

Many Activities for M

The president of the Sunday proper wow technique in its sizzling climaxes and brisk rhythms, and the other was Haydn's G Major Symphony, No. 88. This was a marvelous exercise in string playing, the Boston's violins, violas and cellos making the most of Haydn's decorative lacework of thematic material. The woodwinds were cast into the shade, but that seems to be today's custom in playing Haydn and Mozart with massive strings. The slow movement was especially memorable for its tracceries of beautiful tone.

There were several ovations during the evening, the largest being elicited by the Shostakovich symphony.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 1957

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 28 and 29. His program will consist of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch.—Boston Herald.

Shostakovich? He invented the electric-light bulb.

WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.

[Adv. in the Cleveland Plain Dealer]

Going places? There's a limit to the compliments you'll get or the places you'll go in this smart coat.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 - S. 528,253

JAN 10 1957

MUSIC

Boston Symphony

By PAUL HENRY LANG

Carnegie Hall

Richard Burgin conducting. The program: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra.Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op 67 Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovitch

The Boston Symphony came to town last night with a novel twist in program making. In the scramble to offer the public a rich fare all sorts of curious combinations appear on programs, but I have never seen Beethoven's Fifth Symphony sandwiched in the middle of a program. It is the kind of work (like the third "Leonora" overture) that does not tolerate competition and annihilates pretty nearly everything that follows it—those C major chords at the end will continue to ring in your ears for a long time.

Now the "Fifth" is so hackneyed that it is very hard for a professional musician or critic to listen to it with a fresh and relaxed mind. It is probably difficult even for the players to be alert about it; one stand of fiddlers on the port side got lost and played while they should have kept quiet. But once the symphony gets under way it becomes irresistible and sweeps away the bad memories of pop concerts and victory slogans.

The performance was far from outstanding. For some reason the rhythm in the first movement was logy; all the strings as well as the horns tarried too long on the rest that precedes the famous motif and periodically this lag accumulated to a perceptible rhythmic limp. The slow movement was decent but routine, the scherzo again a bit turgid, but the rousing finale did make things pretty difficult for Mr. Shostakovitch, whose own "Fifth" followed Beethoven's.

The concert began with Vaughan Williams' fine Fantasia on a theme by Tallis, which the Boston strings played superlatively The antiphonal string choirs mashed beautifully and the sond was full-bodied and warm without any hint of lushness

Then, after the intermission we heard a work that is the antithesis of the positive and very personal utterances of the composers heard in the first half of the evening. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony does not sweep you off your feet, it does not identify itself with a nation as does Vaughan Williams' very English music, and does not leave you exhilarated. Perhaps this sounds a little paradoxical; after all, Shostakovitch is a Russian and his music sounds Russian, but it is not proud and self-confident

Richard Burgin

The trouble with this music is that while it demonstrates both skill and considerable talent, its Russian quality is local color rather than a birthright. The composer has good ideas but is constantly groping and struggling, with just what I do not know. Movements will start very promisingly, then bog down in rhapsodic meditation that is very unsymphonic. But the fast movements are well carried by their Rimsky-like momentum.

Mr. Burgin, last night's conductor, is not the flamboyant type of maestro but a sound, solid, and reliable musician. While the Beethoven symphony was a bit dull, the other works received excellent interpretations. He conducts from a score—even "the" Fifth—to which I say bravo. That's what scores are for, and no one can accuse Mr. Burgin of not being able to read a full score—something I occasionally doubt when listening to certain conductors who play by heart.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
POST
Circ. D. 389,011 - S. 258,545

JAN 10 1957

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Bostonians to Play Mahler Fourth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here for its third visit of the season under the aegis of its concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin. Having officiated in the former capacity for 36 years, he illustrates on the podium as well as in his first-chair the benefits of long experience.

Last night's concert in Carnegie Hall was an example of excellent programming and enjoyable listening.

The combine of Vaughan-Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra" and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony proved a dual choice that represented significant and (in different ways) powerful works by two living composers. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, appeasement for the conservative subscription holders who relish the unabashedly familiar, completed the list.

Before discussing these pieces, it is well to mention that Burgin will not repeat either of them during his program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow night or at Saturday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall, but will perform, instead, Mahler's rarely heard Fourth Symphony.

Being a Mahler enthusiast, I feel any opportunity to hear the inspired creativity of this great Viennese is an occasion and should be highlighted. Scored for large orchestra and soprano soloist, the ensemble will be assisted by Nancy Carr, Ohio-born artist, who has sung the work previously under the direction of Bruno Walter. Ruth Posselt, violinist and Burgin's wife, will be a further addition to the Brooklyn concert, where she will perform the Bruch Concerto No. 1 in G.

The Bostonians played the entire program last night as if they were, at once, relaxed and yet eager to do their best for their old friend and colleague of many years. Both contemporary works were played with more personalized intensity and communicative power than Beethoven's Fifth. The latter must have practically the divine fire of Prometheus to generate electricity for the cognoscenti these days, particularly as we have had more than our share of performances during the current season.

Possibly, the dramatic and eerily imaginative Shostakovich fared best of all, because Burgin conducted the first performance by the Bostonians in 1939. He balanced the solo instruments with expressiveness in relation to the ensemble and managed his dynamics so sensitively that the climaxes had a compelling forcefulness. The precision of the musicians was also more taut and disciplined here than it had been during the Beethoven.

The Tallis-Vaughan-Williams is a happy match of 16th century and contemporary England and makes us nostalgic for spring and all that goes with it, including green fields. The Bostonians played it as if they felt that way, too. A pleasant beginning to an evening that spelled satisfaction through music more than personality.

R. Burgin dirigiert Boston Symphony Orchester

Richard Burgin, Konzertmeister und Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, der mit seinem gestrigen ersten Gastkonzert — Phantasie von Vaughan Williams, Schostakovitch Fünfte Symphonie und die "Fünfte" von Beethoven — stärkste Eindrücke erzielte, hat für sein zweites Konzert am Samstag nachmittag 2.30 Uhr in der Carnegie Hall folgendes Programm gewählt: "Rugby" von Honegger, "Rondes de Printemps" von Debussy, Ravels "Pavane" sowie "Alborada del Gracioso" und als Hauptwerk nach der Pause, die Vierte Symphonie von Gustav Mahler, wobei das Sopransolo im Finale von Nancy Carr übernommen wird.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
Circ. D. 200,371 - S. 297,328

AT THE MOSQUE

Shostakovich offered by Boston Symphony

By VIC de KEYSERLING

A capacity audience at the Mosque Theater last night heard one of this country's greatest orchestras interpreting one of the most controversial works of recent years.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Rich-

Boston Orchestra displayed the qualities which have earned it its world-wide

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 1957

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
Circ. D. 268,862 - S. 288,382

JAN 11 1957

Boston Concert

Burgin Conducts Visiting Symphony at Mosque in Program for Griffith Foundation

By ALAN BRANIGAN

The rare spectacle of a concertmaster taking over the conductor's job held considerable fascination for the huge audience that attended last night's concert by the Boston Symphony at the Mosque Theater under sponsorship of Griffith Music Foundation. The concertmaster is traditionally the leader of the first violin section, a position in which he translates the conductor's wishes to the other players and in general serves as executive officer.

The Boston's concertmaster, Richard Burgin, does not seem to be content merely to follow other men's baton-wavings. When he took up his own baton last night and led his fellow players through a complete program (Dr. Charles Munch, the regular conductor, was nowhere in sight), Burgin demonstrated that the Napoleonic axiom was right and that a private can carry a marshal's baton in his knapsack.

The Bostonians never could play badly, even on purpose, and although they committed a few bloopers last night the response to Burgin's leadership was warm and wholehearted. He has a baton technique of a highly developed sort. He apparently has definite ideas of how the music should go and, best of all, he gives his orchestra its head whenever the occasion demands. The result was a highly successful performance.

Most of the concert's more interesting portions were centered in that huge and diverse work, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5. The musical style of this modern (1937) Russian work was 20th Century without being ultra-modernistic. Some of the tried and true Soviet cliches were there, naturally—the march of the revolutionaries, the idyllic atmosphere of the collectives and other bits of propaganda that USSR composers are fond of building — perhaps by request — into their compositions.

But the listener could not fail to be transported by the wonderfully sound developments sections in Shostakovich's moody and often entertaining work. The long lines of interwoven themes, the oddly conceived and delicate clashes of counterpoint, the vast turbulence of percussion and brass, the nostalgic beauty of the waltz themes — all these combined in a memorable way under Burgin's leadership. The playing was magnificent, even if in spots it fell short of completely satisfying one's expectations.

Two other works also were played in uncommonly handsome fashion. One was Rossini's overture to "Semiramide," given the proper wow technique in its sizzling climaxes and brisk rhythms, and the other was Haydn's G Major Symphony, No. 88. This was a marvelous exercise in string playing, the Boston's violins, violas and cellos making the most of Haydn's decorative lacework of thematic material. The woodwinds were cast into the shade, but that seems to be today's custom in playing Haydn and Mozart with massive strings. The slow movement was especially memorable for its traceries of beautiful tone.

There were several ovations during the evening, the largest being elicited by the Shostakovich symphony.

The orchestra gave a masterful interpretation of a difficult and interesting composition.

* * *

CONDUCTOR BURGIN'S background, including an unusually varied and rich experience of Russian music and audiences, enabled him to carry last night's audience to great heights, even when some of Shostakovitch's inspirations by themselves might not have achieved this result.

The program was rounded out with Rossini's overture to the opera, "Semiramide," and Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 88. Here also the

New York

Stream, N. Y. Tel: LOcust 1-8192

Walter F. Loeb

Juilliard Dance Theater

Many Activities for Mrs. Clyde Bassler

The president of the Sunday Arts Group, Rev. Ruth Ann at a delightfully informal musicale-tea in her luxurious apartment on Lake Shore Drive. The program was presented by a brilliant young baritone, John Van Note, a pleasing and vivacious pianist, Florence Henline, and two young dramatic artists who gave an amusing skit. Mr. Van Note not only possesses a beautiful voice and sings with style and nice effects, but he chose the type of songs just right for the occasion, melodious favorites. He won warm applause.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Rafael Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this week on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 28 and 29. His program will consist of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, by Dmitri Shostakovitch.—Boston Herald.

Shostakovich? He invented the electric light bulb.

WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.

Ad in the Cleveland Plain Dealer

Going places? There's a limit to the compliments you'll get or the places you'll go in this smart coat.

1/10/57

Herold Corp.
Broadway
ide 77, N. Y.

...gin dirigiert Boston ...mony Orchester

... Burgin, Konzertmei-... Dirigent des Boston ... Orchestra, der mit ...strigen ersten Gast- ... Phantasie von Vau- ...ams, Schostakovitch, Symphonie und die ... von Beethoven — Eindrücke erzielte, hat ... zweites Konzert am Nachmittag 2.30 Uhr Carnegie Hall folgendes ... gewählt: "Rugby" ...egger, "Rondes de Prin-... Debussy, Ravels ... "Alborada del ... als Hauptwerk ... die Vierte Sym- ...on Gustav Mahler, wo- Sopransolo im Finale ...cy Carr übernommen

...s also more taut and ...re than it had been ...eethoven.

...Vaughan-Williams ...tch of 16th century ...rary England and ...nostalgic for spring ...oes with it, includ- ...is. The Bostonians ... they felt that way, ...nt beginning to an ...spelled satisfaction ... more than person-

...red ...ony

... Theater last ...est orchestras ...rsial works of

...estra displayed ... which have ...its world-wide ...nd which must ...n large measure ...irector, Charles

...MING events, ...he auspices of ... Music Founda- ... Gina Bachauer ... Piano Series ... Youth Concert ... 26; the famous ...aliano in the ...c Series at the ...torium on Jan. ...th Concert No.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 12 1957

...ard Burgin will conduct the con- ...f the Boston Symphony Orchestra ...phony Hall this week on Friday ...oon and Saturday evening, Dec. 28 ...9. His program will consist of ...an Williams' Fantasia on a Theme ...omas Tallis, for Double String Or- ... Beethoven's Fifth Symphony by ... Shostakovich. ...stakovich? He invented the elec- ...ght bulb.

...DS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.
...v. in the Cleveland Plain Dealer].
...ing places? There's a limit to the ...ments you'll get on the places you'll ...this smart coat.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

HARMONIOUS MARRIAGE . . . Violin virtuoso Ruth Posselt rehearses under the guidance of her husband, Richard Burgin, associate conductor and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for their joint performance at 8:30 tonight in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette ave.

Journal-American Photo by Paul Rice

Music Spices This Couple's Marriage

By JEANNE TOOMEY

Getting along maritally and musically without any sour notes is the secret formula of Ruth Posselt, the violinist, and Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who appear together tonight on the concert stage at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

This is one of the few times Mrs. Burgin will play under her husband's professional direction, although the couple have spent their lives in the music field.

She will appear as violin soloist with the orchestra in a performance of Bruch's Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor.

Burgin will conduct the third in the 1956-57 series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn.

Mrs. Burgin started playing the violin at three and is often dubbed "The World's Greatest Woman Violinist," a title she abhors.

Her paramount interest is still her home and family, a daughter, Diana, 12, and a son, Dicky, 8, who love music, but don't always like to attend concerts where their distinguished parents are featured, protesting: "Oh, we heard you play that!"

They're up in Brookline, Mass., where the Burgins have a big old-fashioned house with a large backyard and a treasure of a housekeeper.

How the talented pair who have toured the world get along without friction in the tempestuous combination of music and marriage was summed up by them both the other day.

"We have a very great mutual respect for each other and never quarrel," the usually gay Mrs. Burgin said seriously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

JAN 13 1957

Nancy Carr Sings in Mahler's Fourth At Concert Here of Boston Symphony

Richard Burgin assembled a rather strange program for his concert with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

The first half was all French; the second half consisted of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, with Nancy Carr as soprano soloist. The French section consisted of Honegger's dated-sounding "Rugby," Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and two short Ravel works— the "Pavane pour une Infante défunte" and "Alborada del gracioso."

After disposing of the French snippets in competent manner, Mr. Burgin turned his attention to the Mahler work with results that proved to be a little disappointing. He was not too successful holding the music together, and some of his balances were askew.

A case in point was the beginning of the third movement. Mr. Burgin had the strings much louder than the pianissimo indicated by the composer, and as a result the important counter-melody of the oboe was virtually inaudible.

Perhaps Mr. Burgin was not very familiar with the acoustics of Carnegie Hall. If so, that would explain some of the misjudgments in dynamics and balances. In any case it was a treat to hear this most lyric and charming of Mahler's symphonies once more.

Miss Carr sang her last-movement solo quite prettily, though without much intensity. There is a Viennese quality to the music that neither she nor Mr. Burgin managed to capture yesterday afternoon.

H. C. S.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JAN 11 1957

Guest Conductor

PIERRE MONTEUX will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts next week.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 12 1957

Clement Lenom Dies at 91, Former Symphony Oboist

Funeral services will be tomorrow for Clement Lenom, former Boston Symphony oboist and once a pupil of the composer Jules Massenet, and a conductor here and abroad.

He died Thursday at his home, 53 Addington Rd., Brookline, at the age of 91.

Born at Gilly, Belgium, he was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Brussels and at the Paris Conservatory of Music where he studied with Massenet. In France he was oboist with the Colonne Orchestra from 1885 to 1895 and conducted at Monte Carlo.

For "distinguished service to music" he received the honorary awards of Officier de l'Instruction Publique from the French government and that of Chevalier de la Couronne from the Belgian government.

He came to America in 1901 and was with the Boston Symphony from then until 1925 and four seasons conducted the Boston Pops Concerts.

From 1901 to 1942 he was instructor in oboe and wood-wind ensemble and head of the Solfege department at the New England Conservatory of Music. After retiring there he lived for a number of years in New York and returned to Boston in 1953.

He was a member of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lambda of America, the French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music, Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity and Euclid Lodge, A. F. & A.M.

He leaves his wife, Mary Bartlett Lenom.

Services will be at 2:30 p. m. in the Waterman Chapel, 495 Commonwealth Ave.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

JAN 13 1957

181

LONG WAY FROM MADISON AVE.

Value of Alternative TV Observed in Boston Station's Shows

By JACK GOULD

BOSTON.

IF all the dull speeches, academic treatises and lofty handouts on the subject of educational television were unceremoniously junked, it would be a public service. Educational television must be lived with before it makes sense.

Here in Boston there is the only noncommercial educational station on the Eastern seaboard, WGBH-TV, operated by the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council. After a sampling of the station's wares there need be no alarm that the Harvard faculty will supplant Dinah Shore and Lucille Ball in another thirteen weeks.

But it is equally apparent that Madison Avenue has scratched only one side of the medium: educational TV, despite its forbidding title, is one of the most hopeful remedies yet seen for what ails the electronic colossus. The lesson of WGBH-TV is that after a while a viewer can be entertained to death; there does come a time when it is refreshing to have the mind titillated with regularity and purpose.

Educational TV is an acquired taste. The beginner in the realm of noncommercialism at first may find it hard to take, especially until he learns the knack of tuning out the pedestrian professor. But with time and patience the viewer finds himself undergoing a subtle yet civilized emotional readjustment.

The pace of educational broadcasting is very much slower, the tone infinitely quieter, the goal very much more definitive. Educational TV, at least as represented by WGBH-TV, is stimulatingly presumptuous. It holds that a viewer is both ready and willing to contribute personally to the success of a program, that his role is not passive, that he is as selective in TV as he is in everything else. The viewer reared in the conviction that he is part of the body Trendex cannot instantaneously comprehend being treated as an individual; it is, frankly, strange.

How would any New Yorker feel, for instance, if amid the plethora of family adventure series, the miscellaneous mysteries, the plays and spectaculars there were these escapes:

Offerings

An occasional full, uninterrupted concert by the Boston Symphony; a series of lectures on co-existence by Hugh Gaitskell, British Labor leader; an exposure to psychology that includes a fascinating demonstration of hypnosis; a frank discussion of Congressional abuses of the rights of the private citizen; a hilarious analysis by an elder sociologist of the evils of 1957 décolletage; a quiz by a soft-spoken North Carolina girl on geology; a lesson in French; nightly commentary by Louis M. Lyons; a study of science, talks on art and a course in jazz.

The tireless WGBH-TV staff does not invariably ring the bell; in its chosen field its batting average is neither better nor worse than, say, the British Broadcasting Corporation or Young & Rubicam. In this regard educational TV is decidedly human.

But what Parker Wheatley, director of the Lowell council, and his colleagues are doing is to shove TV's horizons to the far-an yet do not fall within the ken of commercially popular entertainment diversion. It is the WGBH-TV premise that an audience is not a "mass" but composed of groups whose curiosity covers the whole range of human endeavor, of which popular entertainment is only one. It is to satisfy these complementary wants and hungers that WGBH-TV operates five days a week, from 5:15 to 10.15 P. M.

To burden such a service with the label of "education" is palpably both nonsense and unfair. For tax purposes the identification may be unavoidable. But judged from the standpoint of the layman, who admittedly may not fully share the educator's unrelenting sense of mission, the enormous and incalculable gain of educational television is that it introduces the element of realistic and sensible choice in the use of the airwaves.

"Alternative broadcasting" actually would be both a happier and more accurate description of WGBH-TV and the country's other noncommercial stations (twenty-two are on the air with regular programming).

Majority

It is the nature of commercial TV, if it is to keep its advertisers content and happy, to pursue the largest number of potential customers; this philosophy is both economically justifiable and understandable but it does impose inherent limitations on TV's scope. Essentially, it is what might be called "majority television." What cannot be forgotten is that there never can be a majority in anything unless the minority is not only preserved but nurtured.

But if minority television is to be a living reality, it cannot be put on the air at the times and places that happen to fit in with majority preferences. On Sundays in particular there is much fine, stimulating fare on the commercial networks. But during the run of week-day nights there is little or none. The achievement of WGBH-TV is that it fills this void; it assures a franchise on the airwaves for the minority set owner simultaneously with commercial TV's satisfaction of the majority preference. This alone is true choice, not between essentially similar TV shows but between basically different services.

Commercial broadcasters and advertisers should be the first to recognize the vital importance of minority or alternative television. Because one of the fascinating consequences of watching WGBH-TV is this: if there is some stimulating channel to which a viewer can turn regularly during peak evening week-day hours, he not only is far less likely to complain over what advertisers present but also enjoy it more.

And what does a WGBH-TV cost? Its basic budget is $200,000 a year. Of this sum, $100,000 is provided by the Lowell Institute. The other $100,000 comes from the participating groups in the broadcasting council: Harvard, Brandeis, Boston University, Boston College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Museum of Fine Arts, New England Conservatory of Music, Northeastern University, Tufts University and the Boston Symphony. A citizens' committee also raised $160,000 for the stations' first year.

WGBH-TV is blessed by a vast reservoir of free talent: the faculty members of the community's many educational institutions. Its average program cost, including such overhead as heat, lights and janitor service, runs to the fantastically small sum of roughly $300 an hour, or under $5,000 for its twenty-five hours of programming a week.

This is a pittance in television, yet substantial in education. One can only dream of the superb accomplishments that would be possible if the budgets of educational stations could be increased according to their worth and contribution. The live pickups they would be able to do, the improvements in production and the more extensive exchange of programs almost stagger the imagination.

Educational television has suffered not only from inadequate and disorganized public relations; it also has been handicapped in some quarters by a narrow concept of its teaching role. Educational television can have a direct in-school use, supplementing and aiding the live teacher, but its more exciting potential lies in going directly into the home. Here it cannot be limited by the pedagogic approach; the world should be its oyster, filling the wide voids inevitably left by commercial TV.

WGBH-TV is one of the fortunate educational stations; it has a license for a channel that can be seen on present sets. In many communities the only educational channel lies in the ultra high frequency range, for which a special adapter is necessary. Unhappily, this is true in New York. And, even more unfortunately, the Federal Communications Commission reportedly may abandon the reservation of channels for educational use.

Not Easy

None of educational television's problems are susceptible to easy solution; neither are they insurmountable. Frequency modulation radio faced the adapter difficulty, but since it provided an alternative to the general run of commercial broadcasting it has shown steady growth; the basic cost of a noncommercial U. H. F. station in New York might well be justified by its daytime use as a communications media for the school system and Police Department. In the evening it could be a WNYC in the home video field. Also there is always a chance that one of the existing commercial outlets might not be adverse to an offer.

Both the city and the Metropolitan Educational Television Association should perhaps see if there is not common ground on which they could explore the possibility of a single noncommercial station. Despite all the discouragements, the idea is at least worth renewed study, and perhaps this time more of New York's civic-minded leaders would lend a hand. For one fact is unalterable: a station WGBH-TV could be an asset for any community.

— more on page 183

1/10/57

Herold Corp.
30 Broadway
Glen Cove, N. Y.

...rgin dirigiert Boston ...hony Orchester

...ard Burgin, Konzertmei-... Dirigent des Boston ... Orchestra, der mit ...strigen ersten Gast-... Phantasie von Vau-...Williams, Schostakovitch, ...Symphonie und die ...von Beethoven — ...Eindrücke erzielte, hat ...zweites Konzert am ...Nachmittag 2.30 Uhr ...Carnegie Hall folgendes ...gewählt: "Rugby" ...negger, "Rondes de Prin-...von Debussy, Ravels ..., sowie "Alborada del ..." und als Hauptwerk ...Pause, die Vierte Sym-...von Gustav Mahler, wo-... Sopransolo im Finale ...Carr übernommen

...is also more taut and ...ere than it had been ...Beethoven.

...Vaughan-Williams ...atch of 16th century ...orary England and ...nostalgic for spring ...zzes with it, includ-...ids. The Bostonians ...if they felt that way, ...nt beginning to an ...spelled satisfaction ...e more than person-

...ered ...ony

...e Theater last ...test orchestras ...rsial works of

...estra displayed ...s which have ... its world-wide ...nd which must ...n large measure ...director, Charles

...OMING events, ...the auspices of ... Music Founda-... Gina Bachauer ...er Piano Series ... Youth Concert ...n. 26; the famous ...aliano in the ...sic Series at the ...itorium on Jan. ...uth Concert No.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 12 1957

...hard Burgin will conduct the con-...of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ...mphony Hall this week on Friday ...noon and Saturday evening, Dec. 28 ...29. His program will consist of ...han Williams' Fantasia on a Theme ...omas Tallis, for Double String Or-..., Beethoven's Fifth Symphony by ..., Shostakovitch. — Boston Herald.

...ostakovich? He invented the elec-...ght bulb.

...RDS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.
...dv. in the Cleveland Plain Dealer]
...ing places? There's a limit to the ...liments you'll get or the places you'll ...n this smart coat.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847

HARMONIOUS MARRIAGE . . . Violin virtuoso Ruth Posselt rehearses under the guidance of her husband, Richard Burgin, associate conductor and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for their joint performance at 8:30 tonight in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette ave.

Journal-American Photo by Paul Rice

Music Spices This Couple's Marriage

By JEANNE TOOMEY

Getting along maritally and musically without any sour notes is the secret formula of Ruth Posselt, the violinist, and Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who appear together tonight on the concert stage at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

This is one of the few times Mrs. Burgin will play under her husband's professional direction, although the couple have spent their lives in the music field.

She will appear as violin soloist with the orchestra in a performance of Bruch's Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor.

Burgin will conduct the third in the 1956-57 series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn.

Mrs. Burgin started playing the violin at three and is often dubbed "The World's Greatest Woman Violinist," a title she abhors.

Her paramount interest is still her home and family, a daughter, Diana, 12, and a son, Dicky, 8, who love music, but don't always like to attend concerts where their distinguished parents are featured, protesting: "Oh, we heard you play that!"

They're up in Brookline, Mass., where the Burgins have a big old-fashioned house with a large backyard and a treasure of a housekeeper.

How the talented pair who have toured the world get along without friction in the tempestuous combination of music and marriage was summed up by them both the other day.

"We have a very great mutual respect for each other and never quarrel," the usually gay Mrs. Burgin said seriously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

JAN 13 1957

Nancy Carr Sings in Mahler's Fourth At Concert Here of Boston Symphony

Richard Burgin assembled a rather strange program for his concert with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

The first half was all French; the second half consisted of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, with Nancy Carr as soprano soloist. The French section consisted of Honegger's dated-sounding "Rugby," Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and two short Ravel works— the "Pavane pour une Infante défunte" and "Alborada del gracioso."

After disposing of the French snippets in competent manner, Mr. Burgin turned his attention to the Mahler work with results that proved to be a little disappointing. He was not too successful holding the music together, and some of his balances were askew.

A case in point was the beginning of the third movement. Mr. Burgin had the strings much louder than the pianissimo indicated by the composer, and as a result the important counter-melody of the oboe was virtually inaudible.

Perhaps Mr. Burgin was not very familiar with the acoustics of Carnegie Hall. If so, that would explain some of the misjudgments in dynamics and balances. In any case it was a treat to hear this most lyric and charming of Mahler's symphonies once more.

Miss Carr sang her last-movement solo quite prettily, though without much intensity. There is a Viennese quality to the music that neither she nor Mr. Burgin managed to capture yesterday afternoon.

H. C. S.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JAN 11 1957

Guest Conductor

PIERRE MONTEUX will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts next week.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 1[illegible] 1957

Clement Len[illegible] Former Symp[illegible]

Funeral services will be [illegible] mer Boston Symphony oboist and [illegible] Jules Massenet, and a conductor here an[illegible]

He died Thursday at his home, 53 Addington Rd., Brookline, at the age of 91.

Born at Gilly, Belgium, he was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Brussels and at the Paris Conservatory of Music where he studied with Massenet. In France he was oboist with the Colonne Orchestra from 1885 to 1895 and conducted at Monte Carlo.

For "distinguished service to music" he received the honorary awards of Officier de l'Instruction Publique from the French government and that of Chevalier de la Couronne from the Belgian government.

He came to America in 1901 and was with the Boston Symphony from then until 1925 and four seasons com[illegible] Boston Pops Concerts.

From 1901 to 1942 he was instructor in oboe and wood-wind ensemble and head of the Solfege department at the New England Conservatory of Music. After retiring there he lived for a number of years in New York and returned to Boston in 1953.

He was a member of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lambda of America, the French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music, Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity and Euclid Lodge, A. F. & A.M.

He leaves his wife, Mary Bartlett Lenom.

Services will be at 2:30 p. m. in the Waterman Chapel, 495 Commonwealth Ave.

[illegible] Stock List Loses
[illegible]-rlier Gains
NEW YORK

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Circ. D. 534,376 - S. 1,149,467

JAN 13 1957

181

LONG WAY FROM MADISON AVE.

Value of Alternative TV Observed in Boston Station's Shows

By JACK GOULD

BOSTON.

If all the dull speeches, academic treatises and lofty handouts on the subject of educational television were unceremoniously junked, it would be a public service. Educational television must be lived with before it makes sense.

Here in Boston there is the only noncommercial educational station on the Eastern seaboard, WGBH-TV, operated by the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council. After a sampling of the station's wares there need be no alarm that the Harvard faculty will supplant Dinah Shore and Lucille Ball in another thirteen weeks.

But it is equally apparent that Madison Avenue has scratched only one side of the medium: educational TV, despite its forbidding title, is one of the most hopeful remedies yet seen for what ails the electronic colossus. The lesson of WGBH-TV is that after a while a viewer can be entertained to death; there does come a time when it is refreshing to have the mind titillated with regularity and purpose.

Educational TV is an acquired taste. The beginner in the realm of noncommercialism at first may find it hard to take, especially until he learns the knack of tuning out the pedestrian professor. But with time and patience the viewer finds himself undergoing a subtle yet civilized emotional readjustment.

The pace of educational broadcasting is very much slower, the tone infinitely quieter, the goal very much more definitive. Educational TV, at least as represented by WGBH-TV, is stimulatingly presumptuous. It holds that a viewer is both ready and willing to contribute personally to the success of a program, that his role is not passive, that he is as selective in TV as he is in everything else. The viewer reared in the conviction that he is part of the body Trendex cannot instantaneously comprehend being treated as an individual; it is, frankly, strange.

How would any New Yorker feel, for instance, if amid the plethora of family adventure series, the miscellaneous mysteries, the plays and spectaculars there were these escapes:

Offerings

An occasional full, uninterrupted concert by the Boston Symphony; a series of lectures on co-existence by Hugh Gaitskell, British Labor leader; an exposure to psychology that includes a fascinating demonstration of hypnosis; a frank discussion of Congressional abuses of the rights of the private citizen; a hilarious analysis by an elder sociologist of the evils of 1957 décolletage; a quiz by a soft-spoken North Carolina girl on geology; a lesson in French; nightly commentary by Louis M. Lyons; a study of science, talks on art and a course in jazz.

The tireless WGBH-TV staff does not invariably ring the bell; in its chosen field its batting average is neither better nor worse than, say, the British Broadcasting Corporation or Young & Rubicam. In this regard educational TV is decidedly human.

But what Parker Wheatley, director of the Lowell council, and his colleagues are doing is to open TV's horizons to those pursuits and interests that are an everyday part of adult life yet do not fall within the ken of commercially popular entertainment diversion. It is the WGBH-TV premise that an audience is not a "mass" but composed of groups whose curiosity covers the whole range of human endeavor, of which popular entertainment is only one. It is to satisfy these complementary wants and hungers that WGBH-TV operates five days a week, from 5:15 to 10.15 P. M.

To burden such a service with the label of "education" is palpably both nonsense and unfair. For tax purposes the identification may be unavoidable. But judged from the standpoint of the layman, who admittedly may not fully share the educator's unrelenting sense of mission, the enormous and incalculable gain of educational television is that it introduces the element of realistic and sensible choice in the use of the airwaves.

"Alternative broadcasting" actually would be both a happier and more accurate description of WGBH-TV and the country's other noncommercial stations (twenty-two are on the air with regular programming).

Majority

It is the nature of commercial TV, if it is to keep its advertisers content and happy, to pursue the largest number of potential customers; this philosophy is both economically justifiable and understandable but it does impose inherent limitations on TV's scope. Essentially, it is what might be called "majority television." What cannot be forgotten is that there never can be a majority in anything unless the minority is not only preserved but nurtured.

But if minority television is to be a living reality, it cannot be put on the air at the times and places that happen to fit in with majority preferences. On Sundays in particular there is much fine, stimulating fare on the commercial networks. But during the run of week-day nights there is little or none. The achievement of WGBH-TV is that it fills this void; it assures a franchise on the airwaves for the minority set owner simultaneously with commercial TV's satisfaction of the majority preference. This alone is true choice, not between essentially similar TV shows but between basically different services.

Commercial broadcasters and advertisers should be the first to recognize the vital importance of minority or alternative television. Because one of the fascinating consequences of watching WGBH-TV is this: if there is some stimulating channel to which a viewer can turn regularly during peak evening week-day hours, he not only is far less likely to complain over what advertisers present but also enjoy it more.

And what does a WGBH-TV cost? Its basic budget is $200,000 a year. Of this sum, $100,000 is provided by the Lowell Institute. The other $100,000 comes from the participating groups in the broadcasting council: Harvard, Brandeis, Boston University, Boston College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Museum of Fine Arts, New England Conservatory of Music, Northeastern University, Tufts University and the Boston Symphony. A citizens' committee also raised $160,000 for the stations' first year.

WGBH-TV is blessed by a vast reservoir of free talent: the faculty members of the community's many educational institutions. Its average program cost, including such overhead as heat, lights and janitor service, runs to the fantastically small sum of roughly $300 an hour, or under $5,000 for its twenty-five hours of programming a week.

This is a pittance in television, yet substantial in education. One can only dream of the superb accomplishments that would be possible if the budgets of educational stations could be increased according to their worth and contribution. The live pickups they would be able to do, the improvements in production and the more extensive exchange of programs almost stagger the imagination.

Educational television has suffered not only from inadequate and disorganized public relations; it also has been handicapped in some quarters by a narrow concept of its teaching role. Educational television can have a direct in-school use, supplementing and aiding the live teacher, but the more exciting potential lies in going directly into the home. Here it cannot be limited by the pedagogic approach; the world should be its oyster, filling the wide voids inevitably left by commercial TV.

WGBH-TV is one of the fortunate educational stations; it has a license for a channel that can be seen on present sets. In many communities the only educational channel lies in the ultra high frequency range, for which a special adapter is necessary. Unhappily, this is true in New York. And, even more unfortunately, the Federal Communications Commission reportedly may abandon the reservation of channels for educational use.

Not Easy

None of educational television's problems are susceptible to easy solution; neither are they insurmountable. Frequency modulation radio faced the adapter difficulty, but since it provided an alternative to the general run of commercial broadcasting it has shown steady growth; the basic cost of a noncommercial U. H. F. station in New York might well be justified by its daytime use as a communications media for the school system and Police Department. In the evening it could be a WNYC in the home video field. Also there is always a chance that one of the existing commercial outlets might not be adverse to an offer.

Both the city and the Metropolitan Educational Television Association should perhaps see if there is not common ground on which they could explore the possibility of a single noncommercial station. Despite all the discouragements, the idea is at least worth renewed study, and perhaps this time more of New York's civic-minded leaders would lend a hand. For one fact is unalterable: a station WGBH-TV could be an asset for any community.

TIGHT BINDING

187

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN 13 1957

Readers' Reactions Show Symphony Program Interest

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is quite some time since one of these musica articles has brought such a reader response as the one last Sunday devoted to the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts. Those attending the Tuesday and the Sunday afternoon series appear to be particularly vocal in their disapproval of the programs, but the response is general and unanimous: the readers say the programs are repetitious, restricted, inept and unimaginative.

And they came up with many a suggestion for the performance of works I overlooked. The writers need not, I think, be identified, but their suggestions are interesting. Several, for example, propose a whole list of works that might be programmed as off-the-path novelties worth an occasional outing at these concerts.

One list suggests the following: Beethoven's Jena Symphony, Bizet's Symphony No. 1, Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Glazounov's "The Seasons," Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, Kallinikov's Symphony No. 1; Saint Saens' Third Symphony; Smetana's "Ma Vlast," Vaughan Williams' Norfolk Rhapsody and Vainberg's Serenade for Strings.

Unheard in 48 Years

The writer also suggests such concertos as Gliere's Concerto for Harp and Orchestra, Bruch's "Scottish Rhapsody, Spohr's Violin Concerto No. 8 and Suk's Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra. He makes the point that the orchestra itself can provdide the soloists, which is true enough, but the concerto situation is largely in the hands of the soloists invited. This is unfortunate in many ways, as it means the neglect of the lesser-known concertos of Mozart and others, for a soloist usually feels that much of his success depends on the audience impact of the work chosen.

It may be said of the list above that Mr. Munch has done Saint Saens' Third in recent years, and he has also conducted the Bizet symphony and the Chaisson Symphony. Vainberg is unknown to me, but the Jena Symphony, which Beethoven certainly did not write, is interesting if only for its controversial value, while Goldmark's Rustic Wedding, old-fashioned although it is, is certainly worth doing. It hasn't been heard here in 48 years.

Another correspondent suggests C. P. E. Bach's Concerto for orchestra in Steinberg's arrangement: Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," Roussel's "Evocations," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and "La Bonne Chanson," and Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept."

Still another writer, touching on the fact that the early Haydn symphonies are delightful, asks for his Symphony No. 22 with the two English horns; Mendelssohn's "The Fair Melusina," not heard here since 1906; the same composer's "Scottish" Symphony; Locatelli's "Elegiac" Symphony; Boccherini's C major Symphony; Chadwick's Symphonic Studies; Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" and "Comedy Overture;" Hill's "Stevensoniana" and Foote's E major Suite.

He also points out that both Bruckner and Mahler are consistently overlooked, and would especially like to hear Mahler's Third. Others on his list are Strauss "Le Bourgeoise Gentilhomme;" Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne;" D'Indy's "Jour d'ete a la montange montagne;" and Sibelius First and Fourth.

Other suggestions by other writers range from John Knowles Paine's "The Tempest" to Roy Harris' Third Symphony; from Frederick the Great's D major Symphony to Foote's "Night Piece for Flute and Strings." So it would appear that there is plenty of room for investigation and if the works don't all turn out to be equal to the standard repertoire, what does that matter? It is certainly better, in my view (and evidently in my readers' view), to hear a long forgotten or overlooked work from time to time than to sit through endless repetitions of the standard symphonies of Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann, Tchaikovsky and so on, as well as works of Debussy, Ravel and others of the acknowledged heirarchy of music. That they have their place is undeniable: new members of the audience deserve to hear them while the old never really tire of them.

Yet an imaginative, even daring exploration of the long forgotten piece mentioned here and in last week's article, seems now called for. Some may be dusted off and found wanting; others may be dusted off and found novel and exciting. It doesn't much matter—if they are merely heard.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
JAN 14 1957

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

JAN 13 1957

What Ernest Newman Thinks Is Wrong With Music Critics; "Martyrdom of Roy Wilson"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ernest Newman, the music critic of the Sunday Times in London, has had a long and brilliant career; indeed, he has proved one of the greatest writers about music in the English tongue. His influence has been enormous, because he has worked with sharp perception and in the simple style of a truly informative writer. He also has written the definitive biography, in English, of Richard Wagner.

★ ★ ★

But in a piece which I happened to see because it was reprinted in the Boston Symphony Orchestra program books week before last, Mr. Newman states some peculiar—to say the least—views about his own profession and its practitioners. In this article, originally published a year ago, Mr. Newman sounds disillusioned and very old and tired.

DURGIN

"The craft is obviously sick," claims Mr. Newman, "and this being so, is it not time that the craftsmen themselves made an effort to trace the malady to its source?"

JUDGMENT

"What we call our critical judgment . . . is a balance struck by a number of hidden forces within us; the object put before us is instinctively referred by us to a complex of elements in ourselves—temperament, intellect, knowledge, experience and so on—and our final approval or disapproval is the expression, in quantity and quality, of the results of that impact; and there is so little fundamental resemblance between these subtle complexes in different individuals that it is little wonder that each of us has his own system of 'marking' that is only partially valid or quite invalid for others."

Mr. Newman then adds that one finds that attention to a given work or production "has been curiously intermittent." Since no two critics are intermittent at just the same moments, "need the public be surprised if next day or next week it reads two wholly different estimates of the work or the production?"

No, it need not, but not for the reasons that Mr. Newman gives. Music criticism is not an exact science, but a written personal account of how one person finds the quality of a work or performance, according to the hidden forces detailed above. All listeners, indeed, are critics, but most give their personal view for private consumption, while the professional critic gives his in public. Usually, and there is no need to hedge behind spurious modesty here, the professional critic is better informed, more experienced, and more sound in his judgement than the amateur.

If he were not, he would have no following of readers. The fact of human nature is that all of us differ in our views, in what moves, bores, pleases or displeases us. That is why the divergence of attitudes which so often is the case in published criticism. That is altogether healthy, logical, natural—and inevitable. That is why some readers prefer some critics—the ones who reflect their own views—and ignore others.

CONSCIENTIOUS

The professional critic knows that he has a responsibility to "call 'em as he sees 'em," because his readers want him to do that. Accordingly he is conscientious, and I strongly believe that he is not "intermittent" in his concentration. A new, big production likely will offer so much that it cannot be digested in one hearing, and two different critics likely will not be alike in what they first perceive to be the outstanding qualities of the production.

That, really, is what makes two quite different accounts of the same thing—not mental woolgathering.

Candidly, I think that writing about music today, on the part of its ablest practitioners—and I won't mention any names!—is on a higher general level than ever before. There is less romantic nonsense, less purely personal bias, a much greater interest in contemporary music, more simple writing, more attempt to inform the reader of the character of music and the nature of its performance, and an unceasing urge to strike a balance between the antithetical poles of subjective impression and objective judgment.

You never can reconcile the two, but the better you are, the nearer you come to achieving it.

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

JAN 13 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, grand old man of symphonic music, conducts the Boston Symphony next Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Pierre Monteux Conducts Symphony

Pierre Monteux, as guest conductor, will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and likewise next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20. His program will consist of the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Pulcinella"; preludes and interludes from Debussy's opera "Pelleas et Melisande"; and the "Enigma" Variations by Elgar.

In the following pair of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series, Jan. 25-26, Gregor Piatigorsky's postponed appearance will take place in the first performance of William Walton's new Cello Concerto.

A few tickets are still available for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Jan. 22. Charles Munch will present a varied program including Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge; "Rosalie" ("Prairie Call") by Jacques Ibert, in which the oboe solo will be performed by Ralph Gomberg, and Brahms' First Symphony.

Tickets for this concert, and also for the remaining concerts of the series, which will take place on Feb. 19, March 12, March 26 and April 9, may be obtained from the Subscription Office, Symphony Hall, (CO 6-1492).

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN 13 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday and Sunday at Symphony Hall.

'WAR AND PEACE' ON TV:

An Ambitious Staging Of Prokofieff's Opera

By MILES KASTENDIECK

UNDERTAKING its most ambitious project, the NBC Television Theatre gave the American premiere of Prokofieff's revised version of "War and Peace" in a color-cast yesterday afternoon. The work unfolded more as a television show than as an opera, just as though this was the kind of presentation that Prokofieff had in mind.

For this impression the producer, Samuel Chotzinoff, and especially his associates may take credit. The performance would have meant little, however, without a most acceptable English translation by Joseph Machlis. Since only minor cuts were made in this version of the opera, the lack of continuity in the story may be charged against Prokofieff and his librettist. The book has been so cut up—Pierre becomes secondary—that many might well ask what the real story is.

Herculean Task

Probably the original marathon opera, designed for two-night presentation, takes care of this matter. There is no wonder that the Metropolitan decided against producing it.

It was a Herculean task for the NBC Television Opera theatre to tackle the revised version. That they did it so well reflects great credit on their daring, their perseverance, and their resourcefulness.

Incidentally, they proved that a Met performance would have been technically unwise, if not impossible.

As for the opera, Prokofieff appears to have over-reached himself almost as much as Napoleon on his trip to Moscow. While revealing his great gifts as a composer, the musical substance of the opera lingers tentatively in the mind. Its finest moments are lyrical.

Prokofieff reveals depth of understanding in the story of Natasha and Andrey. It is during their scenes and in the moment of her disillusionment about Anatol that the score rises to its highest point. The lyric grace of these measures is notable.

Elsewhere in the course of the 12 scenes the music sounds functional. The Prokofieff touch is there but muffled, especially in the scene with Napoleon. The composer had more bite in "Alexander Nevsky," but his writing for dialogue is masterful.

NBC Television Opera Theatre assembled a cast of 92 singers and an orchestra of 60 for Peter Herman Adler to direct. This was the largest assemblage in its eight-year history.

The leading roles were well sung by Helena Scott as Natasha, Morley Meredith as Andrey, Linda McNaughton as Sonia, David Lloyd as Pierre, Davis Cuningham as Anatol, Gloria Lane as Helene, Kenneth Smith as Koutuzov, Chester Watson as Rostov, and Leon Lishner as Napoleon.

The production was shrewdly designed by Otis Riggs, with effective costumes for the color-cast by Guy Kent.

If the chief distinction in giving the opera turns out to be having done it, that is distinction indeed. Once again the Opera Theatre has made a splendid contribution to television.

Burgin Conducts

In providing a diverting program, Richard Burgin gave the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee audience a most agreeable concert. Honegger's "Rugby" conveyed a muscular exuberance at the start, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps", Ravel's "Pavane" and "Alborada del Gracioso", some pleasant impressionism; Mahler's Fourth Symphony, the sunny serenity of the composer in a most lyrical mood.

The performances reflected the nature of the music. While not wholly distinguished, they were much more than acceptable. Burgin's penchant for Mahler paid off nicely. The performance ingratiated the audience in his favor. Nancy Carr sang the soprano part in pleasing voice and manner.

TIGHT BINDING

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN 13 1957

Readers' Reactions Show Symphony Program Interest

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is quite some time since one of these musica articles has brought such a reader response as the one last Sunday devoted to the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts. Those attending the Tuesday and the Sunday afternoon series appear to be particularly vocal in their disapproval of the programs, but the response is general and unanimous: the readers say the programs are repetitious, restricted, inept and unimaginative.

And they came up with many a suggestion for the performance of works I overlooked. The writers need not, I think, be identified, but their suggestions are interesting. Several, for example, propose a whole list of works that might be programmed as off-the-path novelties worth an occasional outing at these concerts.

One list suggests the following: Beethoven's Jena Symphony, Bizet's Symphony No. 1, Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Glazounov's "The Seasons," Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, Kallinikov's Symphony No. 1; Saint Saens' Third Symphony; Smetana's "Ma Vlast," Vaughan Williams' Norfolk Rhapsody and Vainberg's Serenade for Strings.

Unheard in 48 Years

The writer also suggests such concertos as Gliere's Concerto for Harp and Orchestra, Bruch's "Scottish Rhapsody, Spohr's Violin Concerto No. 8 and Suk's Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra. He makes the point that the orchestra itself can provdide the soloists, which is true enough, but the concerto situation is largely in the hands of the soloists invited. This is unfortunate in many ways, as it means the neglect of the lesser-known concertos of Mozart and others, for a soloist usually feels that much of his success depends on the audience impact of the work chosen.

It may be said of the list above that Mr. Munch has done Saint Saens' Third in recent years, and he has also conducted the Bizet symphony and the Chaisson Symphony. Vainberg is unknown to me, but the Jena Symphony, which Beethoven certainly did not write, is interesting if only for its controversial value, while Goldmark's Rustic Wedding, old-fashioned although it is, is certainly worth doing. It hasn't been heard here in 48 years.

Another correspondent suggests C. P .E. Bach's Concerto for orchestra in Steinberg's arrangement: Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," Roussel's "Evocations," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and "La Bonne Chanson," and Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept."

Still another writer, touching on the fact that the early Haydn symphonies are delightful, asks for his Symphony No. 22 with the two English horns; Mendelssohn's "The Fair Melusina," not heard here since 1906; the same composer's "Scottish" Symphony; Locatelli's "Elegiac" Symphony; Boccherini's C major Symphony; Chadwick's Symphonic Studies; Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" and "Comedy Overture;" Hill's "Stevensoniana" and Foote's E major Suite.

He also points out that both Bruckner and Mahler are consistently overlooked, and would especially like to hear Mahler's Third. Others on his list are Strauss "Le Bourgeoise Gentilhomme;" Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne;" D'Indy's "Jour d'ete a la montange montagne;" and Sibelius' First and Fourth.

Other suggestions by other writers range from John Knowles Paine's "The Tempest" to Roy Harris' Third Symphony; from Frederick the Great's D major Symphony to Foote's "Night Piece for Flute and Strings." So it would appear that there is plenty of room for investigation and if the works don't all turn out to be equal to the standard repertoire, what does that matter? It is certainly better, in my view (and evidently in my readers' view), to hear a long forgotten or overlooked work from time to time than to sit through endless repetitions of the standard symphonies of Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann, Tchaikovsky and so on, as well as works of Debussy, Ravel and others of the acknowledged heirarchy of music. That they have their place is undeniable: new members of the audience deserve to hear them while the old never really tire of them.

Yet an imaginative, even daring exploration of the long forgotten piece mentioned here and in last week's article, seems now called for. Some may be dusted off and found wanting; others may be dusted off and found novel and exciting. It doesn't much matter—if they are merely heard.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
Circ. D. 653,991 - S. 855,847
JAN 14 1957

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

JAN 13 1957

What Ernest Newman Thinks Is Wrong With Music Critics; "Martyrdom of Roy Wilson"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ernest Newman, the music critic of the Sunday Times in London, has had a long and brilliant career; indeed, he has proved one of the greatest writers about music in the English tongue. His influence has been enormous, because he has worked with sharp perception and in the simple style of a truly informative writer. He also has written the definitive biography, in English, of Richard Wagner.

★ ★ ★

But in a piece which I happened to see because it was reprinted in the Boston Symphony Orchestra program books week before last, Mr. Newman states some peculiar—to say the least—views about his own profession and its practitioners. In this article, originally published a year ago, Mr. Newman sounds disillusioned and very old and tired.

DURGIN

"The craft is obviously sick," claims Mr. Newman, "and this being so, is it not time that the craftsmen themselves made an effort to trace the malady to its source?"

JUDGMENT

"What we call our critical judgment . . . is a balance struck by a number of hidden forces within us; the object put before us is instinctively referred by us to a complex of elements in ourselves—temperament, intellect, knowledge, experience and so on—and our final approval or disapproval is the expression, in quantity and quality, of the results of that impact; and there is so little fundamental resemblance between these subtle complexes in different individuals that it is little wonder that each of us has his own system of 'marking' that is only partially valid or quite invalid for others."

Mr. Newman then adds that one finds that attention to a given work or production "has been curiously intermittent." Since no two critics are intermittent at just the same moments, "need the public be surprised if next day or next week it reads two wholly different estimates of the work or the production?"

No, it need not, but not for the reasons that Mr. Newman gives. Music criticism is not an exact science, but a written personal account of how one person finds the quality of a work or performance, according to the hidden forces detailed above. All listeners, indeed, are critics, but most give their personal view for private consumption, while the professional critic gives his in public. Usually, and there is no need to hedge behind spurious modesty here, the professional critic is better informed, more experienced, and more sound in his judgement than the amateur.

If he were not, he would have no following of readers. The fact of human nature is that all of us differ in our views, in what moves, bores, pleases or displeases us. That is why the divergence of attitudes which so often is the case in published criticism. That is altogether healthy, logical, natural—and inevitable. That is why some readers prefer some critics—the ones who reflect their own views—and ignore others.

CONSCIENTIOUS

The professional critic knows that he has a responsibility to "call 'em as he sees 'em," because his readers want him to do that. Accordingly he is conscientious, and I strongly believe that he is not "intermittent" in his concentration. A new, big production likely will offer so much that it cannot be digested in one hearing, and two different critics likely will not be alike in what they first perceive to be the outstanding qualities of the production.

That, really, is what makes two quite different accounts of the same thing—not mental woolgathering.

Candidly, I think that writing about music today, on the part of its ablest practitioners—and I won't mention any names!—is on a higher general level than ever before. There is less romantic nonsense, less purely personal bias, a much greater interest in contemporary music, more simple writing, more attempt to inform the reader of the character of music and the nature of its performance, and an unceasing urge to strike a balance between the antithetical poles of subjective impression and objective judgment.

You never can reconcile the two, but the better you are, the nearer you come to achieving it.

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 374,544

PIERRE MONTEUX, grand old man of symphonic music, conducts the Boston Symphony next Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Pierre Monteux Conducts Symphony

Pierre Monteux, as guest conductor, will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and likewise next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20. His program will consist of the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Pulcinella"; preludes and interludes from Debussy's opera "Pelleas et Melisande"; and the "Enigma" Variations by Elgar.

In the following pair of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series, Jan. 25-26, Gregor Piatigorsky's postponed appearance will take place in the first performance of William Walton's new Cello Concerto.

A few tickets are still available for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Jan. 22. Charles Munch will present a varied program including Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge; "Excelsior" "Polish Call") by Jacques Ibert, in which the oboe solo will be performed by Ralph Gomberg, and Brahms' First Symphony.

Tickets for this concert, and those for the remaining concerts of the series, which will take place on Feb. 19, March 12, March 26 and April 9, may be obtained from the Subscription Office, Symphony Hall. (CO 6-1492).

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 253,604

JAN 13 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday and Sunday at Symphony Hall.

'WAR AND PEACE' ON TV:

An Ambitious Staging Of Prokofieff's Opera

By MILES KASTENDIECK

UNDERTAKING its most ambitious project, the NBC Television Theatre gave the American premiere of Prokofieff's revised version of "War and Peace" in a color-cast yesterday afternoon. The work unfolded more as a television show than as an opera, just as though this was the kind of presentation that Prokofieff had in mind.

For this impression the producer, Samuel Chotzinoff, and especially his associates may take credit. The performance would have meant little, however, without a most acceptable English translation by Joseph Machlis. Since only minor cuts were made in this version of the opera, the lack of continuity in the story may be charged against Prokofieff and his librettist. The book has been so cut up—Pierre becomes secondary—that many might well ask what the real story is.

Herculean Task

Probably the original marathon opera, designed for two-night presentation, takes care of this matter. There is no wonder that the Metropolitan decided against producing it.

It was a Herculean task for the NBC Television Opera theatre to tackle the revised version. That they did it so well reflects great credit on their daring, their perseverance, and their resourcefulness.

Incidentally, they proved that a Met performance would have been technically unwise, if not impossible.

As for the opera, Prokofieff appears to have over-reached himself almost as much as Napoleon on his trip to Moscow. While revealing his great gifts as a composer, the musical substance of the opera lingers tentatively in the mind. Its finest moments are lyrical.

Prokofieff reveals depth of understanding in the story of Natasha and Andrey. It is during their scenes and in the moment of her disillusionment about Anatol that the score rises to its highest point. The lyric grace of these measures is notable.

Elsewhere in the course of the 12 scenes the music sounds functional. The Prokofieff touch is there but muffled, especially in the scene with Napoleon. The composer had more bite in "Alexander Nevsky," but his writing for dialogue is masterful.

NBC Television Opera Theatre assembled a cast of 92 singers and an orchestra of 60 for Peter Herman Adler to direct. This was the largest assemblage in its eight-year history.

The leading roles were well sung by Helena Scott as Natasha, Morley Meredith as Andrey, Linda McNaughton as Sonia, David Lloyd as Pierre, Davis Cuningham as Anatol, Gloria Lane as Helene, Kenneth Smith as Koutuzov, Chester Watson as Rostov, and Leon Lishner as Napoleon.

The production was shrewdly designed by Otis Riggs, with effective costumes for the color-cast by Guy Kent.

If the chief distinction in giving the opera turns out to be having done it, that is distinction indeed. Once again the Opera Theatre has made a splendid contribution to television.

Burgin Conducts

In providing a diverting program, Richard Burgin gave the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee audience a most acceptable concert. Honegger's "Rugby" conveyed a muscular exuberance at the start, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps", Ravel's "Pavane" and "Alborada del Gracioso", some pleasant impressionism; Mahler's Fourth Symphony, the sunny smile of the composer in a most lyrical mood.

The performances reflected the nature of the music. While not wholly distinguished, they were much more than acceptable. Burgin's penchant for Mahler paid off nicely. The performance ingratiated the audience in his favor. Nancy Carr sang the soprano part in pleasing voice and manner.

INFORMATION OBSCURED TIGHT BINDING

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Circ. D. 336,443 · S. 528,253
JAN 14 1957

Boston Orchestra Plays Under Burgin's Direction

By Francis D. Perkins

Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster and associate conductor, chose an unusual and well diversified program for this admirable orchestra's concert under his direction Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, ranging from music inspired by football to the edible and musical delights of Heaven as depicted in Mahler's Fourth Symphony. The late Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" was followed by three other short French works, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante defunte" and "Alborada del Gracioso."

Honegger's "Rugby" is the second of his three "Mouvements Symphoniques"; the first is "Pacific 231." That noted musical locomotive once traveled here frequently, but now seldom leaves the roundhouse, while "Rugby" has not been played here for twenty-four years. Neither work represents the deep and mature musical thought of Honegger's later compositions, but "Rugby" is interesting in illustrating his success in realizing his objective of expressing the moods and rhythms of the game, rather than trying for a musical description of its course.

The interpretation under Mr Burgin's leadership was clear and revealing; the muscular rhythms of the music were flexibly wrought. More might have been disclosed of its occasional competitive emotion, but the sense of enthusiasm and well being which often characterizes it was vivdly expressed. Imaginative and less evocative moments marked the lucid, well balanced performance of the Debussy work. Memorable lyric warmth and difinified emotion pervaded the Pavane; the Alborada was played with brilliance and contrast, revealing its Spanish atmosphere.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony has not the apocalyptic aims of some of its companions, or the philosophic resignation of some of his last works; with its constant engaging fanciful imagination and melodic generosity, it poses no problems for its hearers. The performance represented both the orchestra's skill and the conductor's thorough understanding of the music in its various moods, including the initial macavre veiling of the second movement's folkkish lilt; it was discerning, poetic, not sentimentalized.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 16 1957

SPEAKER—Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will address a luncheon meeting of the Publicity Club of Boston on Jan. 23 at the Hotel Vendome. His topic will be "The Public Relations Job of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's European Tour."

d old man of sympho
mphony next Friday, Sa

ucts Symphony

t a varied program incl njamin Britten's Variation ring Orchestra on a Them
ank Bridge; "Escales" "Po ll") by Jacques Ibert, in w
oboe solo will be perfo
Ralph Gomberg, and Brah
st Symphony.
Tickets for this concert, and the remaining concerts o ies, which will take plac 19, March 12, March 26, il 9, may be obtained from scription Office, Sympho
(CO 6-1492).

Sunday He BOSTON, M
Independent Re
Circ. 253,
JAN 13 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, will conduct the Boston phony Orchestra on Fr Saturday and Sunday Symphony Hall.

Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 16,250 free
JAN 17 1957

C. Lenom Dies At Home Here

Clement Lenom of Brookline, former Boston Symphony Orchestra oboist and a conductor in this country and abroad, died last Thursday at his home on Addington Rd. in his 91st year. Funeral services were held Sunday afternoon at the Waterman Chapel in Boston.

Born in Gilly, Belgium, Mr. Lenom was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Brussels and the Paris Conservatory of Music, where he studied with Jule Massenet, famed composer. He was oboist with the Colonne Symphony Orchestra in Paris from 1885 to 1895 and conducted at Monte Carlo. He received the honorary awards of Officer de l'Instructor Publique from the French Government and of Chevalier de la Couronne from the Belgian Government for "distinguished service to music."

Mr. Lenom came to the United States in 1901 and was with the Boston Symphony until 1925, meanwhile conducting the Boston Pops Concerts four seasons. He was instructor in oboe and woodwind ensemble and head of the solfege department at the Boston Conservatory of Music from 1901 to 1942. He then lived in New York City a number of years and returned to Boston in 1953. He was a member of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lambda of America, French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music, Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity and Euclid Lodge of Masons. He leaves his wife.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 16 1957

Toscanini, 89, Dies Of Stroke

NEW YORK (AP) — Arturo Toscanini, a poor Italian boy who became one of the world's foremost orchestra conductors, died in his sleep today. He was 89.

Death occurred at his home in Riverdale, The Bronx, at 8:40 a. m. His son Walter, said the famous maestro had suffered a stroke on New Year's Day and had not fully recovered from it.

Toscanini's brilliant career spanned 70 years, and won him virtually every honor the musical world has to offer.

In Boston, Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that with Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

He already had scored great success before he came to the United States in 1908. In this country he swept on to the heights.

For seven seasons he conducted at the renowned Metropolitan Opera in New York—during the era of such never-to-be forgotten artists as Caruso, Melba and Scotti. But a disagreement, never explained, caused him to quit the Met in 1915, never to return.

Subsequently, he directed the New York Philharmonic Sym-

TOSCANINI
(Continued on Page Six)

Arturo Toscanini

Toscanini

(Continued from First Page)

phony and the National Broadcasting Co. Symphony Orchestra. The latter brought him closer to the American public than any of his other endeavors.

Toscanini conducted his last concert with the NBC Symphony at Carnegie Hall April 4, 1954. But neither the capacity audience nor those who heard the program on radio knew it was his farewell.

RETIREMENT TOLD AFTER CONCERT

His retirement was made known after the concert by the release of letters exchanged previously between Toscanini and David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corp. of America. This was in accord with the maestro's wish that news of his retirement should be withheld until after his final appearance with the orchestra which he had led for 17 years.

His last concert was an all-Wagner program. As he stepped off the podium, as the last chord of "Die Meistersinger" overture sounded, his baton slipped from his hand. A member of the orchestra picked it up and handed it to him. Then Toscanini slowly walked off. He was applauded for many minutes by the audience.

Toscanini did not return.

Toscanini, known as a severe taskmaster and a perfectionist in his direction, was hailed by many as "the greatest living conductor."

PATH TO SUCCESS NOT EASY ONE

But his path to success was not an easy one. Although he surmounted the obstacles of poverty to win musical recognition at the beginning, it was a whim of fate that made him a conductor.

Born to a poor tailor and his wife in Parma, Italy, music beckoned to the young Toscanini at an age when most boys are occupied only by the games and diversions of childhood.

At 9 he entered a conservatory in Parma. Students lived at the school, operated along monastic lines.

The food there was of a very plain nature. The students seldom were treated to meat. To get this delicacy, they had to give up coupons.

Toscanini, who loved music better than food, took to selling his meat coupons to boys with greater means. He used the money thus obtained to buy music.

He was graduated in piano and cello, winning honors in composition.

FELT COMPOSITION BELOW STANDARD

However, he did not pursue composition because he felt that "whatever I composed would fall below the standard I set for myself."

The strange twist of fate that brought him to the podium to stay occurred in 1886 when Toscanini was just 19.

He had taken a job with a touring opera company headed for South America.

There in Rio de Janeiro, the Brazilian conductor got into a quarrel with some of the Italian artists before a performance of Verdi's opera, "Aida."

The Brazilian audience, out of loyalty to the conductor, hissed the orchestra's Italian conductor off the stage when he sought to take over the baton. The orchestra's chorus master met the same fate. Confusion reigned.

THOUGHT HE WOULDN'T SHOW UP

Toscanini, then a cellist with the touring orchestra, had thought once that evening he wouldn't even show up for the performance.

But he changed his mind at the last moment and arrived late—slipping into his usual chair unnoticed.

Women in the company's chorus became greatly worried, for fear they would be stranded far away from home. One spied the tardy Toscanini and set up a cry: "He will save us! He knows all the operas by heart!"

Fellow musicians, snatching at the last straw, handed Toscanini a baton. He went to work in the masterly fashion, so well known later in his career, and the audience, jeering and laughing over what they expected to be a fiasco, shortly subsided to rapt attention.

When the performance was concluded, the audience rose with resounding cheers. Toscanini's fortune was made.

STILL ROCKY TIMES AHEAD

Even so, there still were a few rocky times ahead. Such as the beating he received, at the age of 64, from some of Mussolini's black-shirts. The maestro had refused to play the Fascist anthem, contending it was "not music."

Globe music writer hears many tales of great and strange genius at funeral of Arturo Toscanini

A Sweet Tyrant

Smashed music rack to bits when he did not like rehearsal.

* * *

Stormed off to So. America when singer said she was star.

* * *

Listened to all sorts of radio music.

* * *

Proudly said: "I am well born. I am a peasant."

By CYRUS DURGIN

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—A great light in music was extinguished when Arturo Toscanini died this week. This was not only the death of an eminent man and a supreme musician, but the end of an era.

There had been no one quite like Toscanini. Without him the musical world will never be quite the same again. For so many years Toscanini had been with us, it seemed almost that we should never be without him.

Even in the self-centered hustle of Manhattan, people seemed to feel it. The cab driver who sped me to the Campbell Funeral Church at Madison av. and 81st st., where the body of the conductor was to lie in state until the requiem mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral, remarked about it.

"Too bad Toscanini died," he murmured as I paid him.

This was last Wednesday at 1:30 in the afternoon, and already 150 or 200 persons were waiting in the damp cold on the sidewalk outside Campbell's. The doors had been announced to open at 1, but there had been a delay. The family naturally wanted a few more minutes alone with their dead.

TOSCANINI
Page A-One

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 27,844
JAN 16 1957

Pierre Monteux Mourns 'Greatest Conductor'

BOSTON (UP) — Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that with Arturo Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

Monteux is guest conductor for Charles Munch, who is vacationing in Paris.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 17 1957

Munch Will Fly To Toscanini Rites

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 26,118
JAN 17 1957

Toscanini "Greatest", Says Monteux

BOSTON (AP) — Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco symphony, today described Arturo Toscanini as the world's "greatest conductor."

"With the passing of Arturo Toscanini," Monteux said, "I lost one of my closest friends and the world lost its greatest conductor."

The comment was made to WBZ-TV as Monteux left New York for Boston to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the winter vacation of Charles Munch, its music director.

INFORMATION OBSCURED TIGHT BINDING

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 14 1957

Boston Orchestra Plays Under Burgin's Direction

By Francis D. Perkins

Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster and associate conductor, chose an unusual and well diversified program for this admirable orchestra's concert under his direction Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, ranging from music inspired by football to the edible and musical delights of Heaven as depicted in Mahler's Fourth Symphony. The late Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" was followed by three other short French works, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante defunte" and "Alborada del Gracioso."

Honegger's "Rugby" is the second of his three "Mouvements Symphoniques"; the first is "Pacific 231." That noted musical locomotive once traveled here frequently, but now seldom leaves the roundhouse while "Rugby" has not been played here for twenty-four years. Neither work represents the deep and mature musical thought of Honegger's later compositions, but "Rugby" is interesting in illustrating his success in realizing his objective of expressing the moods and rhythms of the game, rather than trying for a musical description of its course.

The interpretation under Mr Burgin's leadership was clear and revealing; the muscular rhythms of the music were flexibly wrought. More might have been disclosed of its occasional competitive emotion, but the sense of enthusiasm and well being which often characterizes it was vivdly expressed. Imaginative and less evocative moments marked the lucid, well balanced performance of the Debussy work. Memorable lyric warmth and difinified emotion pervaded the Pavane; the Alborada was played with brilliance and contrast, revealing its Spanish atmosphere.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony has not the apocalyptic aims of some of its companions, or the philosophic resignation of some of his last works; with its constant engaging fanciful imagination and melodic generosity, it poses no problems for its hearers. The performance represented both the orchestra's skill and the conductor's thorough understanding of the music in its various moods, including the initial macavre veiling of the second movement's folkkish lilt; it was discerning, poetic, not sentimentalized.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 16 1957

d old man of sympho
mphony next Friday, Sa

ducts Symphony

nt a varied program incl enjamin Britten's Variation
ring Orchestra on a Them
ank Bridge; "Escales" "Por ll") by Jacques Ibert, in w e oboe solo will be perfor
Ralph Gomberg, and Brah
rst Symphony.
Tickets for this concert, and the remaining concerts of ies, which will take place
b. 19, March 12, March 26, ril 9, may be obtained from bscription Office, Symph
ll. (CO 6-1492).

SPEAKER—Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will address a luncheon meeting of the Publicity Club of Boston on Jan. 23 at the Hotel Vendome. His topic will be "The Public Relations Job of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's European Tour."

Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 16,250 free
JAN 17 1957

C. Lenom Dies At Home Here

Clement Lenom of Brookline, former Boston Symphony Orchestra oboist and a conductor in this country and abroad, died last Thursday at his home on Addington Rd. in his 91st year. Funeral services were held Sunday afternoon at the Waterman Chapel in Boston.

Born in Gilly, Belgium, Mr. Lenom was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Brussels and the Paris Conservatory of Music, where he studied with Jule Massenet, famed composer. He was oboist with the Colonne Symphony Orchestra in Paris from 1885 to 1895 and conducted at Monte Carlo. He received the honorary awards of Officer de l'Instructor Publique from the French Government and of Chevalier de la Couronne from the Belgian Government for "distinguished service to music."

Mr. Lenom came to the United States in 1901 and was with the Boston Symphony until 1925, meanwhile conducting the Boston Pops Concerts four seasons. He was instructor in oboe and woodwind ensemble and head of the solfege department at the Boston Conservatory of Music from 1901 to 1942. He then lived in New York City a number of years and returned to Boston in 1953. He was a member of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lambda of America, French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music, Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity and Euclid Lodge of Masons. He leaves his wife.

Sunday He BOSTON, M
Independent Re
Circ. 253,6
JAN 1 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday and Sunday at Symphony Hall.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 16 1957

Toscanini, 89, Dies Of Stroke

NEW YORK (AP) — Arturo Toscanini, a poor Italian boy who became one of the world's foremost orchestra conductors, died in his sleep today. He was 89.

Death occurred at his home in Riverdale, The Bronx, at 8:40 a. m. His son Walter, said the famous maestro had suffered a stroke on New Year's Day and had not fully recovered from it.

Toscanini's brilliant career spanned 70 years, and won him virtually every honor the musical world has to offer.

In Boston, Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that with Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

He already had scored great success before he came to the United States in 1908. In this country he swept on to the heights.

For seven seasons he conducted at the renowned Metropolitan Opera in New York—during the era of such never-to-be forgotten artists as Caruso, Melba and Scotti. But a disagreement, never explained, caused him to quit the Met in 1915, never to return.

Subsequently, he directed the New York Philharmonic Sym-

TOSCANINI
(Continued on Page Six)

Arturo Toscanini

Toscanini

(Continued from First Page)

phony and the National Broadcasting Co. Symphony Orchestra. The latter brought him closer to the American public than any of his other endeavors.

Toscanini conducted his last concert with the NBC Symphony at Carnegie Hall April 4, 1954. But neither the capacity audience nor those who heard the program on radio knew it was his farewell.

RETIREMENT TOLD AFTER CONCERT

His retirement was made known after the concert by the release of letters exchanged previously between Toscanini and David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corp. of America. This was in accord with the maestro's wish that news of his retirement should be withheld until after his final appearance with the orchestra which he had led for 17 years.

His last concert was an all-Wagner program. As he stepped off the podium, as the last chord of "Die Meistersinger" overture sounded, his baton slipped from his hand. A member of the orchestra picked it up and handed it to him. Then Toscanini slowly walked off. He was applauded for many minutes by the audience.

Toscanini did not return.

Toscanini, known as a severe taskmaster and a perfectionist in his direction, was hailed by many as "the greatest living conductor."

PATH TO SUCCESS NOT EASY ONE

But his path to success was not an easy one. Although he surmounted the obstacles of poverty to win musical recognition at the beginning, it was a whim of fate that made him a conductor.

Born to a poor tailor and his wife in Parma, Italy, music beckoned to the young Toscanini at an age when most boys are occupied only by the games and diversions of childhood.

At 9 he entered a conservatory at Parma. Students lived at the school, operated along monastic lines.

The food there was of a very plain nature. The students seldom were treated to meat. To get this delicacy, they had to give up coupons.

Toscanini, who loved music better than food, took to selling his meat coupons to boys with greater means. He used the money thus obtained to buy music.

He was graduated in piano and cello, winning honors in composition.

FELT COMPOSITION BELOW STANDARD

However, he did not pursue composition because he felt that "whatever I composed would fall below the standard I set for myself."

The strange twist of fate that brought him to the podium to stay occurred in 1886 when Toscanini was just 19.

He had taken a job with a touring opera company headed for South America.

There in Rio de Janeiro, the Brazilian conductor got into a quarrel with some of the Italian artists before a performance of Verdi's opera, "Aida."

The Brazilian audience, out of loyalty to the conductor, hissed the orchestra's Italian conductor off the stage when he sought to take over the baton. The orchestra's chorus master met the same fate. Confusion reigned.

THOUGHT HE WOULDN'T SHOW UP

Toscanini, then a cellist with the touring orchestra, had thought once that evening he wouldn't even show up for the performance.

But he changed his mind at the last moment and arrived late—slipping into his usual chair unnoticed.

Women in the company's chorus became greatly worried, for fear they would be stranded far away from home. One spied the tardy Toscanini and set up a cry: "He will save us! He knows all the operas by heart!"

Fellow musicians, snatching at the last straw, handed Toscanini a baton. He went to work in the masterly fashion, so well known later in his career, and the audience, jeering and laughing over what they expected to be a fiasco, shortly subsided to rapt attention.

When the performance was concluded, the audience rose with resounding cheers. Toscanini's fortune was made.

STILL ROCKY TIMES AHEAD

Even so, there still were a few rocky times ahead. Such as the beating he received, at the age of 64, from some of Mussolini's black-shirts. The maestro had refused to play the Fascist anthem, contending it was "not music."

Globe music writer hears many tales of great and strange genius at funeral of Arturo Toscanini

A Sweet Tyrant

Smashed music rack to bits when he did not like rehearsal.

* * *

Stormed off to So. America when singer said she was star.

* * *

Listened to all sorts of radio music.

* * *

Proudly said: "I am well born. I am a peasant."

By CYRUS DURGIN

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—A great light in music was extinguished when Arturo Toscanini died this week. This was not only the death of an eminent man and a supreme musician, but the end of an era.

There had been no one quite like Toscanini. Without him the musical world will never be quite the same again. For so many years Toscanini had been with us, it seemed almost that we should never be without him.

Even in the self-centered hustle of Manhattan, people seemed to feel it. The cab driver who sped me to the Campbell Funeral Church at Madison av. and 81st st., where the body of the conductor was to lie in state until the requiem mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral, remarked about it.

"Too bad Toscanini died," he murmured as I paid him.

This was last Wednesday at 1:30 in the afternoon, and already 150 or 200 persons were waiting in the damp cold on the sidewalk outside Campbell's. The doors had been announced to open at 1, but there had been a delay. The family naturally wanted a few more minutes alone with their dead.

TOSCANINI
Page A-One

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 27,844
JAN 16 1957

Pierre Monteux Mourns 'Greatest Conductor'

BOSTON (UP) — Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that with Arturo Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

Monteux is guest conductor for Charles Munch, who is vacationing in Paris.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 17 1957

Munch Will Fly To Toscanini Rites

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 26,118
JAN 17 1957

Toscanini "Greatest", Says Monteux

BOSTON (AP) — Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco symphony, today described Arturo Toscanini as the world's "greatest conductor."

"With the passing of Arturo Toscanini," Monteux said, "I lost one of my closest friends and the world lost its greatest conductor."

The comment was made to WBZ-TV as Monteux left New York for Boston to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the winter vacation of Charles Munch, its music director.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TIGHT BINDING

183

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 14 1957

Boston Orchestra Plays Under Burgin's Direction

By Francis D. Perkins

Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster and associate conductor, chose an unusual and well diversified program for this admirable orchestra's concert under his direction Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, ranging from music inspired by football to the edible and musical delights of Heaven as depicted in Mahler's Fourth Symphony. The late Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" was followed by three other short French works, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante defunte" and "Alborada del Gracioso."

Honegger's "Rugby" is the second of his three "Mouvements Symphoniques"; the first is "Pacific 231." That noted musical locomotive once traveled here frequently, but now seldom leaves the roundhouse, while "Rugby" has not been played here for twenty-four years. Neither work represents the deep and mature musical thought of Honegger's later compositions, but "Rugby" is interesting in illustrating his success in realizing his objective of expressing the moods and rhythms of the game, rather than trying for a musical description of its course.

The interpretation under Mr Burgin's leadership was clear and revealing; the muscular rhythms of the music were flexibly wrought. More might have been disclosed of its occasional competitive emotion, but the sense of enthusiasm and well being which often characterizes it was vividly expressed. Imaginative and less evocative moments marked the lucid, well balanced performance of the Debussy work. Memorable lyric warmth and difinified emotion pervaded the Pavane; the Alborada was played with brilliance and contrast, revealing its Spanish atmosphere.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony has not the apocalyptic aims of some of its companions, or the philosophic resignation of some of his last works; with its constant engaging fanciful imagination and melodic generosity, it poses no problems for its hearers. The performance represented both the orchestra's skill and the conductor's thorough understanding of the music in its various moods, including the initial macavre veiling of the second movement's folkkish lilt; it was discerning, poetic, not sentimentalized.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 16 1957

rand old man of sympho
Symphony next Friday, Sa

nducts Symphony sent a varied program incl

Benjamin Britten's Variation
String Orchestra on a Them
Frank Bridge; "Escales" "Po
Call") by Jacques Ibert, in w the oboe solo will be perfo by Ralph Gomberg, and Brah
First Symphony.

Tickets for this concert, and for the remaining concerts o series, which will take plac
Feb. 19, March 12, March 26,
April 9, may be obtained from Subscription Office, Sympl
Hall. (CO 6-1492).

PEAKER—Thomas D. Perry
, manager of the Boston Symony Orchestra, will address a uncheon meeting of the Publicity lub of Boston on Jan. 23 at the otel Vendome. His topic will be "The Public Relations Job of the oston Symphony Orchestra's uropean Tour."

Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Non-Partisan
Circ. 16,250 free
JAN 17 1957

C. Lenom Dies At Home Here

Clement Lenom of Brookline, former Boston Symphony Orchestra oboist and a conductor in this country and abroad, died last Thursday at his home on Addington Rd. in his 91st year. Funeral services were held Sunday afternoon at the Waterman Chapel in Boston.

Born in Gilly, Belgium, Mr. Lenom was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Brussels and the Paris Conservatory of Music, where he studied with Jule Massenet, famed composer. He was oboist with the Colonne Symphony Orchestra in Paris from 1885 to 1895 and conducted at Monte Carlo. He received the honorary awards of Officer de l'Instructor Publique from the French Government and of Chevalier de la Couronne from the Belgian Government for "distinguished service to music."

Mr. Lenom came to the United States in 1901 and was with the Boston Symphony until 1925, meanwhile conducting the Boston Pops Concerts four seasons. He was instructor in oboe and woodwind ensemble and head of the solfege department at the Boston Conservatory of Music from 1901 to 1942. He then lived in New York City a number of years and returned to Boston in 1953. He was a member of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lambda of America, French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music, Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity and Euclid Lodge of Masons. He leaves his wife.

Sunday He
BOSTON,
Independent Re
Circ. 253,
JAN 13 1957

PIERRE MONTEUX, will conduct the Boston phony Orchestra on F Saturday and Sunday Symphony Hall.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 16 1957

Toscanini, 89, Dies Of Stroke

Arturo Toscanini

De at his home nx, at 8:40 said the ffered a ay and om it. reer im

In Boston, Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that with Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

He already had scored great success before he came to the United States in 1908. In this country he swept on to the heights.

For seven seasons he conducted at the renowned Metropolitan Opera in New York—during the era of such never-to-be forgotten artists as Caruso, Melba and Scotti. But a disagreement, never explained, caused him to quit the Met in 1915, never to return.

Subsequently, he directed the New York Philharmonic Sym-

TOSCANINI
(Continued on Page Six)

Toscanini

(Continued from First Page)

phony and the National Broadcasting Co. Symphony Orchestra. The latter brought him closer to the American public than any of his other endeavors.

Toscanini conducted his last concert with the NBC Symphony at Carnegie Hall April 4, 1954. But neither the capacity audience nor those who heard the program on radio knew it was his farewell.

RETIREMENT TOLD AFTER CONCERT

His retirement was made known after the concert by the release of letters exchanged previously between Toscanini and David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corp. of America. This was in accord with the maestro's wish that news of his retirement should be withheld until after his final appearance with the orchestra which he had led for 17 years.

His last concert was an all-Wagner program. As he stepped off the podium, as the last chord of "Die Meistersinger" overture sounded, his baton slipped from his hand. A member of the orchestra picked it up and handed it to him. Then Toscanini slowly walked off. He was applauded for many minutes by the audience.

Toscanini did not return.

Toscanini, known as a severe taskmaster and a perfectionist in his direction, was hailed by many as "the greatest living conductor."

PATH TO SUCCESS NOT EASY ONE

But his path to success was not an easy one. Although he surmounted the obstacles of poverty to win musical recognition at the beginning, it was a whim of fate that made him a conductor.

Born to a poor tailor and his wife in Parma, Italy, music beckoned to the young Toscanini at an age when most boys are occupied only by the games and diversions of childhood.

At 9 he entered a conservatory at Parma. Students lived at the school, operated along monastic lines.

The food there was of a very plain nature. The students seldom were treated to meat. To get this delicacy, they had to give up coupons.

Toscanini, who loved music better than food, took to selling his meat coupons to boys with greater means. He used the money thus obtained to buy music.

He was graduated in piano and cello, winning honors in composition.

FELT COMPOSITION BELOW STANDARD

However, he did not pursue composition because he felt that "whatever I composed would fall below the standard I set for myself."

The strange twist of fate that brought him to the podium to stay occurred in 1886 when Toscanini was just 19.

He had taken a job with a touring opera company headed for South America.

There in Rio de Janeiro, the Brazilian conductor got into a quarrel with some of the Italian artists before a performance of Verdi's opera, "Aida."

The Brazilian audience, out of loyalty to the conductor, hissed the orchestra's Italian conductor off the stage when he sought to take over the baton. The orchestra's chorus master met the same fate. Confusion reigned.

THOUGHT HE WOULDN'T SHOW UP

Toscanini, then a cellist with the touring orchestra, had thought once that evening he wouldn't even show up for the performance.

But he changed his mind at the last moment and arrived late—slipping into his usual chair unnoticed.

Women in the company's chorus became greatly worried, for fear they would be stranded far away from home. One spied the tardy Toscanini and set up a cry: "He will save us! He knows all the operas by heart!"

Fellow musicians, snatching at the last straw, handed Toscanini a baton. He went to work in the masterly fashion, so well known later in his career, and the audience, jeering and laughing over what they expected to be a fiasco, shortly subsided to rapt attention.

When the performance was concluded, the audience rose with resounding cheers. Toscanini's fortune was made.

STILL ROCKY TIMES AHEAD

Even so, there still were a few rocky times ahead. Such as the beating he received, at the age of 64, from some of Mussolini's black-shirts. The maestro had refused to play the Fascist anthem, contending it was "not music."

Globe music writer hears many tales of great and strange genius at funeral of Arturo Toscanini

A Sweet Tyrant

Smashed music rack to bits when he did not like rehearsal.

* * *

Stormed off to So. America when singer said she was star.

* * *

Listened to all sorts of radio music.

* * *

Proudly said: "I am well born. I am a peasant."

By CYRUS DURGIN

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—A great light in music was extinguished when Arturo Toscanini died this week. This was not only the death of an eminent man and a supreme musician, but the end of an era.

There had been no one quite like Toscanini. Without him the musical world will never be quite the same again. For so many years Toscanini had been with us, it seemed almost that we should never be without him.

Even in the self-centered hustle of Manhattan, people seemed to feel it. The cab driver who sped me to the Campbell Funeral Church at Madison av. and 81st st., where the body of the conductor was to lie in state until the requiem mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral, remarked about it.

"Too bad Toscanini died," he murmured as I paid him.

This was last Wednesday at 1:30 in the afternoon, and already 150 or 200 persons were waiting in the damp cold on the sidewalk outside Campbell's. The doors had been announced to open at 1, but there had been a delay. The family naturally wanted a few more minutes alone with their dead.

TOSCANINI
Page A-One

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 27,844
JAN 16 1957

Pierre Monteux Mourns 'Greatest Conductor'

BOSTON (UP) — Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that with Arturo Toscanini's death "I lost one of my closest friends. The world lost its greatest conductor."

Monteux is guest conductor for Charles Munch, who is vacationing in Paris.

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
lependent Republican
Circ. 198,749
JAN 17 1957

Munch Will Fly To Toscanini Rites

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 26,118
JAN 17 1957

Toscanini "Greatest", Says Monteux

BOSTON (AP) — Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco symphony, today described Arturo Toscanini as the world's "greatest conductor."

"With the passing of Arturo Toscanini," Monteux said, "I lost one of my closest friends and the world lost its greatest conductor."

The comment was made to WBZ-TV as Monteux left New York for Boston to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the winter vacation of Charles Munch, its music director.

TIGHT BINDING

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JAN 19 1957

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
JAN 19 1957

Monteux Guest Conductor at Symphony

Celebrate Mass In N.Y. Today For Toscanini

NEW YORK, (AP)—A pontifical requiem Mass will be offered today at St. Patrick's Cathedral for world-famed conductor Arturo Toscanini.

The maestro, 89, was found dead Wednesday morning at his home in Riverdale, The Bronx, following a stroke. He would have been 90 years old in March.

ITALIAN BORN BISHOP OFFICIATES

The Mass will be sung by the Most Rev. Joseph M. Pernicone, Italian-born auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of New York.

Francis Cardinal Spellman, Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, will preside in the sanctuary and will sing the absolution over the coffin after the Mass.

Some 5,000 persons filed past Toscanini's bier yesterday at a funeral home, where his body has lain in state since Thursday.

Among the thousands were "juust plain folks" who revered the maestro for the musical pleasures he brought to them via radio and recordings down through the years.

Among the noted musical artists paying personal respects to Toscanini yesterday were violinist Fritz Kreisler and Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CALLED 'GREATEST OF THE GREAT'

Munch, who is attending the Mass today, said he had known the maestro for about 30 years and called him "the greatest of the great."

Mourners appeared at the flower-banked funeral chapel singly of in small groups. Pausing before the bier, some kneeled and said short prayers for the musical genius beloved by millions for more than two generations.

Thousands of telegrams of condolence have been received by Toscanini's immediate family survivors—two daughters, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz and Countess Wally Castelbarco, and a son, Walter.

Mourn Toscanini

(AP Wirephoto)

FAMILY OF TOSCANINI—The family of Arturo Toscanini, famed conductor, gather in Manhattan funeral home where the body lay in state. A requiem Mass was celebrated today in St. Patrick's Cathedral. Left to right: son, Walter; daughter, Countess Wally Castelbarco; his granddaughter, Sonia; and her mother, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz, wife of pianist Vladmir Horowitz.

Stravinsky, Debussy, Elgar on Program

By Harold Rogers

Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations were the least perplexing of the items on Pierre Monteux's program yesterday afternoon. The program itself took a labyrinthian way, as dark as the forest in which Golaud finds Mélisande.

It seems odd that Mr. Monteux would assemble a program as one might assemble a jigsaw puzzle, in bits and blocks. There are 34 sections in his Symphony Hall program this week, not counting the "Death of Clärchen" from Beethoven's "Egmont" music, played at the opening in Toscanini's memory.

* * *

It was continuity of form that at least one listener longed for, movements well bound with lucid logic. Not until the final selection, the "Enigma" Variations, did we come upon a flow of musical ideas that were marshaled in masterly fashion.

though the variations form itself is a kind of pastiche. It is to Sir Edward's credit that he employed variations to produce his best work—or at least the work that survives as the most popular.

Mr. Monteux opened with Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite, arranged in eight sections from the ballet. This is music drawn by Stravinsky from Pergolesi in 1920 and introduced to the United States when Mr. Monteux was regular conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1922.

It is ingratiating, albeit slender, and would have won its way more readily yesterday if Mr. Monteux had not given it desultory treatment and if Richard Burgin's solo violin had not been off key. (This was not Mr. Burgin's day; he was also off key in the Debussy which followed).

* * *

Mr. Monteux then offered 11 instrumental excerpts from "Pelléas et Mélisande," Debussy's opera, in a collection including preludes, interludes, and conclusions drawn from the five acts. Contrary to the Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux gave this music a lustrous and loving touch. Yet the shimmering light in the score is reflected light, the light of the moon perhaps, or a few vagabond rays of sun on the well where Mélisande loses her wedding ring, for Debussy's opera comes out of the night and goes into the night while its other-wordly people are forever seeking an elusive, symbolic light.

In the opera house this music underlines the dreamlike action on the stage, and both forward the direction of the drama. Divorced from the drama, the music has the effect of emerging from darkness to elucidate itself for a few brief moments before dispersing itself into another starless blue. It is a lonely wanderer, and one wonders if the concert hall is its home.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux has long since earned the right to play what he pleases. Yet there are certain fundamental principles in program building that should be observed, and which, if ignored, result in a dispersal of interest.

We admire and cherish his humanity, his kindliness, his musicianship, and we shall continue to look forward to his guest appearances as we have in the past. We also hope, however, for more of the Monteux we heard yesterday in the magnificent Elgar variations. Here he was vivid, dynamic, superb.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 19 1957

Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Non-Partisan
Circ. 4,945

JAN 17 1957

TO ATTEND FUNERAL

PARIS, Jan. 17, (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 19 1957

American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973

JAN 17 1957

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 12th concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

"Pulcinella" — Stravinsky
Instrumental excerpts from "Pelleas et Melisande" — Debussy
"Enigma" Variations — Elgar

By RUDOLPH ELIE

That octogenarian of octogenarians, Pierre Monteux returned for his annual visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon and, rather than displaying any sign of the diminishing of his power in his 82d year he displayed every sign of being stronger and more mettlesome than ever. The word for it all is phenomenal.

While it was his sad duty—and ours—to pay tribute to the memory of Arturo Toscanini at the opening of the concert, when Claerchen's Death scene from Beethoven's "Egmont," was per-minor violin Concerto has been given while the Cello Concerto has never been done.

Yet all this music, and more, is repeatedly heard in England and, 23 years after his death, Sir Edward Elgar occupies a unique position in the hearts of the people of his native land. So it would seem he just never has been given a chance elsewhere, much as Sibelius has never been given a chance on the continent. This year, then, seems the appropriate one to reappraise the symphonies of Sir Edward Elgar. In any case, it does not seem possible that a man who could reveal such a mastery of the orchestra as he does in the Variations, could go on to further maturity and write two symphonies deserving of neglect on this side of the water.

Different Mood

It was particularly interest- to hear the instrumental excerpts from Debussy's lyric drama "Pelleas and Melisande" in the special isolation of the concert hall. Somehow or other operaitc performance, due perhaps to the quite different mood an operatic performance engenders, they go by heard but at the same time essentially unheard. Here, without any extraneous distractions, these exquisite interludes shimmer with a poetry, a delicacy of feeling and shading and nuance and plasticity that is marvelous to hear.

Only momentarily do they ever rise to dramatic intensity and never do they come into focus revealing earthly sensuality. The outlines remain vague, ever-shifting and impressionistic but in the end, as in Monet's waterlillies, filled with impact. Mr. Monteux, who conducted as always without a score, let the music speak for itself; he never forced it or lingered over its unique tonal atmosphere.

"Pulcinella" was charmingly set forth, its lugubrious Vivo bringing out a rare chuckle among the audience, and Mr. Monteux outdid himself in the Variations, as did the orchestra in peak form. Mr. Munch returns next week to conduct the first performance of Walton's Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky the soloist. Another first for Boston will be Randall Thompson's "A Trip to Nahant." The concert closes with Beethoven's Fourth.

JAN 17 1957

Toscanini Rites Saturday in New York

NEW YORK (INS)—The great and the humble today shared a common grief as they moruned the death of famed conductor Arturo Toscanini.

The body of the musical genius beloved by millions lay in state at the Frank E. Campbell Funeral Chapel on Madison ave.

So many mourners are expected to pay their last respects to the maestro, the funeral home will remain open continuously until shortly before the funeral Saturday.

A solemn requiem mass will be offered at 10 a. m. Saturday in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

The body will then be flown to Italy for burial beside that of his wife in the family chapel in Milan.

Toscanini, who would have been 90 March 25, died in his sleep yesterday at his home, Villa Pauline, in the Riverdale section of New York city.

Munch in Paris, Will Fly to Funeral

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Not Played Here

Although 1957 is the 100th anniversary of the birth of Sid Edard Edward Elgar, it is much to be doubted if the fact will be much noted in this country save by performances of the Variations, which rank with the finest sets of orchestral variations ever written.

The general view—though what it is based on I do not know—is that Elgar is too "Englishy. But how much English is too Englishy? The Variations certainly are not: a listener who did not know Elgar was English would never suspect it from this work, nor would he find any references to British folk music, for Elgar never used it saying it was a composer's business to compose, not embroider the folk music of his country.

The plain fact of the case is that Elgar simply is not played here and nobody really knows his music. It is 48 years since his First Symphony has been done at these concerts and 23 since his second. More than 20 years have passed since the B

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST

Monteux Is Guest Conduc

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave its Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 12th program of the Friday–Saturday series. Pierre Monteux was guest conductor. Before the stated program he conducted the larghetto ("Claerchen's Death") from the "Egmont" music of Beethoven, in memory of Toscanini. The main body of the program: Stravinsky: Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi); Debussy: Two Preludes, Five Interludes and "The Death of Melisande" from "Pelleas and Melisande" (first time at these concerts); Elgar; "Enigma" Variations.

By CYRUS DURGIN

To one's eyes, the rotund figure, the long baton and the unforced gestures of Pierre Monteux were a familiar sight at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Once again this long-admired elder musician was welcomed back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But to one's ears the sounds produced were not entirely familiar, they were not entirely agreeable and they led one to the disturbing conclusion that the conductor was not in full command of the orchestra.

Not that anything went seriously wrong. But frequently the players were not together, almost as frequently there were places where the balance between sections was not right; there were untidy details, some coarseness of sonority, and an almost constant feeling that musicians and conductor were far from the leadership and the willing cooperation which has typified much of their work together in the past.

Between these lapses of ensemble you did perceive orchestral richness and eloquence. But it was not, steady, not consistent. Stravinsky went fairly well, Debussy better, but the Elgar Variations were almost insensitive, careless in some pages. There was none of the continuity which should bind the Variations into a string of matched tonal jewels, and much too often the voices beneath the principal melodies buzzed rather than sang.

Whose the fault, and why? A conductor must answer first when matters go indifferently, in the case of a virtuoso orchestra. His ear, his beat, his energy, his mand, these singly or collec can be involved. Whatever reason, the masterly Monteux no longer in evidence yeste

It was an interesting ven play so much of the instrum portion of "Pelleas and sande," but the total effect of sameness. In the theatre stage action, the progress drama provide the links of tinuity and variety which missing yesterday. It seem long and nearly soporific sion of fragments of mood without structure or "line." all operatic music, instrumen speaking, is in itself except and this of "Pelleas and sande" in such quantity and tion did not benefit by the pro

Toscanini Tribute

Before the stated program, Boston Symphony honored memory of the late Arturo canini with the larghetto is titled "Claerchen's Death," the "Egmont" music of Beeth This was an appropriate since Beethoven was one of canini's most cherished compo But somehow the music itself too small for the memorializing so huge a figure in musical Much better (and well away the more dramatic items somet used for the purpose) would been the slow movement Beethoven's last String Quar the F major, Op. 135. Tosca himself once made a version for massed strings.

By way of footnote, I wo if any choral group in these few days will perform in canini's memory the one-piece completely suited to the That is the prevailingly un chorus from Verdi's "Nabuc the "Va, pensiero," which sung spontaneously by the pe at one of the funeral services Verdi.

Charles Munch will return next week to conduct the wo premiere of Sir William Walto Cello Concerto, with Gregor Pi igorsky as soloist. The program will begin with the first performance in Boston of Randall Thompson's "A Trip to Nahant," and will end with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Morning
BOSTON,
Independ
Circ. 131,
JAN 17 1957

E. Morton Jennings

At a meeting of the trus the Boston Symphony O yesterday, election to th E. Morton Jennings Jr. president of the First Bank of Boston, was co Jennings, with the Fi Bank since 1929, and president in the Credit sion, will devote himse ing up support for the in the business commun

TIGHT BINDING

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JAN 19 1957

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
JAN 19 1957

Monteux Guest Conductor at Symphony

Celebrate Mass In N.Y. Today For Toscanini

NEW YORK, (AP)—A pontifical requiem Mass will be offered today at St. Patrick's Cathedral for world-famed conductor Arturo Toscanini.

The maestro, 89, was found dead Wednesday morning at his home in Riverdale, The Bronx, following a stroke. He would have been 90 years old in March.

ITALIAN BORN BISHOP OFFICIATES

The Mass will be sung by the Most Rev. Joseph M. Pernicone, Italian-born auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of New York.

Francis Cardinal Spellman, Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, will preside in the sanctuary and will sing the absolution over the coffin after the Mass.

Some 5,000 persons filed past Toscanini's bier yesterday at a funeral home, where his body has lain in state since Thursday.

Among the thousands were "juust plain folks" who revered the maestro for the musical pleasures he brought to them via radio and recordings down through the years.

Among the noted musical artists paying personal respects to Toscanini yesterday were violinist Fritz Kreisler and Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CALLED 'GREATEST OF THE GREAT'

Munch, who is attending the Mass today, said he had known the maestro for about 30 years and called him "the greatest of the great."

Mourners appeared at the flower-banked funeral chapel singly of in small groups. Pausing before the bier, some kneeled and said short prayers for the musical genius beloved by millions for more than two generations.

Thousands of telegrams of condolence have been received by Toscanini's immediate family survivors—two daughters, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz and Countess Wally Castelbarco, and a son, Walter.

Mourn Toscanini

(AP Wirephoto)

FAMILY OF TOSCANINI—The family of Arturo Toscanini, famed conductor, gather in Manhattan funeral home where the body lay in state. A requiem Mass was celebrated today in St. Patrick's Cathedral. Left to right: son, Walter; daughter, Countess Wally Castelbarco; his granddaughter, Sonia; and her mother, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz, wife of pianist Vladmir Horowitz.

Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Non-Partisan
Circ. 4,945

JAN 17 1957

TO ATTEND FUNERAL

PARIS, Jan. 17, (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Stravinsky, Debussy, Elgar on Program

By Harold Rogers

Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations were the least perplexing of the items on Pierre Monteux's program yesterday afternoon. The program itself took a labyrinthian way, as dark as the forest in which Golaud finds Mélisande.

It seems odd that Mr. Monteux would assemble a program as one might assemble a jigsaw puzzle, in bits and blocks. There are 34 sections in his Symphony Hall program this week, not counting the "Death of Clärchen" from Beethoven's "Egmont" music, played at the opening in Toscanini's memory.

* * *

It was continuity of form that at least one listener longed for, movements well bound with lucid logic. Not until the final selection, the "Enigma" Variations, did we come upon a flow of musical ideas that are marshaled in masterly fashion, though the variations form itself is a kind of pastiche. It is to Sir Edward's credit that he employed variations to produce his best work—or at least the work that survives as the most popular.

Mr. Monteux opened with Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite, arranged in eight sections from the ballet. This is music drawn by Stravinsky from Pergolesi in 1920 and introduced to the United States when Mr. Monteux was regular conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1922.

It is ingratiating, albeit slender, and would have won its way more readily yesterday if Mr. Monteux had not given it desultory treatment and if Richard Burgin's solo violin had not been off key. (This was not Mr. Burgin's day; he was also off key in the Debussy which followed).

* * *

Mr. Monteux then offered 11 instrumental excerpts from "Pelléas et Mélisande," Debussy's opera, in a collection including preludes, interludes, and conclusions drawn from the five acts. Contrary to the Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux gave this music a lustrous and loving touch. Yet the shimmering light in the score is reflected light, the light of the moon perhaps, or a few vagabond rays of sun on the well where Mélisande loses her wedding ring. For Debussy's opera comes out of the night and goes into the night while its other-wordly people are forever seeking an elusive, symbolic light.

In the opera house this music underlines the dreamlike action on the stage, and both forward the direction of the drama. Divorced from the drama, the music has the effect of emerging from darkness to elucidate itself for a few brief moments before dispersing itself into another starless blue. It is a lonely wanderer, and one wonders if the concert hall is its home.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux has long since earned the right to play what he pleases. Yet there are certain fundamental principles in program building that should be observed, and which, if ignored, result in a dispersal of interest.

We admire and cherish his humanity, his kindliness, his musicianship, and we shall continue to look forward to his guest appearances as we have in the past. We also hope, however, for more of the Monteux we heard yesterday in the magnificent Elgar variations. Here he was vivid, dynamic, superb.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 19 1957

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973

JAN 17 1957

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 12th concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

"Pulcinella" — Stravinsky
Instrumental excerpts from "Pelleas et Melisande" — Debussy
"Enigma" Variations — Elgar

By RUDOLPH ELIE

That octogenarian of octogenarians, Pierre Monteux returned for his annual visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon and, rather than displaying any sign of the diminishing of his power in his 82d year he displayed every sign of being stronger and more mettlesome than ever. The word for it all is phenomenal.

While it was his sad duty—and ours—to pay tribue to the memory of Arturo Toscanini at the opening of the concert, when Claerchen's Death scene from Beethoven's "Egmont," was performed, the Cello Concerto has been given while the Cello Concerto has never been done.

Yet all this music, and more, is repeatedly heard in England and, 23 years after his death, Sis Edward Elgar occupies a unique position in the hearts of the people of his native land. So it would seem he just never has been given a chance elsewhere, much as Sibelius has never been given a chance on the continent. This year, then, seems the appropriate one to reappraise the symphonies of Sir Edward Elgar. In any case, it does not seem possible that a man who could reveal such a mastery of the orchestra as he does in the Variations, could go on to further maturity and write two symphonies deserving of neglect on this side of the water.

Different Mood

It was particularly interesting to hear the instrumental excerpts from Debussy's lyric drama "Pelleas and Melisande" in the special isolation of the concert hall. Somehow or other an operaitc performance, due perhaps to the quite different mood an operatic performance engenders, they go by heard but at the same time essentially unheard. Here, without any extraneous distractions, these exquisite interludes shimmer with a poetry, a delicacy of feeling and shading and nuance and plasticity that is marvelous to hear.

Only momentarily do they ever rise to dramatic intensity; and never do they come into focus revealing earthly sensuality. The outlines remain vague, ever-shifting and impressionistic but in the end, as in Monet's waterlillies, filled with impact. Mr. Monteux, who conducted as always without a score, let the music speak for itself; he never forced it or lingered over its unique tonal atmosphere.

"Pulcinella" was charmingly set forth, its lugubrious Vivo bringing out a rare chuckle among the audience, and Mr. Monteux outdid himself in the Variations, as did the orchestra in peak form. Mr. Munch returns next week to conduct the first performance of Walton's Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky the soloist. Another first for Boston will be Randall Thompson's "A Trip to Nahant." The concert closes with Beethoven's Fourth.

JAN 17 1957

Toscanini Rites Saturday in New York

NEW YORY (INS)—The great and the humble today shared a common grief as they moruned the death of famed conductor Arturo Toscanini.

The body of the musical genius beloved by millions lay in state at the Frank E. Campbell Funeral Chapel on Madison ave.

So many mourners are expected to pay their last respects to the maestro, the funeral home will remain open continuously until shortly before the funeral Saturday.

A solemn requiem mass will be offered at 10 a. m. Saturday in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

The body will then be flown to Italy for burial beside that of his wife in the family chapel in Milan.

Toscanini, who would have been 90 March 25, died in his sleep yesterday at his home, Villa Pauline, in the Riverdale section of New York city.

Munch in Paris, Will Fly to Funeral

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Not Played Here

Although 1957 is the 100th anniversary of the birth of Sid Edard Edward Elgar, it is much to be doubted if the fact will be much noted in this country save by performances of the Variations, which rank with the finest sets of orchestral variations ever written.

The general view—though what it is based on I do not know—is that Elgar is too "Englishy. But how much English is too Englishy? The Variations certainly are not: a listener who did not know Elgar was English would never suspect it from this work, nor would he find any references to British folk music, for Elgar never used it saying it was a composer's business to compose, not embroider the folk music of his country.

The plain fact of the case is that Elgar simply is not played here and nobody really knows his music. It is 48 years since his First Symphony has been done at these concerts and 23 since his second. More than 20 years have passed since the B

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST

Monteux Is Guest Conduct

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 12th program of the Friday-Saturday series. Pierre Monteux was guest conductor. Before the stated program he conducted the larghetto "Claerchen's Death" from the "Egmont" music of Beethoven, in memory of Toscanini. The main body of the program: Stravinsky: Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi); Debussy: Two Preludes, Five Interludes and "The Death of Melisande" from "Pelleas and Melisande" (first time at these concerts); Elgar: "Enigma" Variations.

By CYRUS DURGIN

To one's eyes, the rotund figure, the long baton and the unforced gestures of Pierre Monteux were a familiar sight at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Once again this long-admired elder musician was welcomed back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But to one's ears the sounds produced were not entirely familiar, they were not entirely agreeable and they led one to the disturbing conclusion that the conductor was not in full command of the orchestra.

Not that anything went so much wrong. But frequently the players were not together, almost as frequently there were places where the balance between sections was not right; there was untidy details, some coarseness of sonority, and an almost constant feeling that musicians and conductor were far from the leader's mind and the willing cooperation which has typified much of their work together in the past.

Between these lapses of ensemble you did perceive orchestral richness and eloquence. But not, steady, not consistently. Stravinsky went fairly well, better, but the Elgar Variations were almost insensitive, at some pages. There was the continuity which should the Variations into a matched tonal jewels, and too often the voices beneath principal melodies buzzed rather than sang.

Whose the fault, and conductor must answer matters go indifferently, case of a virtuoso orchestra ear, his beat, his energy, his mand, these singly or collectively can be involved. Whatever reason, the masterly Monteux no longer in evidence yesterday.

It was an interesting venture play so much of the instrumental portion of "Pelleas and Melisande," but the total effect was of sameness. In the theater, stage action, the progress of drama provide the links of continuity and variety which were missing yesterday. It seemed long and nearly soporific succession of fragments of mood without structure or "line." All operatic music, instrumental speaking, is in itself exceptional and this, of "Pelleas and Melisande" in such quantity and selection did not benefit by the process.

Toscanini Tribute

Before the stated program, the Boston Symphony honored the memory of the late Arturo Toscanini with the larghetto which is titled "Claerchen's Death," from the "Egmont" music of Beethoven. This was an appropriate choice since Beethoven was one of Toscanini's most cherished composers. But somehow the music itself was too small for the memorializing, too lacking in musical substance a figure in musical history. March better and well away from the main dramatic items sometimes used for the purpose would have been the slow movement from Beethoven's last String Quartet, Op. 135. Toscanini, made a version of this for strings.

[illegible] footnote. I wonder [illegible] general group in these [illegible] will perform in [illegible] memory the one-piece [illegible] completely suited to the occasion is the prevailingly [illegible] from Verdi's "Nabucco" "Va, pensiero," which [illegible] spontaneously by the public [illegible] of the funeral services.

Charles Munch will return next [illegible] to conduct the world [illegible] of Sir William Walton's [illegible] Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky [illegible]

[illegible] program [illegible] Nabucco [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] Fourth Symphony.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675
JAN 17 1957

New D

[illegible] By

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

"Spotlight on Brass" [illegible] of a new Vox album featuring the musicians Roger Voisin, Harold [illegible] Joseph Orosz, all of [illegible] listed in the annotation [illegible] members of a "well known" [illegible] chestra." This amusing [illegible] silly designation [illegible] less the result of [illegible] mysterious profession [illegible] cations concerning [illegible] and contracts. Why [illegible] right out and say [illegible] members of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra?

[illegible] his album the spotlight [illegible] on the brass—on a group [illegible] ruments ranging from [illegible] horn through [illegible] is serpents, hunting horns, trumpets, cornets, bugles, tubas, bones, euphoniums, and tubas. [illegible] is an illustrational album especially suitable for music [illegible] raries, musicologists, the classroom, and for those who have some particular interest in the evolution of brass instruments. Consisting of scales and typical melodies, the program will appeal to the listener looking [illegible] concerted band or brass music.

* * *

If, however, you have the [illegible] of curiosity that has plagued you about the sound of the [illegible] pent (several of which are on display in the Symphony [illegible] collection of antique instruments), you can now satisfy your ambition. The church [illegible] pent and calvary serpent, played by Mr. Orosz, sound much better than they look. [illegible] appearance they are almost [illegible] rociously reptilian. In sound they are more like a mild-mannered bassoon.

The instruments heard on the disk were chosen mainly from the Belle Skinner collection in Holyoke, Mass., and from the Casadesus Collection in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Háry János, as nearly everyone knows, is that teller of tales from Hungarian folklore preserved since 1926 in music of an opera by Zoltán Kodály. The "Háry János" Suite, taken from the opera, has long since established itself as a brilliant concert favorite, filled with spirited little marches and swirling gypsy tunes.

This Suite is now available on two recent performances — one for Epic (LC-3290) by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum, the other for Decca (DL 9855) by the RIAS Symphony Orchestra of Berlin under Ferenc Fricsay. Both disks are excellently played and recorded with the van Beinum [illegible] perhaps a bit mellower than [illegible]

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 17 1957

E. Morton Jennings

At a meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, election to the board of E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice president of the First National Bank of Boston, was confirmed. Jennings, with the First National Bank since 1929 and now a vice president in the Credit Division, will devote himself to building up support for the orchestra in the business community.

TIGHT BINDING

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 198,749

JAN 19 1957

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

JAN 19 1957

Monteux Guest Conductor at Symphony

Celebrate Mass In N.Y. Today For Toscanini

NEW YORK, (AP)—A pontifical requiem Mass will be offered today at St. Patrick's Cathedral for world-famed conductor Arturo Toscanini.

The maestro, 89, was found dead Wednesday morning at his home in Riverdale, The Bronx, following a stroke. He would have been 90 years old in March.

ITALIAN BORN BISHOP OFFICIATES

The Mass will be sung by the Most Rev. Joseph M. Pernicone, Italian-born auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of New York.

Francis Cardinal Spellman, Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, will preside in the sanctuary and will sing the absolution over the coffin after the Mass.

Some 5,000 persons filed past Toscanini's bier yesterday at a funeral home, where his body has lain in state since Thursday.

Among the thousands were "juust plain folks" who revered the maestro for the musical pleasures he brought to them via radio and recordings down through the years.

Among the noted musical artists paying personal respects to Toscanini yesterday were violinist Fritz Kreisler and Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CALLED 'GREATEST OF THE GREAT'

Munch, who is attending the Mass today, said he had known the maestro for about 30 years and called him "the greatest of the great."

Mourners appeared at the flower-banked funeral chapel singly of in small groups. Pausing before the bier, some kneeled and said short prayers for the musical genius beloved by millions for more than two generations.

Thousands of telegrams of condolence have been received by Toscanini's immediate family survivors—two daughters, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz and Countess Wally Castelbarco, and a son, Walter.

American (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 184,973

JAN 17 1957

Mourn Toscanini

(AP Wirephoto)

FAMILY OF TOSCANINI—The family of Arturo Toscanini, famed conductor, gather in Manhattan funeral home where the body lay in state. A requiem Mass was celebrated today in St. Patrick's Cathedral. Left to right: son, Walter; daughter, Countess Wally Castelbarco; his granddaughter, Sonia; and her mother, Mrs. Wanda Horowitz, wife of pianist Vladmir Horowitz.

Stravinsky, Debussy, Elgar on Program

By Harold Rogers

Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations were the least perplexing of the items on Pierre Monteux's program yesterday afternoon. The program itself took a labyrinthian way, as dark as the forest in which Golaud finds Mélisande.

It seems odd that Mr. Monteux would assemble a program as one might assemble a jigsaw puzzle, in bits and blocks. There are 34 sections in his Symphony Hall program this week, not counting the "Death of Clärchen" from Beethoven's "Egmont" music, played at the opening in Toscanini's memory.

* * *

It was continuity of form that at least one listener longed for, movements well bound with lucid logic. Not until the final selection, the "Enigma" Variations, did we come upon a flow of musical ideas that were marshaled in masterly fashion. Even though the variations form itself is a kind of pastiche, it is to Sir Edward's credit that he employed variations to produce his best work—or at least the work that survives as the most popular.

Mr. Monteux opened with Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite, arranged in eight sections from the ballet. This is music drawn by Stravinsky from Pergolesi in 1920 and introduced to the United States when Mr. Monteux was regular conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1922.

It is ingratiating, albeit slender, and would have won its way more readily yesterday if Mr. Monteux had not given it desultory treatment and if Richard Burgin's solo violin had not been off key. (This was not Mr. Burgin's day; he was also off key in the Debussy which followed).

* * *

Mr. Monteux then offered 11 instrumental excerpts from "Pelléas et Mélisande," Debussy's opera, in a collection including preludes, interludes, and conclusions drawn from the five acts. Contrary to the Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux gave this music a lustrous and loving touch. Yet the shimmering light in the score is reflected light, the light of the moon perhaps, or a few vagabond rays of sun on the well where Mélisande loses her wedding ring, for Debussy's opera comes out of the night and goes into the night while its other-wordly people are forever seeking an elusive, symbolic light.

In the opera house this music underlines the dreamlike action on the stage, and both forward the direction of the drama. Divorced from the drama, the music has the effect of emerging from darkness to elucidate itself for a few brief moments before dispersing itself into another starless blue. It is a lonely wanderer, and one wonders if the concert hall is its home.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux has long since earned the right to play what he pleases. Yet there are certain fundamental principles in program building that should be observed, and which, if ignored, result in a dispersal of interest.

We admire and cherish his humanity, his kindliness, his musicianship, and we shall continue to look forward to his guest appearances as we have in the past. We also hope, however, for more of the Monteux we heard yesterday in the magnificent Elgar variations. Here he was vivid, dynamic, superb.

Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Non-Partisan
Circ. 4,945

JAN 17 1957

TO ATTEND FUNERAL

PARIS, Jan. 17, (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Arturo Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished French-born conductor with a break in his voice. "It is a great blow to me and to us all."

Munch said he would be in New York tomorrow.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent Republican
Circ. 134,866

JAN 19 1957

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 1[illegible]

Toscanini Rit[illegible] She Won't

NEW YORY (INS)—The g[illegible] and the humble today shared [illegible] common grief as they morur[illegible] the death of famed conduct[illegible] Arturo Toscanini.

The body of the musical geniu[illegible] beloved by millions lay in state [illegible] over the place. It will be a mad-house—not a very good time for a visit." [illegible] respects to the [illegible] funeral home will [illegible] open continuously until [illegible] shortly before the funeral Saturday.

A solemn requiem mass will be offered at 10 a. m. Saturday in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

The body will then be flown to Italy for burial beside that of his wife in the family chapel in Milan.

Toscanini, who would have been 90 March 25, died in his sleep yesterday at his home, Villa Pauline, in the Riverdale section of New York city.

Munch in Paris, Will Fly to Funeral

PARIS (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is flying to New York immediately for the funeral of Toscanini.

"Of all the great, he was the greatest," said the distinguished

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 12th concert of the 76th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

"Pulcinella" — Stravinsky
Instrumental excerpts from "Pelleas et Melisande" — Debussy
"Enigma" Variations — Elgar

By RUDOLPH ELIE

That octogenarian of octogenarians, Pierre Monteux returned for his annual visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon and, rather than displaying any sign of the diminishing of his power in his 82d year he displayed every sign of being stronger and more mettlesome than ever. The word for it all is phenomenal.

While it was his sad duty—and ours—to pay tribue to the memory of Arturo Toscanini at the opening of the concert, when Claerchen's Death scene from Beethoven's "Egmont," was performed, the program from then on was a happy choice indeed. For there are few works by a contemporary composer so delightful as Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" and equally few concert pieces in any age so engaging as the musical portraits contained in Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

Not Played Here

Although 1957 is the 100th anniversary of the birth of Sid Edard Edward Elgar, it is much to be doubted if the fact will be much noted in this country save by performances of the Variations, which rank with the finest sets of orchestral variations ever written.

The general view—though what it is based on I do not know—is that Elgar is too "Englishy. But how much English is too Englishy? The Variations certainly are not: a listener who did not know Elgar was English would never suspect it from this work, nor would he find any references to British folk music, for Elgar never used it saying it was a composer's business to compose, not embroider the folk music of his country.

The plain fact of the case is that Elgar simply is not played here and nobody really knows his music. It is 48 years since his First Symphony has been done at these concerts and 23 since his second. More than 20 years have passed since the B minor violin Concerto has been given while the Cello Concerto has never been done.

Yet all this music, and more, is repeatedly heard in England and, 23 years after his death, Sis Edward Elgar occupies a unique position in the hearts of the people of his native land. So it would seem he just never has been given a chance elsewhere, much as Sibelius has never been given a chance on the continent. This year, then, seems the appropriate one to reappraise the symphonies of Sir Edward Elgar. In any case, it does not seem possible that a man who could reveal such a mastery of the orchestra as he does in the Variations, could go on to further maturity and write two symphonies deserving of neglect on this side of the water.

Different Mood

It was particularly interesting to hear the instrumental excerpts from Debussy's lyric drama "Pelleas and Melisande" in the special isolation of the concert hall. Somehow or other in operaitc performance, due perhaps to the quite different mood an operatic performance engenders, they go by heard but at the same time essentially unheard. Here, without any extraneous distractions, these exquisite interludes shimmer with a poetry, a delicacy of feeling and shading and nuance and plasticity that is marvelous to hear.

Only momentarily do they ever rise to dramatic intensity; and never do they come into focus revealing earthly sensuality. The outlines remain vague, ever-shifting and impressionistic but in the end, as in Monet's waterlillies, filled with impact. Mr. Monteux, who conducted as always without a score, let the music speak for itself; he never forced it or lingered over its unique tonal atmosphere.

"Pulcinella" was charmingly set forth, its lugubrious Vivo bringing out a rare chuckle among the audience, and Mr. Monteux outdid himself in the Variations, as did the orchestra in peak form. Mr. Munch returns next week to conduct the first performance of Walton's Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky the soloist. Another first for Boston will be Randall Thompson's "A Trip to Nahant." The concert closes with Beethoven's Fourth.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST[illegible]

Monteux Is Guest Conduct[illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will repeat tonight, the 12th program of the Friday Saturday series. Pierre Monteux was guest conductor. Before the stated program he conducted the larghetto "Clärchen's Death") from the "Egmont" music of Beethoven, in memory of Toscanini. The main body of the program: Stravinsky: Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi); Debussy: Two Preludes, Five Interludes and "The Death of Melisande" from "Pelleas and Melisande" (first time at these concerts); Elgar: "Enigma" Variations.

By CYRUS DURGIN

To one's eyes, the rotund figure, the long baton and the unforced gestures of Pierre Monteux were a familiar sight at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Once again this long-admired elder musician was welcomed back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But to one's ears the sounds produced were not entirely familiar, they were not entirely agreeable and they led one to the disturbing conclusion that the conductor was not in full command of the orchestra.

Not that anything went so [illegible] wrong. But frequently the players were not together, almost as frequently there were places where the balance between [illegible] tions was not right; there were untidy details, some coarseness of sonority, and an almost consistent feeling that musicians and conductor were far from the leader [illegible] and the willing cooperation which has typified much of their work together in the past.

Between these lapses of e[illegible] ble you did perceive good richness and eloquence. But not, steady, not consistent [illegible] vinsky went fairly well [illegible] better, but the Elgar V[illegible] were almost insensitive [illegible] some pages. There was [illegible] the continuity which should [illegible] the Variations into a [illegible] matched tonal jewels, and too often the voices be[illegible] principal melodies hum[illegible] than sang.

Whose the fault, and [illegible] conductor must answer [illegible] matters go indifferently [illegible] case of a virtuoso orch[illegible] ear, his beat, his energy, his [illegible] mand, these singly or collectively can be involved. Whatever [illegible] reason, the masterly Monteux [illegible] no longer in evidence yesterday.

It was an interesting venture [illegible] play so much of the instrumental portion of "Pelleas and Melisande," but the total effect [illegible] of sameness. In the theater [illegible] stage action, the progress of [illegible] drama provide the links of continuity and variety which [illegible] missing yesterday. It seemed [illegible] long and nearly soporific succession of fragments of mood [illegible] without structure or "line." [illegible] all operatic music, instrumental [illegible] speaking, is in itself exceptionable and this, of "Pelleas and Melisande" in such quantity and [illegible] tion did not benefit by the pro[illegible]

Toscanini Tribute

Before the stated program, [illegible] Boston Symphony honored the memory of the late Arturo Toscanini with the larghetto [illegible] entitled "Claerchen's Death," [illegible] the "Egmont" music of Beethoven. This was an appropriate choice since Beethoven was one of [illegible] most cherished composers. But somehow the music itself [illegible] too small for the memorializing [illegible] so large a figure in musical [illegible] Much better (and well away [illegible] for more dramatic items sometime [illegible] for the purpose) would have been the slow movement [illegible] Beethoven's last String Quartet, Op. 135. Toscanini [illegible] make a version [illegible] for string [illegible]

[illegible] Charles Munch will return [illegible] to conduct the world [illegible] of Sir William Walton's [illegible] Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky [illegible]

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 17 1957

E. Morton Jennings

At a meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, election to the board of E. Morton Jennings, Jr., as president of the First National Bank of Boston, was confirmed. Jennings, with the First National Bank since 1929 and now president in the Credit Division, will devote himself to building up support for the orchestra in the business community.

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

JAN 17 1957

New Disk Puts 'Spotlight on Brass'—

Unusual Horns Played By Boston Musicians

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

"Spotlight on Brass" is the title of a new Vox album (DL-309) featuring the musicianship of Roger Voisin, Harold Meek, and Joseph Orosz, all of whom are listed in the annotations as members of a "well known" Boston orchestra." This amusing and slightly silly designation is doubtless the result of one of those mysterious professional complications concerning committals and contracts. Why not come right out and say these men are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

In this album the spotlight is truly on the brass—on a gamut of instruments ranging from the elephant horn, through such items as serpents, hunting horns, trumpets, cornets, bugles, trombones, euphoniums, and tubas. It is an illustrational album especially suitable for music libraries, musicologists, the classroom, and for those who have some particular interest in the evolution of brass instruments. Consisting of scales and typical melodies, the program will not appeal to the listener looking for concerted band or brass music.

♪ ♪ ♪

If, however, you have the kind of curiosity that has plagued you about the sound of the serpent (several of which are on display in the Symphony Hall collection of antique instruments), you can now satisfy your ambition. The church serpent and calvary serpent, as played by Mr. Orosz, sound much better than they look. In appearance they are almost fearsomely reptilian. In sound they are more like a mild-mannered bassoon.

The instruments heard on this disk were chosen mainly from the Belle Skinner collection at Holyoke, Mass., and from the Amadeus Collection in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Háry János, as nearly everyone knows, is that teller of tall tales from Hungarian folklore, preserved since 1926 in the music of an opera by Zoltán Kodály. The "Háry János" Suite, taken from the opera, has long since established itself as a brilliant concert favorite, filled with spirited little marches and swirling gypsy tunes.

This Suite is now available in two recent performances — one for Epic (LC-3290) by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum, the other for Decca (DL-9[illegible]) by the RIAS Symphony Orchestra of Berlin under Ferenc Fricsay. Both disks are excellently played and recorded, with the van Beinum reading perhaps a bit mellower than the Fricsay, though both are entertainingly done.

These two disks also include works by Stravinsky. Van Beinum conducts the "Firebird" Suite for Epic, and Fricsay the Divertimento (Suite de Ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée") for Decca. In the first we hear the young Stravinsky of 1910 when he was astonishing the world with his originality; in the latter we find the composer paying charming homage to Tchaikovsky in 1928.

Angel has just brought out an appealing new recording of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, and Prokofev's "Scythian" Suite, recorded by the Orchestre de la Radiodifusion Française under Igor Markevitch, a conductor especially fitted to interpret the Russian moderns with precision and power.

The Shostakovitch symphony, composed when he was 19 in 1925, is one of those contemporary pieces that almost any music lover can take to his heart. While it is unusual in melodic and formal structure, the dissonant content is low. Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, on the other hand, was composed 11 years earlier at a time when Prokofiev was especially audacious. Some conservative ears may yet recoil at his earthy and barbaric sounds.

Vox is continuing its commendable policy of bringing out luxury albums devoted to works by the Italian baroque composers. The latest is devoted to the Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 1, for strings, by Locatelli (1695-1764), played by I Musici Virtuosi di Milano. The conductor is Dean Eckertsen, the young man who has already produced the de luxe albums of Corelli and Manfredini for Vox.

♪ ♪ ♪

This latest album (DL-333) is another welcome addition to the field of recorded music, though one cannot give unstinting praise to the performances of these Locatelli works. The string players do more than a little scrubbing on their instruments, the blame for which Mr. Eckertsen can assume. Italian string players, under sensitive direction, will play like angels when performing Italian music.

This is not to discourage Mr. Eckertsen, whose labors in this direction are much appreciated, but rather to urge him to gain the polish and precision that is the essence of Italian string playing. The biographical and analytical notes by Joseph Braunstein are informatively and entertainingly written.

Those who are intrigued by the novel, the garish, or the weird in music may enjoy investigating an odd recording, made by Ducretet-Thomson for London, called Panorama of Musique Concrète (DTL-93090). The "composers" are Henry, Schaeffer, and Arthuys, who have experimented in Paris with the possibility of assembling a kind of music from sounds recorded on tape, after which the sounds are altered through variations in speed.

These sounds are then combined through a montage process in such a way as to be heard in themes, forms, counterpoint, etc. The results have something of a ghastly fascination and appear especially suitable for film scores accompanying science fiction tales.

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Republican
Circ. 56,950
JAN 17 1957

BOSTON

NAME BANKER TRUSTEE OF HUB SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice president of the First National Bank of Boston, yesterday was elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Jennings, a 1928 graduate of Dartmouth College, is a resident of Needham. He has served several terms as treasurer of the New England Coun[illegible]

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485

JAN 17 1957

E. Morton Jennings Jr. New Symphony Trustee

At a meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, election to the board of E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice-president of the First National Bank of Boston, was confirmed.

Jennings, with the First National Bank since 1929 and now vice-president in the Credit-Loan Division, will devote himself to building up support for the orchestra in the business community. The First National Bank has made a substantial contribution to the orchestra, through sponsorship of a concert on the Esplanade last season.

staats-zeitung
30 January 1957

MUSIK

[illegible]cnegie Hall [illegible]len schwer

[illegible] chansons "Nous n'irons plus au bois" an — aber mein Turgot, Herr Burgin, rauscht im Lenz in den Stämmen, daß die Säfte überschäumen. Ravels "Pavane" wurde zutreffend nicht als Trauermarsch, sondern als höfischer spanischer Tanz aufgefaßt. Das Morgenständchen eines Narren (Alborado del Gracioso) desselben Ravel stellt man sich närrischer, nachtrunkener, torkelnd eher als träumerisch vor.

Aber das Eigentliche kam erst nach der Pause: Die 4. Symphonie in G-Dur mit Sopransolo von Gustav Mahler. Vergessen wir nicht, daß wir dieses Wiederhören den Bostonians verdanken. Mahler beginnt wie Johann Strauß mit sorglosen Walzern, etwas zum Mitsingen klingt auf, Vögel zwitschern dazwischen. Alles ist einfach, diatonisch. "Gemächlich" — "in gemächlicher Bewegung" — "ruhevoll" — "sehr behaglich" steht über den einzelnen Sätzen und so soll uns zumut werden. Im zweiten Satz lies II. Konzertmeister (der erste ist Richard Burgin) Alfred Krips (Verwandtschaft mit Josef?) eine zweite bereitliegende, primitivere Geige richtig "fideln". Ist's Freund Hein, der da ungebeten aufspielt? Das Thema dieses Teils ist verdächtig tief empfunden.

Aber, leider, kann der Hörer nicht umhin, stärkste Nähe und Abhängigkeit vom langsamen Satz der Neunten (Beethovens) festzustellen. Zuletzt stimmt der Sopran mit viel Koloratur und sinngemäßen Tempiverbreiterungen "Der Himmel hängt voller Geigen" an, aus "Des Knaben Wunderhorn", während das Lämmchen aus der Oboe blökt, die Ochsen mit Fagott- und Kontrabaß-Stimme muhen. Nancy Carr war bemüht, den vorgeschriebenen kindlich staunenden Ton zu finden. Denn wir sind ja im Bauernhimmel, der ein wahres Schlaraffenland zu sein scheint. Petrus — hier verbreitert sich das Tempo — sieht wohlwollend zu. Liturgisch weihevoll wird die Weis', wenn die Englein das Brot backen. Ein langes, melodien erfülltes Orchestervorspiel, dann die letzte lebensfrohe Strophe: "Kein' Musik ist ja nicht auf Erden, die unserer verglichen kann werden". — Voller beglückter Friede tritt ein, wenn Baßgeige, und Harfe langsam die Mitternachtsstunde geschlagen haben.

E. P.

Richard Burgin, als Leiter der Boston Symphony ist ein tüchtiger, unbedingt zuverlässiger und vielleicht gerade deswegen wenig aufregender Dirigent. Die Fünfte von Schostakowitsch und — Beethovens Fünfte. Macht man jetzt "numerische" Programme? Um mehr Verehrung für Beethoven wird gebeten. Im zweiten Satz des Schostakowitschwerks erlabte man sich am zweiten Thema (Satz I) als einer der raren Inspirationen heutiger Musik. Leiden, hatten und Gedanken der Zeit finden ihren Ausdruck, ohne russische oder rassische Einengung. — An den symphonischen Satz "Ruby" des 1955 verstorbenen Honegger kommt das Verständnis leichter heran, wenn man nicht auf Programmusik eingestellt lauscht. Sportleidenschaften der Zuschauer (und Hörer!) sucht der Schweizer Komponist auszudrücken, dabei weckt er zufällig, wie durch das Wettrennen der Streichersechzehntel nach den schmetternden Blechakkorden die Assoziation eines richtigen Rugby-"Gedränges".

Debussys "Rondes de Printemps" ließ Naturweben, Windrauschen, die Vegetation durcheilende Weiler erkennen. Sehr liebevoll nahm sich Ralph Gomberg mit seiner Oboe des

Concertmaster

During most of the season Richard Burgin, 64, sits unobtrusively at the violin section's first desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he has for the past 36 years. At the end of a performance the cond[illegible] guest soloist will shake his hand [illegible] happens to be someone as in[illegible] Leonard Bernstein, he may even [illegible] cheeks. For the rest, the concertmaster's job is done out of the public [illegible] effects [illegible] owings, [illegible] chestra. [illegible] sters in the U.S., Polish-born Richard Burgin gets two or three weeks a year on the podium. Last week he led the Boston Symphony at Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, in a concert of Vaughan Williams, Beethoven and Shostakovich, which he delivered with craftsmanship and no melodrama whatever. "I know what I want, I know how to tell them what I want, and they give it to me," he said, adding as an afterthought: "just as they give it to any other conductor, only maybe to me a little quicker."

The first violinist did not always play second fiddle to the conductor. In the small 18th century ensembles, the other musicians often took [illegible] lead from the first violin, but growing [illegible] orchestras, complex scores and the p[illegible] demand for a good show have m[illegible] conductor virtually irreplaceable. [illegible] concertmaster has far more to do with running the orchestra than meets the eye.

Under Conductor Charles Munch, who used to be a concertmaster himself, Concertmaster Burgin's job moves along well-established grooves, but it was different under the late Serge Koussevitzky, whose famous, poetic perorations had to be translated into technical terms, e.g., how to make the violins sound like first love or the flutes like ice breaking.

Walter Daran

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S BURGIN
First violin was more than second fiddle.

Although Burgin is forgetful in his private life (once he even left his Stradivarius on his commuter train), he has a legendary memory for music. And many times he has saved the situation when a conductor lost his place—by simply playing on until the maestro found himself again. In the words of the late Felix Weingartner, Burgin says: "As long as even one piccolo is playing, we don't give up."

Many concertmasters are tempted by a virtuoso's career. But Burgin says: "I know many virtuosos and I do not envy them. They tell me what it's like to play the same few pieces over and over and know they have to go here and then be there. Not for me. I like the orchestra."

Next week, after his spell in the limelight, Concertmaster Burgin will be back at his accustomed chair in Boston. He will mark the bowings efficiently, play his passages beautifully, and go home to Brookline on his usual commuter train, where trainmen have instructions to see that he does not lose his Stradivarius.

TIME, JANUARY 21, 1957

Musical Courier (NYC)
February, 1957

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, Jan. 15, 8—Despite a raging blizzard outside, the house was filled with loyal members and admirers of Monteux, who rewarded the bold, the brave, and the frostbitten with his magnificent music making and endearing charm. He comes on stage like nothing so much as a genial walrus whose whiskers you want to tweak, just to hear him laugh. But there is no nonsense when the music starts, as it did delightfully with Stravinsky's reconstruction of Pergolesi tunes, called "Pulcinella," which are touched with Stravinsky's own penetrating intellect and special magic. Then came Brahms' Second Symphony in one of the loveliest, most limpid, and most serene readings we have ever heard, all as vernal as anyone could wish for on a winter night. In the Allegretto grazioso, the strings were especially fine as they swung out a long, lilting phrase as a young girl might swirl out her taffeta at a dance. Monteux kept things moving, but never hurried anything or forced an effect. He was bravoed from the floor and applauded, not with beating bows, but by the respectful bare hands of his men. We fled, glad and glowing, into the snowstorm, confident that Debussy and Wagner, after intermission, would be in good hands. K.H.

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

JAN 17 1957

New Disk Puts 'Spotlight on Brass'

Unusual Horns Played By Boston Musicians

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

"Spotlight on Brass" is the title of a new Vox album (DL-300) featuring the musicianship of Roger Voisin, Harold Meek, and Joseph Orosz, all of whom are listed in the annotations as members of a "well known" Boston orchestra." This amusing and slightly siliy designation is doubtless the result of one of those mysterious professional complications concerning committals and contracts. Why not come right out and say these men are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

In this album the spotlight is truly on the brass—on a gamut of instruments ranging from the elephant horn, through such items as serpents, hunting horns, trumpets, cornets, bugles, trombones, euphoniums, and tubas. It is an illustrational album especially suitable for music libraries, musicologists, the classroom, and for those who have some particular interest in the evolution of brass instruments. Consisting of scales and typical melodies, the program will not appeal to the listener looking for concerted band or brass music.

* * *

If, however, you have the kind of curiosity that has plagued you about the sound of the serpent (several of which are on display in the Symphony Hall collection of antique instruments), you can now satisfy your ambition. The church serpent and calvary serpent, as played by Mr. Orosz, sound much better than they look. In appearance they are almost ferociously reptilian. In sound they are more like a mild-mannered bassoon.

The instruments heard on this disk were chosen mainly from the Belle Skinner collection at Holyoke, Mass., and from the Casadesus Collection in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Háry János, as nearly everyone knows, is that teller of tall tales from Hungarian folklore, preserved since 1926 in the music of an opera by Zoltán Kodály. The "Háry János" Suite, taken from the opera, has long since established itself as a brilliant concert favorite, filled with spirited little marches and swirling gypsy tunes.

This Suite is now available in two recent performances — one for Epic (LC-3290) by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum, the other for Decca (DL-9656) by the RIAS Symphony Orchestra of Berlin under Ferenc Fricsay. Both disks are excellently played and recorded, with the van Beinum reading perhaps a bit mellower than the Fricsay, though both are entertainingly done.

These two disks also include works by Stravinsky. Van Beinum conducts the "Firebird" Suite for Epic, and Fricsay the Divertimento (Suite de Ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée") for Decca. In the first we hear the young Stravinsky of 1910 when he was astonishing the world with his originality; in the latter we find the composer paying charming homage to Tchaikovsky in 1928.

* * *

Angel has just brought out an appealing new recording of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, and Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, recorded by the Orchestre de la Radiodifusion Française under Igor Markevitch, a conductor especially fitted to interpret the Russian moderns with precision and power.

The Shostakovitch symphony, composed when he was 19 in 1925, is one of those contemporary pieces that almost any music lover can take to his heart. While it is unusual in melodic and formal structure, the dissonant content is low. Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, on the other hand, was composed 11 years earlier at a time when Prokofiev was especially audacious. Some conservative ears may yet recoil at his earthy and barbaric sounds.

Vox is continuing its commendable policy of bringing out luxury albums devoted to works by the Italian baroque composers. The latest is devoted to the Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 1, for strings, by Locatelli (1695-1764), played by I Musici Virtuosi di Milano. The conductor is Dean Eckertsen, the young man who has already produced the de luxe albums of Corelli and Manfredini for Vox.

* * *

This latest album (DL-333) is another welcome addition to the field of recorded music, though one cannot give unstinting praise to the performances of these Locatelli works. The string players do more than a little scrubbing on their instruments, the blame for which Mr. Eckertsen can assume. Italian string players, under sensitive direction, will play like angels when performing Italian music.

This is not to discourage Mr. Eckertsen, whose labors in this direction are much appreciated, but rather to urge him to gain the polish and precision that is the essence of Italian string playing. The biographical and analytical notes by Joseph Braunstein are informatively and entertainingly written.

Those who are intrigued by the novel, the garish, or the weird in music may enjoy investigating an odd recording, made by Ducretet-Thomson for London, called Panorama of Musique Concrète (DTL-93090). The "composers" are Henry, Schaeffer, and Arthuys, who have experimented in Paris with the possibility of assembling a kind of music from sounds recorded on tape, after which the sounds are altered through variations in speed.

These sounds are then combined through a montage process in such a way as to be heard in themes, forms, counterpoint, etc. The results have something of a ghastly fascination and appear especially suitable for film scores accompanying science fiction tales.

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Republican
Circ. 56,950
JAN 17 1957

BOSTON

NAME BANKER TRUSTEE OF HUB SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice president of the First National Bank of Boston, yesterday was elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Jennings, a 1928 graduate of Dartmouth College, is a resident of Needham. He has served several terms as treasurer of the New England Council.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 17 1957

E. Morton Jennings Jr. New Symphony Trustee

At a meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, election to the board of E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice-president of the First National Bank of Boston, was confirmed.

Jennings, with the First National Bank since 1929 and now vice-president in the Credit-Loan Division, will devote himself to building up support for the orchestra in the business community. The First National Bank has made a substantial contribution to the orchestra, through sponsorship of a concert on the Esplanade last season.

staats-zeitung
20 January 1957

MUSIK

Carnegie Hall den schwer

Richard Burgin als Leiter der Boston Symphony ist ein tüchtiger, unbedingt zuverlässiger und vielleicht gerade deswegen wenig aufregender Dirigent. Die Fünfte von Schostakowitsch und — Beethovens Fünfte. Macht man jetzt "numerische" Programme? Um mehr Verehrung für Beethoven wird gebeten. Im zweiten Satz des Schostakowitschwerks erlabte man sich am zweiten Thema (Satz I) als einer der raren Inspirationen heutiger Musik. Leidenschaften und Gedanken der Zeit finden ihren Ausdruck, ohne russische oder rassische Einengung. — An den symphonischen Satz "Ruby" des 1955 verstorbenen Honegger kommt das Verständnis leichter heran, wenn man nicht auf Programmusik eingestellt lauscht. Sportleidenschaften der Zuschauer (und Hörer!) sucht der Schweizer Komponist auszudrücken, dabei weckt er zufällig, wie durch das Wettrennen der Streichersechzehntel nach den schmetternden Blechakkorden die Assoziation eines richtigen Rugby-"Gedränges".

Debussys "Rondes de Printemps" ließ Naturweben, Windrauschen, die Vegetation durcheilende Wellen erkennen. Sehr liebevoll nahm sich Ralph Gomberg mit seiner Oboe des chansons "Nous n'irons plus au bois" an — aber mehr Tursor, Herr Burgin, rauscht im Lenz in den Stämmen, daß die Säfte überschäumen . . . Ravels "Pavane" wurde zutreffend nicht als Trauermarsch, sondern als höfischer spanischer Tanz aufgefaßt. Das Morgenständchen eines Narren (Alborado del Gracioso) desselben Ravel stellt man sich närrischer, nachttrunkener, torkelnd eher als träumerisch vor.

Aber das Eigentliche kam erst nach der Pause: Die 4. Symphonie in G-Dur mit Sopransolo von Gustav Mahler. Vergessen wir nicht, daß wir dieses Wiederhören den Bostonians verdanken. Mahler beginnt wie Johann Strauß mit sorglosen Walzern, etwas zum Mitsingen klingt auf, Vögel zwitschern dazwischen. Alles ist einfach, diatonisch. "Gemächlich" — "in gemächlicher Bewegung" — "ruhevoll" — "sehr behaglich" steht über den einzelnen Sätzen und so soll uns zumut werden. Im zweiten Satz ließ II. Konzertmeister (der erste ist Richard Burgin) Alfred Krips (Verwandtschaft mit Josef?) eine zweite bereitliegende, primitivere Geige richtig "fideln". Ist's Freund Hein, der da ungebeten aufspielt? Das Thema dieses Teils ist verdächtig tief empfunden.

Aber, leider, kann der Hörer nicht umhin, stärkste Nähe und Abhängigkeit vom langsamen Satz der Neunten (Beethovens) festzustellen. Zuletzt stimmt der Sopran mit viel Koloratur und sinngemäßen Templverbreiterungen "Der Himmel hängt voller Geigen" an, aus "Des Knaben Wunderhorn", während das Lämmchen aus der Oboe blökt, die Ochsen mit Fagott- und Kontrabaß-Stimme muhen. Nancy Carr war bemüht, den vorgeschriebenen kindlich staunenden Ton zu finden. Denn wir sind ja im Bauernhimmel, der ein wahres Schlaraffenland zu sein scheint. Petrus — hier verbreitert sich das Tempo — sieht wohlwollend zu. Liturgisch weihevoll wird die Weis', wenn die Englein das Brot backen. Ein langes, melodien erfülltes Orchestervorspiel, dann die letzte lebensfrohe Strophe: "Kein' Musik ist ja nicht auf Erden, die unserer verglichen kann werden". — Voller beglückter Friede tritt ein, wenn Baßgeige und Harfe langsam die Mitternachtsstunde geschlagen haben.

R. P.

185

Musical Courier
(NYC)
February, 1957

Concertmaster

During most of the season Richard Burgin, 64, sits unobtrusively at the violin section's first desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he has for the past 36 years. At the end of a performance the conductor or guest soloist will shake his hand. If the guest happens to be someone as impulsive as Leonard Bernstein, he may even kiss his cheeks. For the rest, the concertmaster's job is done out of the public view, preparing the violins for the effects conductor wants, marking the bowings, [illegible] the orchestra. [illegible] sters in two o[illegible] in gets [illegible] podium. Last week he led the Bost[illegible] hony at Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, in a concert of Vaughan Williams, Beethoven and Shostakovich, which he delivered with craftsmanship and no melodrama whatever. "I know what I want, I know how to tell them what I want, and they give it to me," he said, adding as an afterthought: "just as they give it to any other conductor, only maybe to me a little quicker."

The first violinist did not always play second fiddle to the conductor. In the small 18th century ensembles, the other musicians often took the lead from the first violin, but growing orchestras, complex scores and the public demand for a good show have made the conductor virtually irreplaceable. [illegible] concertmaster has far more to do with running the orchestra than meets the eye.

Under Conductor Charles Munch, who used to be a concertmaster himself, Concertmaster Burgin's job moves along well-established grooves, but it was different under the late Serge Koussevitzky, whose famous, poetic perorations had to be translated into technical terms, e.g., how to make the violins sound like first love or the flutes like ice breaking.

Walter Daran

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S BURGIN
First violin was more than second fiddle.

Although Burgin is forgetful in his private life (once he even left his Stradivarius on his commuter train), he has a legendary memory for music. And many times he has saved the situation when a conductor lost his place—by simply playing on until the maestro found himself again. In the words of the late Felix Weingartner, Burgin says: "As long as even one piccolo is playing, we don't give up."

Many concertmasters are tempted by a virtuoso's career. But Burgin says: "I know many virtuoses and I do not envy them. They tell me what it's like to play the same few pieces over and over and know they have to go here and then be there. Not for me. I like the orchestra."

Next week, after his spell in the limelight, Concertmaster Burgin will be back at his accustomed chair in Boston. He will mark the bowings efficiently, play his passages beautifully, and go home to Brookline on his usual commuter train, where trainmen have instructions to see that he does not lose his Stradivarius.

TIME, JANUARY 21, 1957

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, Jan. 15, E.—Despite a raging blizzard outside, the house was filled with loyal subscribers and admirers of Monteux, who rewarded the bold, the brave, and the frostbitten with his magnificent music making and endearing charm. He comes on stage like nothing so much as a genial walrus whose whiskers you want to tweak, just to hear him laugh. But there is no nonsense when the music starts, as it did delightfully with Stravinsky's reconstruction of Pergolesi tunes, called "Pulcinella," which are touched with Stravinsky's own penetrating intellect and special magic. Then came Brahms' Second Symphony in one of the loveliest, most limpid, and most serene readings we have ever heard, all as vernal as anyone could wish for on a winter night. In the Allegretto grazioso, the strings were especially fine as they swung out a long, lilting phrase as a young girl might swirl out her taffeta at a dance. Monteux kept things moving, but never hurried anything or forced an effect. He was bravoed from the floor and applauded, not with beating bows, but by the respectful bare hands of his men. We fled, glad and glowing, into the snowstorm, confident that Debussy and Wagner, after intermission, would be in good hands. K.H.

ymphor

on Progra are forever seeking an symbolic light.

In the opera house thi underlines the dreamlik on the stage, and both the direction of the dra vorced from the drama, sic has the effect of e from darkness to elucida for a few brief moments dispersing itself into starless blue. It is a lone derer, and one wonders concert hall is its home.

Perhaps Mr. Monte long since earned the play what he pleases. Y are certain fundamenta ciples in program build should be observed, and if ignored, result in a
of interest.

We admire and che humanity, his kindlin musicianship, and we sh
tinue to look forward guest appearances as in the past. We also ho ever, for more of the we heard yesterday in nificent Elgar variatio
he was vivid, dynamic

ONY ORCHES

Guest Condu

lear, his beat, his energy,
mand, these singly or co can be involved. What reason, the masterly Mon
no longer in evidence ye

It was an interesting play so much of the inst portion of "Pelleas a sande," but the total e of sameness. In the the stage action, the progre drama provide the link tinuity and variety wh missing yesterday. It long and nearly soporifi sion of fragments of mo without structure or "li all operatic music, instru speaking, is in itself ex and this, of "Pelleas a sande" in such quantity a tion did not benefit by th

Toscanini Tribute

Before the stated prog
Boston Symphony hon memory of the late Art canini with the larghett is titled "Claerchen's Dea the "Egmont" music of B
This was an appropriate since Beethoven was one canini's most cherished co
But somehow the music i too small for the memoria so huge a figure in mus Much better (and well aw the more dramatic items so used for the purpose) wo been the slow moveme
Beethoven's last String the F major, Op. 135. T himself once made a vers for massed strings.

By way of footnote, I if any choral group in th few days will perform canini's memory the one completely suited to the
That is the prevailingly chorus from Verdi's "N the "Va, pensiero," wh sung spontaneously by th at one of the funeral serv
Verdi.

Charles Munch will ret week to conduct the premiere of Sir William Cello Concerto, with Gre program st pe

Randa
Bahan
hoven

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

JAN 17

New Disk Puts 'Spotlight on Brass'

Unusual Horns Played By Boston Musicians

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

"Spotlight on Brass" is the title of a new Vox album (DL-300) featuring the musicianship of Roger Voisin, Harold Meek, and Joseph Orosz, all of whom are listed in the annotations as members of a "well known" Boston orchestra." This amusing and slightly silly designation is doubtless the result of one of those mysterious professional complications concerning committals and contracts. Why not come right out and say these men are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

In this album the spotlight is truly on the brass—on a gamut of instruments ranging from the elephant horn, through such items as serpents, hunting horns, trumpets, cornets, bugles, trombones, euphoniums, and tubas. It is an illustrational album especially suitable for music libraries, musicologists, the classroom, and for those who have some particular interest in the evolution of brass instruments. Consisting of scales and typical melodies, the program will not appeal to the listener looking for concerted band or brass music.

♪ ♪ ♪

If, however, you have the kind of curiosity that has plagued you about the sound of the serpent (several of which are on display in the Symphony Hall collection of antique instruments), you can now satisfy your ambition. The church serpent and calvary serpent, as played by Mr. Orosz, sound much better than they look. In appearance they are almost ferociously reptilian. In sound they are more like a mild-mannered bassoon.

The instruments heard on this disk were chosen mainly from the Belle Skinner collection at Holyoke, Mass., and from the Casadesus Collection in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Háry János, as nearly everyone knows, is that teller of tall tales from Hungarian folklore, preserved since 1926 in the music of an opera by Zoltán Kodály. The "Háry János" Suite, taken from the opera, has long since established itself as a brilliant concert favorite, filled with spirited little marches and swirling gypsy tunes.

This Suite is now available in two recent performances — one for Epic (LC-3290) by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum, the other for Decca (DL-9855) by the RIAS Symphony Orchestra of Berlin under Ferenc Fricsay. Both disks are excellently played and recorded, with the van Beinum reading perhaps a bit mellower than the Fricsay, though both are entertainingly done.

These two disks also include works by Stravinsky. Van Beinum conducts the "Firebird" Suite for Epic, and Fricsay the Divertimento (Suite de Ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée") for Decca. In the first we hear the young Stravinsky of 1910 when he was astonishing the world with his originality; in the latter we find the composer paying charming homage to Tchaikovsky in 1928.

♪ ♪ ♪

Angel has just brought out an appealing new recording of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, and Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, recorded by the Orchestre de la Radiodifusion Française under Igor Markevitch, a conductor especially fitted to interpret the Russian moderns with precision and power.

The Shostakovitch symphony, composed when he was 19 in 1925, is one of those contemporary pieces that almost any music lover can take to his heart. While it is unusual in melodic and formal structure, the dissonant content is low. Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, on the other hand, was composed 11 years earlier at a time when Prokofiev was especially audacious. Some conservative ears may yet recoil at his earthy and barbaric sounds.

Vox is continuing its commendable policy of bringing out luxury albums devoted to works by the Italian baroque composers. The latest is devoted to the Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 1, for strings by Locatelli (1695-1764), played by I Musici Virtuosi di Milano. The conductor is Dean Eckertsen, the young man who has already produced the de luxe albums of Corelli and Manfredini for Vox.

♪ ♪ ♪

This latest album (DL-333) is another welcome addition to the field of recorded music, though one cannot give unstinting praise to the performances of these Locatelli works. The string players do more than a little scrubbing on their instruments, the blame for which Mr. Eckertsen can assume. Italian string players, under sensitive direction, will play like angels when performing Italian music.

This is not to discourage Mr. Eckertsen, whose labors in this direction are much appreciated, but rather to urge him to gain the polish and precision that is the essence of Italian string playing. The biographical and analytical notes by Joseph Braunstein are informatively and entertainingly written.

Those who are intrigued by the novel, the garish, or the weird in music may enjoy investigating an odd recording, made by Ducretet-Thomson for London, called Panorama of Musique Concrète (DTL-93090). The "composers" are Henry, Schaeffer, and Arthuys, who have experimented in Paris with the possibility of assembling a kind of music from sounds recorded on tape, after which the sounds are altered through variations in speed.

These sounds are then combined through a montage process in such a way as to be heard in themes, forms, counterpoint, etc. The results have something of a ghastly fascination and appear especially suitable for film scores accompanying science fiction tales.

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Republican
Circ. 56,950
JAN 17 1957

BOSTON

NAME BANKER TRUSTEE OF HUB SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—E. Morton Jennings Jr., a vice president of the First National Bank of Boston, yesterday was elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Jenings, a 1928 graduate of Dartmouth College, is a resident of Needham. He has served several terms as treasurer of the New England Council.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Independent
Circ. 131,485
JAN 17

E. Morton Jennings Jr. New Symphony Trustee

At a meeting [illegible] of First National Bank has made a the Boston Sym[illegible] estra substantial contribution to the or- yesterday, elec[illegible] d of chestra, through sponsorship of a E. Morton Jen[illegible] vice- concert on the Esplanade last sea- president of the [illegible] Bank of Boston [illegible] Bank since 1929 [illegible] president in the Credit-Loan Division, will devote himself to building up support for the orchestra in the business community. The

Concertmaster

During most of the season Richard Burgin, 64, sits unobtrusively at the violin section's first desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he has for the past 36 years. At the end of a performance the conductor or guest soloist will shake his hand. If the guest happens to be someone as impulsive as Leonard Bernstein, he may even kiss his cheeks. For the rest, the concertmaster's job is done out of the public view, preparing the violins for the effects [illegible]ductor wants, marking the bowings, [illegible] the orchestra. [illegible]sters in [illegible]in gets [illegible]odium. Last week he led the Bos[illegible]hony at Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, in a concert of Vaughan Williams, Beethoven and Shostakovich, which he delivered with craftsmanship and no melodrama whatever. "I know what I want, I know how to tell them what I want, and they give it to me," he said, adding as an afterthought: "just as they give it to any other conductor, only maybe to me a little quicker."

The first violinist did not always play second fiddle to the conductor. In the small 18th century ensembles, the other musicians often took their lead from the first violin, but growing orchestras, complex scores and the public demand for a good show have made the conductor virtually irreplaceable. Still, the concertmaster has far more to do with running the orchestra than meets the eye.

Under Conductor Charles Munch, who used to be a concertmaster himself, Concertmaster Burgin's job moves along well-established grooves, but it was different under the late Serge Koussevitzky, whose famous, poetic perorations had to be translated into technical terms, e.g., how to make the violins sound like first love or the flutes like ice breaking.

Walter Daran

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S BURGIN
First violin was more than second fiddle.

Although Burgin is forgetful in his private life (once he even left his Stradivarius on his commuter train), he has a legendary memory for music. And many times he has saved the situation when a conductor lost his place—by simply playing on until the maestro found himself again. In the words of the late Felix Weingartner, Burgin says: "As long as even one piccolo is playing, we don't give up."

Many concertmasters are tempted by a virtuoso's career. But Burgin says: "I know many virtuosos and I do not envy them. They tell me what it's like to play the same few pieces over and over and know they have to go here and then be there. Not for me. I like the orchestra."

Next week, after his spell in the limelight, Concertmaster Burgin will be back at his accustomed chair in Boston. He will mark the bowings efficiently, play his passages beautifully, and go home to Brookline on his usual commuter train, where trainmen have instructions to see that he does not lose his Stradivarius.

TIME, JANUARY 21, 1957

185

staats-zeitung
20 January 1957

MUSIK

Carnegie Hall
Den schwer

Richard Burgin als Leiter der Boston Symphony ist ein tüchtiger, unbedingt zuverlässiger und vielleicht gerade deswegen wenig aufregender Dirigent. Die Fünfte von Schostakowitsch und — Beethovens Fünfte. Macht man jetzt "numerische" Programme? Um mehr Verehrung für Beethoven wird gebeten. Im zweiten Satz des Schostakowitschwerks erlabte man sich am zweiten Thema (Satz I) als einer der raren Inspirationen heutiger Musik. Leidenschaften und Gedanken der Zeit finden ihren Ausdruck, ohne russische oder rassische Einengung. — An den symphonischen Satz "Ruby" des 1955 verstorbenen Honegger kommt das Verständnis leichter heran, wenn man nicht auf Programmusik eingestellt lauscht. Sportleidenschaften der Zuschauer (und Hörer!) sucht der Schweizer Komponist auszudrücken, dabei weckt er zufällig, wie durch das Wettrennen der Streichersechzehntel nach den schmetternden Blechakkorden die Assoziation eines richtigen Rugby-"Gedränges".

Debussys "Rondes de Printemps" ließ Naturweben, Windrauschen, die Vegetation durcheilende Wellen erkennen. Sehr liebevoll nahm sich Ralph Gomberg mit seiner Oboe des chansons "Nous n'irons plus au bois" an — aber mehr Turgor, Herr Burgin, rauscht im Lenz in den Stämmen, daß die Säfte überschäumen . . . Ravels "Pavane" wurde zutreffend nicht als Trauermarsch, sondern als höfischer spanischer Tanz aufgefaßt. Das Morgenständchen eines Narren (Alborado del Gracioso) desselben Ravel stellt man sich närrischer, nachttrunkener, torkelnd eher als träumerisch vor.

Aber das Eigentliche kam erst nach der Pause: Die 4. Symphonie in G-Dur mit Sopransolo von Gustav Mahler. Vergessen wir nicht, daß wir dieses Wiederhören den Bostonians verdanken. Mahler beginnt wie Johann Strauß mit sorglosen Walzern, etwas zum Mitsingen klingt auf, Vögel zwitschern dawischen. Alles ist einfach, diatonisch. "Gemächlich" — "in gemächlicher Bewegung" — "ruhevoll" — "sehr behaglich" steht über den einzelnen Sätzen und so soll uns zumut werden. Im zweiten Satz ließ II. Konzertmeister (der erste ist Richard Burgin) Alfred Krips (Verwandtschaft mit Josef?) eine zweite bereitliegende, primitivere Geige richtig "fideln". Ist's Freund Hein, der da ungebeten aufspielt? Das Thema dieses Teils ist verdächtig tief empfunden.

Aber, leider, kann der Hörer nicht umhin, stärkste Nähe und Abhängigkeit vom langsamen Satz der Neunten (Beethovens) festzustellen. Zuletzt stimmt der Sopran mit viel Koloratur und sinngemäßen Templverbreiterungen "Der Himmel hängt voller Geigen" an, aus "Des Knaben Wunderhorn", während das Lämmchen aus der Oboe blökt, die Ochsen mit Fagott- und Kontrabaß-Stimme muhen. Nancy Carr war bemüht, den vorgeschriebenen kindlich staunenden Ton zu finden. Denn wir sind ja im Bauernhimmel, der ein wahres Schlaraffenland zu sein scheint. Petrus — hier verbreitert sich das Tempo — sieht wohlwollend zu. Liturgisch weihevoll wird die Weis', wenn die Englein das Brot backen. Ein langes, melodien erfülltes Orchestervorspiel, dann die letzte lebensfrohe Strophe: "Kein' Musik ist ja nicht auf Erden, die unserer verglichen kann werden". — Voller beglückter Friede tritt ein, wenn Baßgeige und Harfe langsam die Mitternachtsstunde geschlagen haben.

R. P.

Musical Courier
(Rec)
February, 1957

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, Jan. 15, E.—Despite a raging blizzard outside, the house was filled with loyal subscribers and admirers of Monteux, who rewarded the bold, the brave, and the frostbitten with his magnificent music making and endearing charm. He comes on stage like nothing so much as a genial walrus whose whiskers you want to tweak, just to hear him laugh. But there is no nonsense when the music starts, as it did delightfully with Stravinsky's reconstruction of Pergolesi tunes, called "Pulcinella," which are touched with Stravinsky's own penetrating intellect and special magic. Then came Brahms' Second Symphony in one of the loveliest, most limpid, and most serene readings we have ever heard, all as vernal as anyone could wish for on a winter night. In the Allegretto grazioso, the strings were especially fine as they swung out a long, lilting phrase as a young girl might swirl out her taffeta at a dance. Monteux kept things moving, but never hurried anything or forced an effect. He was bravoed from the floor and applauded, not with beating bows, but by the respectful bare hands of his men. We fled, glad and glowing, into the snowstorm, confident that Debussy and Wagner, after intermission, would be in good hands. K.H.

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Non-partisan
Circ. 161,675

t as Red Wings I

Unusual Horns Played By Boston Musicians

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

"Spotlight on Brass" is the title of a new Vox album (DL-300) featuring the musicianship of Roger Voisin, Harold Meek, and Joseph Orosz, all of whom are listed in the annotations as members of a "well known" Boston orchestra." This amusing and slightly silly designation is doubtless the result of one of those mysterious professional complications concerning committals and contracts. Why not come right out and say these men are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

In this album the spotlight is truly on the brass—on a gamut of instruments ranging from the elephant horn, through such items as serpents, hunting horns, trumpets, cornets, bugles, trombones, euphoniums, and tubas. It is an illustrational album especially suitable for music libraries, musicologists, the classroom, and for those who have some particular interest in the evolution of brass instruments. Consisting of scales and typical melodies, the program will not appeal to the listener looking for concerted band or brass music.

* * *

If, however, you have the kind of curiosity that has plagued you about the sound of the serpent (several of which are on display in the Symphony Hall collection of antique instruments), you can now satisfy your ambition. The church serpent and calvary serpent, as played by Mr. Orosz, sound much better than they look. In appearance they are almost ferociously reptilian. In sound they are more like a mild-mannered bassoon.

The instruments heard on this disk were chosen mainly from the Belle Skinner collection at Holyoke, Mass., and from the Casadesus Collection in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Háry János, as nearly everyone knows, is that teller of tall tales from Hungarian folklore, preserved since 1926 in the music of an opera by Zoltán Kodály. The "Háry János" Suite, taken from the opera, has long since established itself as a brilliant concert favorite, filled with spirited little marches and swirling gypsy tunes.

This Suite is now available in two recent performances — one for Epic (LC-3290) by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum, the other for Decca (DL-9900) by the RIAS Symphony Orchestra of Berlin under Ferenc Fricsay. Both disks are excellently played and recorded, with the van Beinum reading perhaps a bit mellower than the Fricsay, though both are entertainingly done.

These two disks also include works by Stravinsky. Van Beinum conducts the "Firebird" Suite for Epic, and Fricsay the Divertimento (Suite de Ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée") for Decca. In the first we hear the young Stravinsky of 1910 when he was astonishing the world with his originality; in the latter we find the composer paying charming homage to Tchaikovsky in 1928.

* * *

Angel has just brought out an appealing new recording of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, and Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, recorded by the Orchestre de la Radiodifusion Française under Igor Markevitch, a conductor especially fitted to interpret the Russian moderns with precision and power.

The Shostakovitch symphony, composed when he was 19 in 1925, is one of those contemporary pieces that almost any music lover can take to his heart. While it is unusual in melodic and formal structure, the dissonant content is low. Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, on the other hand, was composed 11 years earlier at a time when Prokofiev was especially audacious. Some conservative ears may yet recoil at his earthy and barbaric sounds.

Vox is continuing its commendable policy of bringing out luxury albums devoted to works by the Italian baroque composers. The latest is devoted to the Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 1, for strings by Locatelli (1695-1764), played by I Musici Virtuosi di Milano. The conductor is Dean Eckertsen, the young man who has already produced the de luxe albums of Corelli and Manfredini for Vox.

* * *

This latest album (DL-333) is another welcome addition to the field of recorded music, though one cannot give unstinting praise to the performances of these Locatelli works. The string players do more than a little scrubbing on their instruments, the blame for which Mr. Eckertsen can assume. Italian string players, under sensitive direction, will play like angels when performing Italian music.

This is not to discourage Mr. Eckertsen, whose labors in this direction are much appreciated, but rather to urge him to gain the polish and precision that is the essence of Italian string playing. The biographical and analytical notes by Joseph Braunstein are informatively and entertainingly written.

